

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Attorneys — Liability for Negligence — Failure to Produce Available Witnesses.

Where, in tort for damages against an attorney for negligent conduct in the trial of an action brought by plaintiff, through the attorney, against his employer, the jury could find that there were available witnesses who would testify to facts to justify a finding that plaintiff was in the exercise of due care, and that the employer was negligent, and that the attorney failed to use the witnesses, the right to recover is for the jury, and a charge that there is not sufficient evidence to justify a verdict for plaintiff is properly refused.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An instruction in an action against an attorney for negligent conduct in the trial of an action brought by him for plaintiff against a third person, as to the attorney's neglect to anticipate and provide against the death of a third person, is properly refused, where the attorney, though without fault in that regard, might have been lacking in due care in other respects.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where, in an action against an attorney for negligence in the trial of an action for plaintiff, suing his employer for a personal injury, the jury could find that the superintendent of the employer was negligent the defense of negligence of a fellow servant, or that without the concurring fault of a fellow servant the accident complained of would not have occurred, is not available to defeat the action.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—1.

Appeal and Error — Questions Review-able — Failure to Object or Except.

A defendant requesting a directed verdict in his favor, may not have the accuracy of statements in the charge of the trial court and the legal effect adjudicated by the supreme judicial court, in the absence of failure to direct the attention of the trial court specifically to the complaint, and to allege exceptions.

Evidence — Deposition at Former Trial.

In an action against an attorney for negligence in the trial of an action for plaintiff, suing an employer for a personal injury, a deposition of a witness testifying at a former trial is admissible, where the witness in the deposition has more than merely corroborated the testimony at the trial.

Depositions — Notice of Taking — Sufficiency.

A notice to take deposition of a witness about to go out of the commonwealth and not to return in time for trial, directed to "James C. McClellan," while the party's name was "James C. McLellan," and seasonably served, is sufficient, though subsequent notice, not seasonably served, correctly gave the name of the party.

Exceptions from Superior Court, Middlesex county: McLAUGHLIN, Judge.

Action by James C. McLellan, plaintiff, against Samuel A. Fuller, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant alleges exceptions. MODIFIED.

The action was brought to recover damages for the negligence of the defendant in the conduct of an action brought by the plaintiff, through the defendant as an attorney, against the Moore Spinning Company.

R. W. Gloag and T. J. Clarke for plaintiff.
Robert Homans for defendant.

[499] PIERCE, J.—The jury rightly might have found that at the first trial there was available to the defendant, Fuller, as attorney for the plaintiff, the testimony of Deliz.

Lavalle, of Addie Puffer, of Margaret Frances Bean and of the plaintiff; that their testimony, if believed, established that the plaintiff was in the employ of the Moore Spinning Company; that one Ogley was an overseer exercising the duties of a superintendent; that the duty of the plaintiff required him to obey the reasonable orders of the overseer; that on March 29, 1905, he was directed by that officer to change over the gears on one of the spinning frames; that for that purpose the machine was stopped; that on receiving the order he took the gears to the end of the machine nearest the wall to adjust them to the spinning frame; that while he was thus engaged, with mind intent on his work, the machine started up without warning, or without any person's giving actual notice to him that it was to start; that he then received injuries; that the overseer, while standing by the side of the machine and observing the situation of the plaintiff, had ordered it to be started up; that there was a [500] rule of the mill that before starting a machine at rest for repairs notice should be given to those working on it; that notice was not given by the person directed to start the machine; and that when the overseer gave the order for starting up he knew the rule was not obeyed by the starter and also knew that the plaintiff was in a situation of danger against which without warning he could not guard or protect himself and at the same time do the allotted work.

Under such conditions the jury would have been justified in finding that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care and that the defendant company was negligent. Davis v. New York, New Haven, etc. R. Co. 150 Mass. 532, 34 N. E. 1070. They might have found that the defendant Fuller was negligent in not putting before the jury at the first trial the testimony of the plaintiff; they also might have found him negligent in not giving the statutory notice, or, if they found that such notice was given, that he was negligent in not perpetuating testimony adequate to prove its service when proof thereof was required at the trial.

The rights of the defendant upon either hypothesis were carefully guarded in the judge's charge.

The defendant's first request, that "There is not sufficient evidence to justify a verdict for the plaintiff," for reasons stated could not have been given. The second request could not have been given because the question of the defendant's neglect to anticipate and provide against the death of his brother was not necessarily the only factor in the determination of the question of his due care. He might have been without fault in that regard and lacking in due care in other respects.

As the jury could have found the overseer superintendent negligent, the defence set up in the remaining requests is not open,—that a fellow servant was negligent, or that without the concurring fault of a fellow servant the accident would not have happened. Myers v. Hudson Iron Co. 150 Mass. 125, 137, 22 N. E. 631, 15 Am. St. Rep. 176. It follows that the judge rightly refused to give them.

The defendant in his brief states that the judge in his charge made assertions of fact not justified by testimony or agreement of parties, and argues that he is entitled as matter of law, because of his general request that a verdict be directed for the defendant, to have the accuracy of the statements determined and their [501] legal effect adjudicated by this court, notwithstanding his omission to direct the attention of the trial judge specifically to his complaint or to allege exceptions. This is not the rule of law. Horrigan v. Clarksburg, 150 Mass. 218, 22 N. E. 897, 5 L.R.A. 609. And the facts do not create a right within the exceptions to the rule as indicated in such cases as Brightman v. Eddy, 97 Mass. 478, 481; Slater v. Rawson, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 450; Lyon v. Prouty, 154 Mass. 488, 28 N. E. 908.

The defendant offered the deposition of Margaret Frances Bean, after having read to the jury the testimony given by this witness at the first trial. In that testimony, in connection with other statements not in conflict therewith, she said that at the moment of the accident she saw the overseer, Ogley, coming up the alley toward the place where the plaintiff was hurt. She made no statement as to who gave the order to start the machine, nor, except inferentially, as to Ogley's whereabouts at a time immediately preceding the accident. In her deposition she stated that she did not hear any one direct the machine to be started up, or call out that it was to be started; that she was beside the plaintiff and "in a position where she could have heard any one if they had hollered before starting up the machine."

She further deposed that she knew Ogley and did not hear him give any directions to any one to start the machine, and did not see him at the front of the machine.

This testimony contained in the deposition was of the greatest importance in that the jury, believing it, might accept it as a complete refutation of the charge that the overseer knowing the situation of the plaintiff ordered the machine to be started up without giving the customary warning.

A careful comparison of the testimony given at the trial with that set out in the proffered deposition shows the last to be more than merely corroborative of the first, and it should have been admitted in testimony unless rightly excluded on other grounds than that it was merely corroborative.

The facts in connection with the taking of this deposition show that on November 15, 1912, the defendant Fuller applied to Harold A. Varnum, justice of the peace, to take the deposition of Margaret Bean (Margaret Frances Bean) about to go out of the Commonwealth and not to return in time for the trial; that the justice issued a notice, in the form directed, to James C. McClellan; [502] that this notice was duly and seasonably served in hand; that after service the officer found that the name of the defendant James C. McLellan, had been spelled in the notice McClellan rather than McLellan; that he notified counsel of the fact and thereafter on the same day the same justice of the peace issued another notice which was directed to James C. McLellan; that this last notice was left, but not seasonably, at the last and usual place of abode of the defendant; that on the next day, at the time and place appointed, the place being the office of the justice, all parties attended and participated in the taking of the deposition; that before the deposition was taken the plaintiff stated that he objected "for want of sufficient notice, in that the statutory allowance of time did not intervene between the giving of the notice and the time stated in the notice for the taking of the deposition; because of its being heard on Saturday and because of its being begun after four o'clock on Saturday afternoon." By an agreement "all informalities in form or manner of taking same" were waived except as above set out.

The original service was entirely good; the notice was delivered in hand to the defendant, and more than the statutory time intervened between the time of giving the notice and the time stated in the notice for the taking of the deposition; the fact that the officer, from an over abundance of caution, procured a new notice to issue did not make invalid the original service. All parties attended the hearing and an inspection of the deposition shows that they were fully heard. The objection taken to the taking of the deposition went to the limit of technical defence and should not be favored.

The exception to the refusal to admit in evidence the deposition must be sustained; all the others are overruled.

So ordered.

The obligation extends to all services which the attorney assumes to perform in the course of his employment without regard to whether they are strictly included therein. Spangler v. Sellers, 5 Fed. 882. Attorneys are held to the same rule of liability for want of professional skill and diligence in practice, and for erroneous or negligent advice to those who employ them, as are physicians, surgeons and other persons who hold themselves out to the world as possessing skill and qualification in their respective trades or professions. Citizens' Loan, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 669. In Humboldt Bldg. Assoc. Co. v. Ducker, 111 Ky. 759, 64 S. W. 671, it was said: "While the rule in England seems to have been that an attorney is liable to his client only in case of gross incompetence, yet in this country a juster rule for the client, and one which the profession cannot reasonably find fault with, is that the attorney is liable for the want of such skill, care, and diligence as men of the legal profession commonly possess and exercise in such matters of professional employment."

It has been said that an attorney is liable only for gross negligence or gross ignorance in the performance of his professional duties. Purves v. Landell, 12 Cl. & F. 91; Hill v. Finney, 4 F. & F. 616; Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Burr. 2060; Parker v. Rolls, 14 C. B. 691, 78 E. C. L. 691; Suydam v. Vance, 2 McLean 99, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,657; Evans v. Watrous, 2 Port. (Ala.) 205; Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 52 Am. Dec. 262; Wilson v. Russ, 20 Me. 421; Babbitt v. Bumpus, 73 Mich. 331, 41 N. W. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 585; Hoover v. Shackelford, 23 Miss. 520; Morrill v. Graham, 27 Tex. 646; Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 203. While such seems to be the English rule with respect to the liability of a barrister (Swinfen v. Chelmsford, 5 H. & N. 800), with that exception it is probable that the use of the expression "gross negligence" in that connection has been the result of verbal inaccuracy rather than that of a deliberate intention to question the rule that an attorney is liable for the want of ordinary care. Thus in Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 497, 68 Am. Dec. 134, the court said: "Some law writers and some adjudged cases are guilty of inaccuracy in the employment of the phrase 'gross negligence.' Our own court fell into the error in the case of Evans v. Watrous, 2 Port. 205. It is there said that an attorney is not liable 'unless he has been guilty of gross negligence.' In the same paragraph it is asserted that he is 'bound to use reasonable care and skill,' and the meaning attributed by the writer of that opinion to the expression 'gross negligence' is the want or absence of 'reasonable care and skill.' Thus explained, that opinion defines the true measure of an attorney's duty and liability." In Holmes v. Peck, 1 R. I. 242, it was said: "We recognize the principle, which subjects an attorney for the want of ordinary skill and care in the management of the business intrusted to him, as anyone else, who professes any other art or mystery. The want of ordinary care and skill in such a person is gross negligence." In Fox v. Jones, 4 Wilson Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 29, 14 S. W. 1007, it was said: "The attorney is held to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, and the want of either constitutes gross negligence." In Patterson v. Frazer (Tex.) 79 S. W. 1077, after saying that "the rule which seems to hold an attorney liable only for gross negligence can hardly be reconciled with the more recent American authorities," the court continued: "Whether the want of such skill, prudence, and diligence as are possessed and commonly exercised by lawyers of ordinary skill and capacity, versed in the particular practice of the particular locality or subject, be regarded as gross negligence or not, it seems to us that the failure of a lawyer to possess and exercise them, when by such failure his client is damaged, by the great weight of modern authorities in America, renders the lawyer liable for such damages as proximately flow from such negligence."

Extraordinary care is not required in the absence of a special contract therefor, Cox v. Sullivan, 7 Ga. 144, 50 Am. Dec. 386; Strodtman v. Menard County, 56 Ill. App. 120; Morrison v. Burnett, 56 Ill. App. 129; Babbitt v. Bumpus, 73 Mich. 331, 41 N. W. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 585. In Humboldt Bldg. Assoc. Co. v. Ducker, 111 Ky. 759, 64 S. W. 671, it was said that a bond executed by an attorney for the faithful performance of his duty as an examiner of titles "added nothing to the attorney's liability or undertaking." In Babbitt v. Bumpus, supra, it was said: "A lawyer is not an insurer of the result in a case in which he is employed, unless he makes a special contract to that effect, and for that purpose. Neither is there any implied contract, when he is employed in a case, or any matter of legal business, that he will bring to bear learning, skill, or ability beyond that of the average of his profession. Nor can more than ordinary care and diligence be required of him, without a special contract is made requiring it. Any other rule would subject his rights to be controlled by the vagaries and imaginations of witnesses and jurors, and not infrequently to the errors committed by courts. This the law never has done; and the fact that the best lawyers in the country find themselves mistaken as to what the law is, and are constantly differing as to the application of the law to a given state of facts, and even the ablest jurists find themselves frequently differing as to both, shows both the fallacy and danger of any other doctrine; and especially is this so as to questions of practice, the construction of statutes, and particularly those arising under our criminal and probate laws. Frequently we find the decisions of courts of last resort in the different states directly opposed to each other upon the same questions, and resting upon the same state of facts. These all admonish courts and jurors that great care and consideration should be given to questions involving the proper service to be rendered by attorneys when they have acted in good faith, and with a fair degree of intelligence, in the discharge of their duties when employed under the usual implied contract."

The ordinary skill and ability which an attorney is bound to exercise have been defined as being those possessed by the average practitioner. Spangler v. Sellers, 5 Fed. 882; Gambert v. Hart, 44 Cal. 542; In re Kruger, 130 Cal. 621, 63 Pac. 31; Babbitt v. Bumpus, 73 Mich. 331, 41 N. W. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 585; Gabbert v. Evans, 184 Mo. App. 283, 166 S. W. 635. "Attorneys are very properly held to the same rule of liability for want of professional skill and diligence in practice, and for erroneous or negligent advice to those who employ them, as are physicians, surgeons, and other persons who hold themselves out to the world as possessing skill and qualification in their respective trades or professions. Waugh v. Shunk, 20 Pa. St. 130. The practice of law is not merely an art, it is a science which demands from all who engage in it, without detriment to the public, special qualifications which can only be attained by careful preliminary study and training, and by constant and unremitting investigation and research. But as the law is not an exact science, there is no attainable degree of skill or excellence at which all differences of opinion or doubts in respect to questions of law are removed from the minds of lawyers and judges. Absolute certainty is not always possible. 'That part of the profession,' said Lord Mansfield, in Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Burr. (Eng.) 2060, 'which is carried on by attorneys is liberal and reputable, as well as useful to the public, when they conduct themselves with honor and integrity; and they ought to be protected where they act to the best of their knowledge and skill. But every man is liable to error; and I should be very sorry that it should be taken for granted that an attorney is answerable for every error or mistake, and to be punished for it by being charged with the debt which he was employed to recover for his client.' Watson v. Muirhead, 57 Pa. St. 161, 98 Am. Dec. 213; U. S. Mortgage Co. v. Henderson, 111 Ind. 24 (34), 12 N. E. 88. An attorney who undertakes the management of business committed to his charge, thereby impliedly represents that he possesses the skill and that he will exhibit the diligence ordinarily possessed and employed by well-informed members of his profession, in the conduct of business, such as he has undertaken." Citizens' Loan, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 338, 8 L.R.A. 62.

There is no absolute standard of care or ability; and the learning, skill and ability required in any particular instance must have reference to the character of the business for which the attorney is retained. Cox v. Sullivan, 7 Ga. 144, 50 Am. Dec. 386.

The degree of care and skill required of an attorney is in no manner affected by the fact that his services are rendered gratuitously, Lawall v. Groman, 180 Pa. St. 532, 37 Atl. 98, 57 Am. St. Rep. 662; Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 203; nor is it material that the attorney's fees have not been paid, Eccles v. Stephenson, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 517. Compare Cavillaud v. Yale, 3 Cal. 108, 58 Am. Dec. 388, wherein it was said: "In declaring against an attorney for negligence, it is only necessary to aver generally that he was retained, without stating specially that a retaining fee was paid. But the averment here goes further, and shows that the employment or engagement of the defendant was in consideration of certain reasonable fees and rewards to be paid him. No future time is stated as having been agreed upon for the payment of the fee, and the inference must be, that it was to be paid before the services were rendered, because an attorney is always entitled to his retaining fee in advance, unless he stipulates to the contrary. Therefore, the declaration averring that the fee was to be paid should also have averred the payment, as distinctly as the performance of any other condition precedent is necessary to be stated."

Where a layman induces another to deal with him by falsely representing that he is a lawyer, he is held to just as strict a liability to the client as if he were in fact an attorney. Miller v. Whelan, 168 Ill. 544, 42 N. E. 59; Foulks v. Falls, 91 Ind. 315. Compare Wakeman v. Hazleton, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 148.

b. Attorney Not Insurer.

A lawyer is not an insurer. He undertakes only to avoid errors which no member of his profession of ordinary prudence, diligence and skill would commit, and is liable only where he fails to do so.

"If an attorney is fairly capacitated to discharge the duties ordinarily incumbent upon one of his profession, and acts with a proper degree of attention, and with reasonable care, and to the best of his skill, he will not be responsible." Malone v. Gerth, 100 Wis. 166, 75 N. W. 972. In Humboldt Bldg. Assoc. Co. v. Ducker, 111 Ky. 759, 64 S. W. 671, it was said: "When one seeks and obtains admission to that profession dealing with so many important and involved affairs of men, and holds out his services to be engaged by those standing in need of such, he engages that he possesses to an ordinary extent the technical knowledge commonly possessed by those in the profession, and that he will give to the matters submitted to him such care and attention as is ordinarily given similar affairs by men of this profession. He does not agree, in the absence of special contract to that effect, that he will make no mistake of judgment. On the contrary, the law recognizes, in fixing this liability of the attorney, that human judgment is fallible. Courts, as well as lawyers, do disagree concerning the many matters about which each one may have a fairly fixed opinion. The law is a science, it is true, but an imperfect one, for the reason that it depends for exemplification and enforcement upon the imperfect judgments and consciences of men. Therefore when the attorney has used ordinary care in acquainting himself with the facts, his misjudgment as to the law thereon will not generally render him liable." Reviewing the English cases it was said in O'Barr v. Alexander, 37 Ga. 201: "Attorneys have intrusted to their management cases of difficulty and doubt, and it is not surprising that they commit mistakes of judgment in some instances. Such mistakes do not necessarily render them liable for the consequences. Says Lord Mansfield, in Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Burr. (Eng.) 2060: 'That part of the profession which is carried on by attorneys is liberal and reputable, as well as useful to the public, when they conduct themselves with honor and integrity; and they ought to be protected, where they act to the best of their skill and knowledge. But every man is liable to error; and I should be very sorry that it should be taken for granted that an attorney is answerable for every error or mistake, and to be punished for it, by being charged with the debt which he was employed to recover for his client, from the person who stands indebted to him. Not only counsel but judges may differ or doubt, or take time to consider. Therefore, an attorney ought not to be liable in cases of reasonable doubt.' Again, 'An attorney is liable for the consequences of ignorance or nonobservance of the rules of practice of the court; for the want of care in the preparation of the cause for trial; or of attendance thereon with his witnesses; and for the mismanagement of so much of the conduct of a cause as is usually and ordinarily allotted to his department of the profession. Whilst on the other hand, he is not answerable for error in judgment upon points of new occurrence, or of nice or doubtful construction.' Godefroy v. Dalton, 6 Bing. 467, 19 E. C. L. R. 135. 'It seems too hard to say an attorney would be bound to construe the section as applicable when the judges of this court differ in opinion as to whether it is or not.' Per Coleridge, J., Chapman v. Van Toll, 8 El. & Bl. 407, 92 E. C. L. 407."

An attorney is not liable for a mistake or error of judgment where he acts honestly and in the exercise of ordinary care and reasonable skill and learning. Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Burr. (Eng.) 2060; Jackson v. Clifton, 66 Ala. 29; Hinckley v. Krug (Cal.) 34 Pac. 118; Stevens v. Walker, 55 Ill. 151; Morrison v. Burnett, 56 Ill. App. 129; Hille-gass v. Bender, 78 Ind. 225; Haverty v. Haverty, 35 Kan. 438, 11 Pac. 364; Breed-love v. Turner, 9 Mart. O. S. (La.) 353; Wilson v. Russ, 20 Me. 421; In re Shanley, 57 Misc. 8, 107 N. Y. S. 913, modified 124 App. Div. 935, 109 N. Y. S. 434; Lynch v. Com. 16 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 368, 16 Am. Dec. 582; In re Worrall, 1 Del. Co. Rep. 377; Meredith v. Woodward, 16 W. N. C. (Pa.) 146; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Ferris (Tex.) 99 S. W. 896; State v. North Shore Boom, etc. Co. 55 Wash. 11, 107 Pac. 196, modifying 55 Wash. 1, 103 Pac. 426; Malone v. Gerth, 100 Wis. 166, 75 N. W. 972. "It must not be understood that an attorney is liable for every mistake that may occur in practice, or that he may be held responsible to his client for every error of judgment in the conduct of his client's cause. Instead of that, the rule is that if he acts with a proper degree of skill and with reasonable care and to the best of his knowledge, he will not be held responsible." National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621. In Morrison v. Burnett, 56 Ill. App. 129, it was said: "An attorney is required to use such skill and prudence as lawyers of ordinary ability and care would exercise, and for failing therein, he is liable to his client for any proximate loss thereby occasioned; but he is not answerable for an error of judgment upon nice or difficult points, nor for every mistake which may occur in practice." In Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 482, 68 Am. Dec. 134, it was said: "Law is certainly the most comprehensive of all the sciences; its mastery and practice the most intricate of all the professions. Change and progress, if not improvement, are observable at every epoch of its history. If, under these circumstances, members of the legal profession were held accountable for the consequences of each act which may be pronounced an error by the courts of the country, no one, I apprehend, would be found rash enough to incur such fearful risks. On the other hand, it surely cannot be successfully maintained, that lawyers are a privileged class, not responsible for any even the grossest want of skill. I hold that they, like all other professional men and artisans, impliedly stipulate that they will bring to the service of their clients ordinary and reasonable skill and diligence; and if they violate this implied stipulation, they are accountable to their clients for all injury traceable to such want of skill and diligence."

There is no implied agreement, in the relation of attorney and client, that the attorney will guarantee the success of a suit or other proceeding, or the soundness of his opinions, or that they will be ultimately sustained by a court of last resort. Bowman v. Tallman, 27 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 212; Isham v. Parker, 3 Wash. 755, 29 Pac. 835. In the case first cited it was said: "There is no implied agreement in the relation of counsel and client, or in the employment of the former by the latter, that the former will guarantee the success of his proceedings in a suit, or the soundness of his opinions, or that they will be ultimately sustained by a court of last resort. (Lanphier v. Phipos, 8 C. & P. 475 [34 E. C. L. 475].) He only undertakes to avoid errors which no member of his profession of ordinary prudence, diligence and skill would commit. (Montrion v. Jefferys, Ky. and Mo. R. 317; S. C. 2 C. & P. 113 [12 E. C. L. 50].) It is not enough that doubts may be raised of the soundness of his opinion or correctness of his course, unless they are accompanied by the absence of all reasonable doubts of the propriety of an opposite course or opinion in the mind of every member of his profession, of ordinary skill, sagacity and prudence, caused by a decisiveness of reason and authority in its favor. (Kemp v. Burt, 4 B. & Ad. 424 [24 E. C. L. 93].) The practice of the law in reference to the right of compensation for professional exertions, although dependent on the exercise of intellect and study as its instruments, is subjected to the same rules as any other employment, even where the implements are of a more material kind, and not to any of either greater or less stringency. On the one hand, practitioners are bound to possess the skill and exercise the diligence and attention common to prudent members of their profession; and on the other, they are released from all liability as to consequences which, considering the fallibility of human reason, must necessarily be sometimes unforeseen. They are only chargeable with utter incompetency or want of ordinary care in a particular case; therefore, when after using proper diligence, no member of the profession of ordinary skill and capacity could entertain a reasonable doubt of the propriety of a contrary view and conduct."

c. Ignorance of Law.

An attorney who undertakes the management of business committed to his charge thereby impliedly represents that he possesses, and will exercise, the skill and learning ordinarily possessed and employed by well-informed members of his profession in the conduct of the business which he has undertaken. National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621; Citizens' Loan Fund, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 669. And see the two preceding subdivisions of this note. Therefore, it is essential that he should know and apply those rules and principles of law which are well established and clearly defined in the elementary books, or which have been declared in judicial decisions in the jurisdiction wherein he practices, and duly reported and published for a sufficient length of time to have become known to those who exercise diligence in keeping pace with the literature of the profession. Hillegass v. Bender, 78 Ind. 225; Citizens' Loan Fund, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 669; Breedlove v. Turner, 9 Mart. O. S. (La.) 353; Hatch v. Fogerty, 33 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 166; Enterprise v. Miller, 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 463. "An attorney has no right to be a clam, and shut himself up in the seclusion of his own self-conceived knowledge of the law. He must keep pace, so far as reasonable diligence and a fair amount of common sense will enable him to do so, with the literature of his profession and what the courts have decided." Hill v. Mynatt (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 163. For any loss resulting from the lack of this measure of professional duty and attainment the attorney is liable to his client.

"Law is certainly the most comprehensive of all the sciences; its mastery and practice the most intricate of all the professions. Change and progress, if not improvement, are observable at every epoch of its history. If, under these circumstances, members of the legal profession were held accountable for the consequences of each act which may be pronounced an error by the courts of the country, no one, I apprehend, would be found rash enough to incur such fearful risks. Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 482, 68 Am. Dec. 134. "It is sufficient for the purposes of the case in hand to say that he must at least be familiar with the well-settled principles of law and rules of practice which are of frequent application in the ordinary business of the profession." Enterline v. Miller, 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 463. In Citizens Loan, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 145, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 160, it was said: "An attorney who undertakes the management of business committed to his charge, thereby impliedly represents that he possesses the skill, and that he will exhibit the diligence, ordinarily possessed and employed by well-informed members of his profession, in the conduct of business, such as he has undertaken. He will be liable if his client's interests suffer on account of his failure to understand and apply those rules and principles of law that are well established and clearly defined in the elementary books, or which have been declared in adjudged cases that have been duly reported and published a sufficient length of time to have become known to those who exercise reasonable diligence in keeping pace with the literature of the profession. . . . Thus it has been said: 'He is liable for the consequences of ignorance or nonobservance of the rules of practice of his court, for the want of care in the preparation of the cause for trial. Whilst, on the other hand, he is not answerable for error in judgment upon points of new occurrence, or of nice or doubtful construction.' Godefroy v. Dalton, 6 Bing. 460, 19 E. C. L. 132; Chitty Con. 817; Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316. It is his own fault, however, if he undertakes without knowing what he needs only to use diligence to find out, or applies less than the occasion requires. A lawyer is without excuse who is ignorant of the ordinary settled rules of pleading and practice, and of the statutes and published decisions in his own state, but he is not to be charged with negligence where he accepts as a correct exposition of the law a decision of the supreme court of his own state, nor can he be held liable for a mistake in reference to a matter in which members of the profession, possessed of reasonable skill and knowledge, may differ as to the law until it has been settled in the courts; nor if he is mistaken in a point of law on which reasonable doubt may be entertained by well-informed lawyers." In Spangler v. Sellers, 5 Fed. 882, it was said: "This statute seems to be unambiguous in its terms, and it had been in existence for four years; and the knowledge of its provisions should ordinarily and reasonably have been possessed by one who undertook to conduct legal proceedings of that character; and the ignorance of or failure to apply such knowledge by the defendant was negligence."

"But attorneys do not profess to know all the law, or to be incapable of error or mistake in applying it to the facts of every case; even the most skilful of the profession would hardly be able to come up to that standard." National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621; see also the preceding subdivision of this note.

In Montriou v. Jefferys, 2 C. & P. 113, 12 E. C. L. 50, the court said: "God forbid that it should be imagined that an attorney, or a counsel, or even a judge, is bound to know all the law." See also Shilcock v. Passman, 7 C. & P. 289, 32 E. C. L. 512; Lanphier v. Phipos, 8 C. & P. 475, 34 E. C. L. 487; Crosby v. Murphy, 8 Ir. C. L. (Eng.) 301; Ahlhauser v. Butler, 57 Fed. 121. The law does not require of an attorney "the possession of perfect legal knowledge." Spangler v. Sellers, 5 Fed. 882.

An attorney cannot be held liable for entertaining an action on an erroneous view of the law as to questions which are new or unsettled, or as to which the average well-informed members of his profession might fairly disagree in their application of the law.

"The fact that the best lawyers in the country find themselves mistaken as to what the law is, and are constantly differing as to the application of the law to a given state of facts, and even the ablest jurists find themselves frequently differing as to both, shows both the fallacy and danger of any other doctrine; and especially is this so as to questions of practice, and the construction of statutes." Babbitt v. Bumpus, 73 Mich. 331, 41 N. W. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 585, wherein it was also said: "Frequently we find the decisions of courts of last resort in the different states directly opposed to each other upon the same questions, and resting upon the same state of facts. These all admonish courts and jurors that great care and consideration should be given to questions involving the proper service to be rendered by attorneys when they have acted in good faith, and with a fair degree of intelligence, in the discharge of their duties when employed under the usual implied contract. Under such circumstances, the errors which may be made by them must be very gross before the attorney can be held responsible. They should be such as to render wholly improbable a disagreement among good lawyers as to the character of the services required to be performed, and as to the manner of their performance under all the circumstances in the given case, before such responsibility attaches." In Patterson v. Powell, 31 Misc. 250, 64 N. Y. S. 43, affirmed 68 N. Y. S. 1145, wherein the negligence charged was the failure of an attorney to plead specially the statute of frauds, the court said: "Considering the state of the law and practice touching this subject at the time of the rendition of the services, it cannot be said that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence. For more than half a century the courts of this state had consistently declared the statute available under a general denial. There were no authorities opposed to this view; for dicta, however much entitled to respectful consideration, are not recognized as authorities, will not be regarded by courts as adjudications, and are not binding on the tribunals that pronounce them. The plaintiff might well have reasoned that the court would not disturb what had been regarded by the profession for a long period as a well-settled principle of pleading. The plaintiff was called upon to pursue one of two courses. The one he followed had the support of authority, and his judgment cannot be impeached if he regarded the other as opposed to reason, principle, and authority. It does not follow that, because the court afterwards adopted a different view of the law, negligence must be imputed to the attorney. At most, it was but a mere misjudgment on a doubtful question of law, and an attorney cannot be held guilty of negligence in case of a reasonable doubt." In Sellers v. Knight, 185 Ala. 96, 64 So. 329, it was said: "Good faith and honest intention—complete exemption from selfish, fraudulent purpose—of attorneys in the attainment of opinions touching matters inviting their professional consideration are not impeached by mistakes or errors of judgment in premises. The ascertainment of the law or its application to concrete circumstances is not an exact science. To so impeach, something more must attend than an erroneous conclusion of law or of its application to the concrete matter under consideration. Even what would appear to some the plainest of cases may, without wrongful purpose so inspiring, appear to another to be the subject of serious doubt."

An attorney cannot be charged with negligence when he accepts, as a correct exposition of the law, a decision of the supreme court of his state. Marsh v. Whitmore, 21 Wall. 178, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 482, affirming 1 Hask. 391, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,122; Hastings v. Halleck, 13 Cal. 203; Citizens' Loan Fund, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 669. It has also been held that counsel cannot be convicted of negligence in yielding to the views of the judge presiding at the trial of the cause. "When a lawyer yields to the opinion of the presiding judge, and forbears to take an exception, he cannot be convicted of a want of professional skill, professional knowledge or professional diligence." Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 227. Nor, it seems, can want of professional skill be predicated on an attorney's proceeding to try a cause on a theory which is sustained by the court, even though it is contrary to a principle of law. Avery v. Jacob, 59 Super. Ct. 585 mem. 15 N. Y. S. 564.

An attorney is not bound to possess knowledge of the laws of a foreign jurisdiction and will not be liable for error due to his ignorance thereof. Fenaille v. Coudert, 44 N. J. L. 286. In that case the court said: "In assuming the employment of plaintiffs, the skill and knowledge they professed must be considered with reference to the locality of their practice. In the absence of any express declaration on the subject, they will be presumed to have held themselves out as possessing such skill and knowledge as attorneys practicing [in the state of New York] might reasonably be supposed to possess, and no more. As attorneys of New York they are not to be presumed to know the laws of a foreign state. Nor did they impliedly undertake that they had such knowledge, by accepting an employment which . . . was in terms limited to drawing a contract in all respects binding between the parties."

d. Negligence as Question of Law or Fact.

Whether an attorney has been negligent in the performance of his professional duties is usually a question for the jury.

Pennsylvania.—Hamsher v. Kline, 57 Pa. St. 397.

South Carolina.—Hogg v. Martin, Riley L. 156.

Texas.—Jinks v. Moppin, 80 S. W. 390; Patterson v. Frazer, 100 Tex. 103, 94 S. W. 324, reversing 93 S. W. 146. And see the reported case. In Cochrane v. Little, 71 Md. 323, 18 Atl. 698, the rule was stated as follows: "In an action of this character against an attorney, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury for what species or degree of negligence or want of skill the defendant is properly answerable, and what duty is imposed upon him by law, and leave them to determine, upon all the facts and circumstances of the case, whether the defendant has performed his duty, and if not, whether the neglect or want of skill was of a character or degree such as to render him liable, according to the definitions furnished by the instructions of the court. Hunter v.

Caldwell, 10 Q. B. 82, 59 E. C. L. 82; Hatch v. Lewis, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 467." In Pinkston v. Arrington, supra, wherein the action was based on the alleged negligence of an attorney in examining a title it was said: "There is no evidence that he investigated the trial docket of the previous term, though less than six months had elapsed, for causes disposed of at that term. It is evident that an ordinary examination of this docket for the previous term either by reference to the index under exhibit 'W,' or of the cases then pending, or inquiry of the register, would have discovered to him that by a decree of that court, W. T. Williams had been deprived of all power to dispose of the land by sale or otherwise. Have the defendants given any satisfactory or reasonable excuse for this omission of duty? We think this question of facts should be left with the jury." In Cleveland v. Cromwell, 110 App. Div. 82, 96 N. Y. S. 475, it was held to be a question for the jury whether an attorney was guilty of negligence in advising his client to plead guilty when the indictment was insufficient and the offense had been compounded.

But where the facts are ascertained negligence becomes a question for the court. Gambert v. Hart, 44 Cal. 542. See also Hastings v. Halleck, 13 Cal. 203. In the case first cited it was said: "The negligence imputed to the defendant is, first, his failure to file and serve a proper notice of the motion for new trial; second, his submission of the motion before the statement in support of it had been settled or agreed to. At the trial the plaintiff called the witness, Benham, to prove that these acts amounted to negligence in the defendant, as an attorney. But the court excluded the evidence, and this ruling is assigned as error. The witness was not called to prove any fact in the case, and his evidence, if admitted, would have been only an expression of his opinion as an attorney, that the alleged acts or omissions of the defendant amounted to negligence in law. This was a question for the court, and not for the witness to decide. The facts being admitted or proved, it was a question of law for the court whether they establish negligence in the defendant. The evidence was properly excluded." So in Castner v. Gray, 54 Colo. 551, 131 Pac. 404, wherein it was alleged that an attorney was negligent in proceeding with a cause without procuring the service of process, it was held to be a question of law whether an appearance dispensed with the necessity of showing process.

2. LIABILITY FOR FRAUD OR UNFAIR DEALING.

The duty of an attorney to his client involves not only skill and care, but also the observance of the utmost good faith. Ex p.

Giberson, 4 Cranch (C. C.) 503, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,388; Haverty v. Haverty, 35 Kan. 438, 11 Pac. 364; In re Egan, 22 S. D. 355, 117 N. W. 874. See also Asher v. Beckner, 41 S. W. 35, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 521. National Hollow Brake Beam Co. v. Bakewell, 224 Mo. 203, 123 S. W. 561. That duty is subject always however to the qualification that the duty of fidelity to the client is never to be so interpreted as to involve an obligation to waive the fair operation of the law or to defeat the ends of justice. Ex p. Giberson, 4 Cranch (C. C.) 503, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,388; Sprague v. Moore, 136 Mich. 426, 99 N. W. 377. "It would be deplorable, indeed, if a lawyer felt that he was under an obligation to his client to maintain positions which did not accord with his own notions of law and justice, simply because they tended to his client's advantage. The lawyer owes a duty to the court, to himself, and to society, as well as to his client." Sprague v. Moore, supra.

What constitutes a breach of the obligation of an attorney in respect to good faith and fair dealing toward his client is in the main so involved in the general duties arising out of the relation as to be outside the scope of present discussion. One illustration of the doctrine is to be found in the rule which forbids an attorney to purchase from the adverse party the subject-matter of litigation in which he is employed. See the note to Garceau v. McNamara, Ann. Cas. 1915C 951. On the same principle an attorney is precluded from acting adversely to a former client in the same general matter. See the note to Peirce v. Palmer, Ann. Cas. 1912B 181. Likewise in all dealings between attorney and client the former is held to the strict obligations of a fiduciary relation. See 2 R. C. L. tit. Attorneys at Law, p. 966.

An attorney is liable to his client for any loss sustained by the latter in consequence of the attorney's fraud. McLead v. Applegate, 127 Ind. 349, 26 N. E. 830; Manley v. Felty, 146 Ind. 194, 45 N. E. 74; Krause v. Lloyd, 100 Ia. 666, 69 N. W. 1062; Hooker v. Axford, 33 Mich. 453; Taylor v. Young, 56 Mich. 285, 22 N. W. 799; Hoopes v. Burnett, 26 Miss. 428; Reigal v. Wood, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 402; Loeff v. Lawton, 97 N. Y. 478; Heilbroner v. Douglass, 32 Tex. 215; Porter v. Kruegel (Tex.) 155 S. W. 174; Roller v. McGraw, 63 W. Va. 462, 60 S. E. 410. See also the following cases wherein the rule was recognized but it was held that no fraud was shown: Williams v. Reed, 3 Mason 405, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,733; Robertson v. Chapman, 152 U. S. 673, 14 S. Ct. 741, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 592; Phillips v. Rhodes, 2 Colo. App. 70, 29 Pac. 1011; Bachman v. Goldmark, 48 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 549; Dewitt v. Herron, 39 Tex. 675. Thus an attorney has been held liable in damages to his client for failing to impart information as to matters of fact. Baker v. Humphrey, 101 U. S. 494, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 1065; L'Amoureux v. Vandenburg, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 316, 32 Am. Dec. 635. In the case first cited it was said: "It is the duty of an attorney to advise the client promptly whenever he has any information to give which it is important the client should receive. Hoopes v. Burnett, 26 Miss. 428; Jett v. Hempstead, 25 Ark. 462; Foy v. Cooper, 2 Q. B. 937 [42 E. C. L. 937]." In Downard v. Hadley, 116 Ind. 131, 18 N. E. 457, it was said: "It was the appellant's duty, when he ascertained the defect in the title which he was employed to examine and perfect, to inform his client, and to take immediate and diligent steps to perfect it for the latter's benefit." So in Taylor v. Blacklow, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 235, 32 E. C. L. 100, an attorney was held liable in damages to his client for the disclosure to a third person of a defect in the client's title discovered by the attorney in the course of his employment.

Fraudulent misstatements of fact or law made by an attorney to his client will if damage to the latter results sustain an action for damages. Hezelrigg v. Brenton, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 525; Wheaton v. Newcombe, 48 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 215; Allen v. Frawley, 106 Wis. 638, 82 N. W. 593; Hubbard v. McLean, 115 Wis. 9, 90 N. W. 1077. In Allen v. Frawley, supra, it was said: "Whatever may be the rule as to intentional misstatements of the law as between persons upon parity with each other, we cannot for a moment assent to the proposition that courts of equity or law are not to protect the trusting client against such acts on the part of her attorney. In the whole realm of business transactions hardly any act presents more of moral turpitude nor more likelihood of effective fraud than the intentional and self-profiting misinformation as to the law from a trusted attorney to his client, relying on him, as she must, for guidance and protection. It is gratifying to find few, if any, cases where the direct question has been passed on by courts. That fact speaks eloquently the response which lawyers, English and American, have given to the high responsibilities thrust upon them by the opportunities and temptations of their confidential and influential relations with their clients. Courts have hardly had to deal with anything more aggravated than omission to advise clients against the attorney's own interest, or honestly mistaken statements of the law; but there has been, as a rule, no hesitation in declaring even these sufficient to defeat transaction from which the attorney benefits at the expense of his client. . . . This court is not disposed to relax or confuse the niceties of a code of ethics which for so many centuries has, with few exceptions, protected and justified the intrusting of vast property rights and most sacred interests to the care of lawyers, without thought or precaution as to their pecuniary responsibility. And we hold that the allegations of misrepresentation and misstatement of rules of law, if proved as set forth, would constitute actionable fraud."

3. LIABILITY FOR UNAUTHORIZED ACT.

a. In General.

When an attorney undertakes, without his client's consent, to step outside the bounds of his implied authority, he does so at his own risk, and is responsible to the client for any injury sustained by reason of the unauthorized act. Jones v. Wolcott, 2 Allen (Mass.) 247; Coopwood v. Baldwin, 25 Miss. 129. See also Fitch v. Scott, 3 How. (Miss.) 319, 34 Am. Dec. 86; Armstrong v. Craig, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 387; Vooth v. McEachen, 181 N. Y. 28, 2 Ann. Cas. 601, 73 N. E. 488, reversing 91 App. Div. 30, 86 N. Y. S. 431. Thus in Coopwood v. Baldwin, supra, it was said: "When the plaintiff in error as attorney for Baldwin & Gray, without authority from them, took the responsibility of dismissing their suit against Smith, and received in payment of it, from Smith, claims upon other parties, he became liable prima facie in an action on the case for the amount of their claim against Smith, which liability he could only discharge by showing that a judgment, if rendered on the claim at the regular trial term of the suit, would have been unavailing and valueless. There is no such proof in the record, but the evidence would seem to warrant a contrary conclusion."

Where an attorney has been instructed by his client, and such instructions do not conflict with the attorney's duty as an officer of the court, it is safer for counsel to follow the client's instructions so far as the rules of law will permit. Nave v. Baird, 12 Ind. 318; Harris's Appeal (Pa.) 6 Atl. 761. In Nave v. Baird, supra, it was said: "It is often very difficult for an attorney to determine, in a difficult, critical case, the proper steps to be taken in its prosecution or defense. A small circumstance, a slight injudicious move, may have an extremely prejudicial influence. A change of venue, injudiciously taken, may be construed to imply a consciousness of a bad cause; and an unsuccessful attempt to prove facts affecting prejudicially the character of the opposite party, or any of his witnesses, may so recoil as to turn the scale, in a doubtful case, against the party attempting it. In such cases, it is the duty of the attorney to advise his client to the best of his judgment; and it is generally the wiser course for the client to act upon the advice so given; but if he is unwilling to do so, it is safer for the attorney to follow the instructions of his client, so far as the rules of law may permit. But if he does not do so, and the client sues for damages, it will devolve upon him to show, presumptively, that he was injured by the course pursued by the attorney, in order to recover more, at least, than nominal damages."

An attorney is liable for damage resulting from a failure to follow the lawful instructions of his client. O'Halloran v. Marshall, 8 Ind. App. 394, 35 N. E. 926; Gilbert v. Williams, 8 Mass. 51, 5 Am. Dec. 77; Armstrong v. Craig, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 387; Read v. Patterson, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 431; Fox v. Jones, 4 Willson Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 29, 14 S. W. 1007. See also Whitney v. Abott, 191 Mass. 59, 77 N. E. 524. In Gilbert v. Williams, supra, the court said: "It would be unnecessary in this case, were it practicable, to define precisely the kind of neglect, for which an attorney is responsible to his client. It will be sufficient to decide this case, that whenever an attorney disobeys the lawful instructions of his client, and a loss ensues, for that loss the attorney is responsible. Let the claim of the plaintiff in the action before us be tried by this rule. In February, or March, 1804, the plaintiff enclosed a copy of a note against Charles Willard to the defendant, informing him that he wished to have the contents collected; that he considered the debt as precarious; and requesting to have it secured immediately by attaching Willard's property. The instructions were to have the debt immediately secured by attaching the property. Such instructions he had a right to give; and it was the duty of the defendant, if he undertook the trust of collecting the debt for the plaintiff, to obey them. He did undertake it; and on the 15th of the same March informed the plaintiff by letter, that he had seen Willard, who, he said, was to continue in business, and that he had assured him, if the note was sent to him (the defendant), he (Willard) would pay it. On the 20th of March, the note was enclosed and sent by the plaintiff to the defendant, without any new instructions, further than as to the manner of remitting the money. From this statement of the facts, it is manifest that the instructions of the plaintiff were disobeyed." Thus an attorney, when so instructed by his client, must bring suit. Cox v. Livingston, 2 Watts & S. (Pa.) 103, 37 Am. Dec. 486. But see Hogg v. Martin, Riley L. (S. C.) 156, wherein it was held that an attorney cannot be guilty of negligence in forbearing to bring a suit, where the parties had agreed to leave one of the matters in dispute to arbitration, the decision of which would render an action unnecessary.

In like manner an attorney is liable for a failure to put a claim into judgment when instructed so to do. Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144, 19 N. E. 739; Hett v. Pun Pong, 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 290. So, an attorney should comply with his client's instructions as to the mode of remitting an amount collected. Grayson v. Wilkinson, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 268; Kimmell v. Bittner, 62 Pa. St. 203.

While it is presumed that an attorney appearing for a party not served with process is authorized so to do (see 2 R. C. L. tit. Appearances, p. 325) an unauthorized appearance is not a nullity (Id. p. 326). While such an unauthorized act will on familiar principles of agency render the attorney liable, the resultant damage is minimized by the prevailing holding that the appearance and the proceedings had thereon may at any time be vacated on motion.

In the absence of substantial injury, the recovery must be nominal. Harrington v. Huntley, 4 Alb. L. J. 367. The mere fact that an attorney acts unauthorizedly does not render him liable. To have such an effect the client must suffer loss or injury in consequence of the unauthorized act. Certainly the client has no cause of action where he is benefited by the attorney's conduct. Phillips v. Rhodes, 2 Colo. App. 70, 29 Pac. 1011.

b. Unauthorized Compromise or Release.

An attorney has no implied authority to compromise or release his client's claim or cause of action. See the notes to Pomeroy v. Prescott, 21 Ann. Cas. 574, and Turner v. Fleming, Ann. Cas. 1915B 831. An attorney acting without authority in that respect is liable to his client for any damage which may result from his act. People v. Cole, 84 Ill. 327; Helfer v. Spinner, 147 Ill. App. 448; Repp v. Wiles, 3 Ind. App. 167, 29 N. E. 441; Woodrow v. Hennen, 6 Mart. N. S. (La.) 157; Wilson v. Coffin, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 316; Johnson v. Dun, 75 Minn. 533, 78 N. W. 98; Fitch v. Scott, 3 How. (Miss.) 314, 34 Am. Dec. 86; Coopwood v. Baldwin, 25 Miss. 129; Houx v. Russell, 10 Mo. 246. "An attorney has no authority to compromise the claim of his client, and if he does so, he takes upon himself the consequences of its loss, or the damages which he may sustain." Fitch v. Scott, 3 How. (Miss.)

314, 34 Am. Dec. 86. In Repp v. Wiles, supra, it was said: "In the case before us there does not appear to have been an emergency requiring immediate action. While it is found that it was generally supposed the Blair estate was insolvent, and the attorneys acted in good faith in that belief in accepting the offer of compromise, it does not appear that the offer might not have stood for a month without incurring the hazard of loss. The fact that all of the appellants but one lived in distant parts would give the attorneys no authority to accept an offer of compromise, unless they were compelled to act before they could by reasonable efforts advise with their clients concerning the matter. The appellant who was notified of the proposition did not assume to act for any one but himself. There being no emergency under the facts set out in the finding, the compromise was unauthorized as to all the appellants except Benjamin Repp. This being the case, Wiles & Berryman were bound to account for the full amount of the claim to those who did not consent to the compromise." In Houx v. Russell, 10 Mo. 246, wherein it appeared that an attorney employed to collect a debt received notes in payment, it was held that he was liable in assumpsit to the client for the amount. The court said: "Whenever an attorney undertakes to travel out of the plain line of his duty, he does so at his peril, and will be held to strict proof, that the departure was indispensable to secure the debt of his principal. There is no evidence in the case showing that Farrar was in doubtful circumstances, or that the plaintiff was in hazard of losing his debt, to demand the exercise of any such power as that on the part of the attorney. On the contrary, it was the duty of the attorney to prosecute the claim in his hands against Farrar, with due diligence and without delay; so that the plaintiff, who was assignee of the notes, might in the event of Farrar being unable to pay have his recourse on the assignor. Instead of pursuing this course, the attorney received from Farrar, in discharge of his two notes, thirty-four small notes upon different individuals in the country, amounting in the aggregate to $1,013.15, and assigned to him in blank. Shall the law tolerate such a practice, and compel the plaintiff to receive these notes in discharge of his claims against Farrar, or postpone his right of action against the attorney, until the attorney collects the notes? If the attorney could legally receive these notes in discharge of his client's demand, he may insist upon and compel his client to receive them from him; then, in lieu of two notes on the same individual, the payment of which was guaranteed by the assignment, he would have thirty-four or as many different individuals. Let him put those in the hands of an attorney for collection, and let that attorney pursue the same course, and what will be the final result? When will he get his money? It is contended for the defendant, that if promissory notes were taken by him in discharge of the plaintiff's debt, without his assent or direction, it is a misfeasance, for which a special action may be maintained. This we think very probable. But why turn the plaintiff over to his special action, when the defendant has received what he must have considered as equivalent to money in discharge of his principal's debt, which called for money? We are of the opinion that whatever is received as money, in discharge of a money obligation, should be regarded and treated as money. If so, the plaintiff might bring his action of assumpsit, for money had and received, as in the present case."

In Wilson v. Coffin, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 316, it was held on similar facts that an action for negligence would lie, the court saying: "The ruling was, that if the defendant by gross negligence, in a matter he had undertaken to perform as an attorney, had embarrassed the collection of the plaintiff's debt, and put it in such a situation that the plaintiff could not so readily realize the amount of his claim, and the plaintiff's debt was thereby rendered of less value, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages of the defendant, though Purrington, the original debtor, always had been and was then able to pay the debt, which was left for collection by the plaintiff with the defendant. The correctness of this ruling is too plain and manifest, upon the mere statement of it, to admit of any controversy. It is, in truth, merely stating the common elementary principle that an attorney is answerable to his client for negligence in an action on the case. It is no answer to the charge of negligence, for the attorney to say that the original debtor is able to pay the debt. Nor is it any better answer to say that an action for money had and received might have been brought against him, on the ground that he had compromised the debt without the consent of the client, and had taken security to himself. The defendant, in fact, made the appropriate answer to the charge of negligence, which was, that he had been guilty of no negligence; but this defense was not sustained by the jury, who, by their verdict, have established the charge of negligence. Negligence on the part of the attorney undoubtedly furnishes a ground of action upon which the client may proceed; though the debtor is still able to pay the debt, and though the attorney may have also rendered himself liable for the debt, in an action for money had and received." In Coopwood v.

Baldwin, 25 Miss. 129, it was said: "When the plaintiff in error, as attorney for Baldwin & Gray, without authority from them, took the responsibility of dismissing their suit against Smith, and received in payment of it, from Smith, claims upon other parties, he became liable prima facie in an action on the case for the amount of their claim against Smith, which liability he could only discharge by showing, that a judgment, if rendered on the claim at the regular trial term of the suit, would have been unavailing and valueless. There is no such proof in the record, but the evidence would seem to warrant a contrary conclusion."

The receipt by the client from the attorney of the amount actually collected is not an accord and satisfaction nor does it work an estoppel. Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 482, 68 Am. Dec. 134.

If there appears to be an emergency by reason of which a compromise is apparently demanded in order to save the client's interest, and there is not time or opportunity to consult with the client, an attorney exercising a reasonable degree of skill and discretion is not liable for an error of judgment. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Buchanan, 100 Ind. 63. See also the note to Pomeroy v. Prescott, 21 Ann. Cas. 574, 583, supplemented by the note to Turner v. Fleming, Ann. Cas. 1915B 831.

4. LIABILITY FOR ACT OF PARTNER.

The employment of a firm of lawyers is equivalent to the retainer of each of the partners, though only one of them is consulted. Smith v. Hill, 13 Ark. 174; Lupton v. Taylor, 39 Ind. App. 412, 78 N. E. 689, 79 N. E. 523; Eggleston v. Boardman, 37 Mich. 14; Ostrander v. Capitol Invest. etc. Assoc. 130 Mich. 312, 89 N. W. 964; MacFarland v. Altschuler, 77 Neb. 138, 108 N. W. 151; De Vall v. De Vall, 57 Ore. 128, 109 Pac. 755, 110 Pac. 705. See also Marsh v. Gold, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 285; Ganzer v. Schiffbauer, 40 Neb. 633, 59 N. W. 98. Therefore, the firm is responsible to the client for the acts of its individual members within the scope of their authority. Richardson v. Richardson, 100 Mich. 364, 59 N. W. 178; Ganzer v. Schiffbauer, 40 Neb. 633, 59 N. W. 98; Warner v. Griswold, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 665. The liability of an attorney for the acts of his partner extends to acts which are negligent, fraudulent or unauthorized. Blair v. Bromley, 11 Jur. (Eng.) 617, 16 L. J. Ch. 495. Gordon v. Coolidge, 1 Sumn. 537, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,606; Priddy v. MacKenzie, 205 Mo. 181, 103 S. W. 968; Warner v. Griswold, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 665. Compare Ex p. Flood, 23 N. Bruns. 86. In Warner v. Griswold, supra, the rule was stated as follows: "A partnership between attorneys is admitted to be lawful. Like other partnerships, it may be composed of two or more individuals, and all will be responsible for the acts of each, within the scope of partnership. They constitute but one person in law. If one of two attorneys, who are partners, receives money collected for a client, and embezzles or absconds with it, that will form no defense to the other partner. If one should be guilty of extortion, the other would be liable to repay what had been illegally received. If a suit instituted in the name of one, should be unskillfully conducted, the other would be responsible to the client in an action for his damages (7 Cow. 416; 8 [Cow.] 258). Both would undoubtedly be liable to the officers of the court, or others, for services rendered in suits conducted in the name of one. Indeed, every responsibility which belongs to other partnerships attaches also to this; and no reason is perceived why the general rules by which the course of proceedings in such cases is regulated, should not also apply." In Priddy v. MacKenzie, supra, it was said: "If plaintiffs should succeed in this litigation and recover the property in controversy from MacKenzie, and if it should hereafter be shown that McLeod, a member of the firm of Warner, Dean, Gibson and McLeod, was negligent in the investigation of the title to the property, and as a result MacKenzie lost the property, then the firm and each and every member thereof would be civilly liable to him for the damages sustained by him on account of that negligence. (Simpson v. Schulte, 21 Mo. App. 639; 4 Cyc. 966, par. IV; National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195 [25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621]; 4 Cyc. 964, c.) While it is not pretended that Judge Gibson had any knowledge of the examination of the MacKenzie title by McLeod, yet that fact would not relieve him from his and the firm's liability for the damage occasioned by the negligence of McLeod. One cannot avoid liability for the acts of his partner in the ordinary business of the firm on the ground that he did not know of such acts. (Curran v. Downs, 7 Mo. App. 329.) In discussing this question, the supreme court of Georgia used this language: 'It is urged upon us that as Judge Underwood was absent when the business was transacted by his copartner in the firm name, and knew nothing of it, and never received any compensation for the service which his copartner in the name of the firm rendered, and did not become judge until long afterwards, he was free from disqualification; but we think otherwise. What his partner did in the firm name was done by the firm, and upon the firm responsibility, and this was so whether compensation was charged or not.' (East Rome Town Co. v.

Cothran, 81 Ga. 359, 367, 8 S. E. 737.)" In Fornes v. Wright, 91 Ia. 392, 59 N. W. 51, it was said: "We need not cite authorities to the effect that if the act done was within the scope of the firm business, then each partner is liable, regardless of his knowledge or want of knowledge of the doing of such act. It may work hardship to hold all the members of a firm liable to account for this money when it was received and appropriated by one member of the firm, and when it appears it never went into the assets of the firm; but it is a hardship incident to and growing out of the partnership relation, wherein each is liable for the act of either, if within the proper scope of the firm's business. This money was called for by the firm of Wright, Baldwin & Haldane. It was received by Haldane as a member of the firm, and so receipted for. The draft was indorsed by the latter in the firm name. It was thus a firm transaction, for which each member is accountable. The fact that Haldane conducted all the correspondence in no way affects defendants' liability."

Each member of a firm is responsible for claims placed in its care for collection, irrespective of his personal participation in the transaction. Smyth v. Harvie, 31 Ill. 62, 83 Am. Dec. 202; Parker v. Gartside, 178 Ill. App. 634; Lupton v. Taylor, 39 Ind. App. 412, 78 N. E. 689, rehearing denied 39 Ind. App. 420, 79 N. E. 523; McGill v. McGill, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 258; Dwight v. Simon, 4 La. Ann. 490; Porter v. Vance, 14 Lea (Tenn.) 630; Gilchrist v. Brande, 58 Wis. 184, 15 N. W. 817. See infra, subdivision II, 5. Collection of Claims, as to what constitutes negligence.

Payment to one partner is payment to all. Harman v. Johnson, 2 El. & Bl. 61, 75 E. C. L. 61; Dundonald v. Masterman, L. R. 7 Eq. (Eng.) 504, 38 L. J. Ch. 350, 17 W. R. 548; Cook v. Bloodgood, 7 Ala. 683; Lupton v. Taylor, 39 Ind. App. 412, 78 N. E. 689, rehearing denied 39 Ind. App. 420, 79 N. E. 523; McGill v. McGill, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 258; Dwight v. Simon, 4 La. Ann. 490; Richardson v. Richardson, 100 Mich. 364, 59 N. W. 178; Wilkinson v. Griswold, 12 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 669; Bryant v. Hawkins, 47 Mo. 410; Priddy v. MacKenzie, 205 Mo. 181, 103 S. W. 968; McFarland v. Crary, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 259. In Cook v. Bloodgood, 7 Ala. 683, it was said: "In professional partnerships, formed for the practice of the law, if one member of the concern acknowledges the receipt of money for a client, the latter need not inquire how the claim was collected, or whether paid at all, or not; but may charge the firm upon the assumption that the receipt expresses the truth."

But a firm of lawyers is not liable for the acts of one of its members outside the ordinary course of its business. Plumer v. Gregory, L. R. 18 Eq. (Eng.) 621, 43 L. J. Ch. 616; Harman v. Johnson, 2 El. & Bl. 61, 75 E. C. L. 61, 3 C. & K. 272, 17 Jur. 1096. See also Sims v. Brutton, 5 Exch. (Eng.) 802, 20 L. J. Exch. 41; Chilton v. Cooke, 37 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 607; Hedley v. Bainbridge, 3 Q. B. 316, 43 E. C. L. 752, 2 Gale & D. 483; Marsh v. Gold, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 285. See also Richardson v. Richardson, 100 Mich. 364, 59 N. W. 178, wherein it was held that the fact that one member of a firm of attorneys employed to manage a will contest conspired with one of the heirs to cheat the others out of their share of a settlement, after the money had been paid over to the attorney in fact of the contesting heirs, did not render the firm liable for a diversion of the funds, where it acted in good faith until the settlement was made and money paid over. Thus in Breckinridge v. Shrieve, 4 Dana (Ky.) 375, it was held that there is no firm liability for a sum borrowed by one of the partners for his own purposes.

The dissolution of a firm of lawyers does not release a member thereof from liability for the acts of his late partner with respect to business which was intrusted to the firm; at least not until notice to the client for the dissolution and conduct on his part from which an election to treat one of the late partners as his sole attorney may be implied. Smyth v. Harvie, 31 Ill. 62, 83 Am. Dec. 202; Bryant v. Hawkins, 47 Mo. 410; Poole v. Gist, 4 McCord L. (S. C.) 259. And see Gilchrist v. Brande, 58 Wis. 184, 15 N. W. 817. But see Ayrault v. Chamberlin, 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 83, wherein it was held that where a partnership between attorneys is dissolved after they have commenced a suit to foreclose a mortgage, and a new partnership is formed consisting of one of the members of the old firm and a new member, and the new member retires from the firm, and transfers his interests in the costs of the suit before the money is collected, the retiring member is not liable for the default of his former partner in not paying over the money afterwards received by him. In Smyth v. Harvie, supra, it was said: "Then, if their partnership embraced the business of collecting money, as well as the practice of the law in other branches of the profession, it became a part of their duty to collect the money after judgment was recovered, unless otherwise agreed. If this was a partnership duty, it continued with each member, after the dissolution of the firm. Plaintiffs gave credit to the firm as it was then constituted, and they did not release themselves from their obligation, by its dissolution. For aught we know, the fact that Tuley was a partner, may have been the inducement to confide the business to the care of the firm. Even if a dissolution of the partnership could have released the members from liability for a failure to complete the business, it could only have been after notice of the dissolution. In the absence of such notice, plaintiffs had no option in determining whether they would continue the cause in the hands of the member who took charge of the business of the firm, or would place it in the hands of another attorney. It cannot be, that their business can be transferred to others without their consent, so as to escape responsibility. They did not trust either member of the firm separately, but it was to both that the business was intrusted, and they have the right to look to both for its faithful performance." In Thompson v. Robinson, 16 Ont. App. 175, it was held that a person entering a firm of solicitors under an agreement that he should have no interest in certain business then in hand was none the less liable to the client for a mismanagement of funds by another partner.

5. LIABILITY FOR ACT OF SUBSTITUTE.

As a general rule an attorney has no power to delegate the authority reposed in him to another. See the note to Kinhead v. Hartley, Ann. Cas. 1915D 1, 9. If he does so, without his client's consent, he becomes liable on principles of agency for negligence, default, or wrongdoing on the part of his substitute. Smallwood v. Norton, 20 Me. 83, 37 Am. Dec. 39; Kingston Bank v. Roosa, 2 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 8. See also Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 492, 68 Am. Dec. 134. Thus an attorney who receives a claim for collection binds himself to exercise reasonable care, skill and diligence in the performance of the duties so undertaken, and the fact that he intrusts another with the collection does not relieve him from his obligations in this respect.

Tennessee.—Porter v. Vance, 14 Lea 629.

The general rule is that when an attorney is employed to collect a claim and he places it in the hands of another attorney, through whose negligence or misconduct the claim is lost, he is liable therefor to the principal in the absence of an agreement or assent that such other attorney should be employed. Dentzel v. City, etc. R. Co. 90 Md. 434, 45 Atl. 201.

There is, however, no apparent reason why an attorney should not be within the rule which has been announced frequently with respect to banks and collection agencies, that the employment of an agent to make a collection at a distant place implies authority to a person there resident. See the note to Kinhead v. Hartley, Ann. Cas. 1915D 1, 12. In such a case there is a conflict of authority as to the liability of the agent for the negligence or default of the subagent. See the note to Kinhead v. Hartley, supra, at page 19.

6. LIABILITY FOR ACT OF CLERK OF ASSISTANT.

The general rule is that an attorney is bound by the acts of a clerk, or other person, in charge of his office, or of business intrusted to the attorney, in so far as such person acts within the apparent scope of his authority. Cornelius v. Harrison, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 758; Hardy v. Keeler, 56 Ill. 152; Hayward v. Goldsburly, 63 Ia. 436, 19 N. W. 307; Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 56, 7 N. E. 39 (distinguished in Everett v. Henderson, 146 Mass. 89, 14 N. E. 933, 4 Am. St. Rep. 284); Mahoney v. Middlesex County, 144 Mass. 459, 11 N. E. 689; Johnson v. Sprague, 183 Mass. 102, 66 N. E. 422; McGuinness v. Manhattan R. Co. 69 App. Div. 606, 74 N. Y. S. 1054; Power v. Kent, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 211; Birkbeck v. Stafford, 14 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 285, 23 How. Pr. 236. "Details of a law business, especially such as that of the collection of claims, are often not attended to by the attorney, but intrusted to subordinates, whose acts in the conduct of a business are his, so far as civil responsibility therefor, either on his own part or that of his clients, is concerned." Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 56, 7 N. E. 39. "It fully appears that John J. Post, who delivered the attachment at the sheriff's office, was the managing clerk of the firm of Staffords & Davidson, by whom it was issued, and his acts and declarations admitted in evidence were such as fell within the scope of his agency, and the firm are affected thereby." Birkbeck v. Stafford, 14 Abb. Pr. 285, 23 How. Pr. 236.

But an attorney will not be responsible for the conduct of one who assumes to act for him without authority; thus where, during the absence of an attorney from home, his wife received and opened a letter addressed to him containing a draft payable to his order for collection, and the drawee paid the amount of the draft to her, it was held that as she had no authority to receive payment, the drawee was not discharged. Day v. Boyd, 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 458, wherein the decision was rested on the limitations of the implied agency of a wife for her husband, as to which see the note to Meyer v. Frenkil, Ann. Cas. 1913C 875.

II. Negligence or Breach of Duty in Particular Matter.

1. ADVICE.

An attorney does not warrant the correctness of his advice on matters of law. Morrison v. Burnett, 56 Ill. App. 129; Citizens' Loan, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 669; Gott v. Brigham, 41 Mich. 227, 2 N. W. 5; Harriman v. Baird, 6 App. Div. 518, 39 N. Y. S. 592, affirmed 158 N. Y. 691, 53 N. E. 1126; Bowman v. Tallman, 40 How. Pr. 1; Harkness v. Craven, 199 Pa. St. 267, 48 Atl. 1080; Hill v. Mynatt (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 163. See also supra, subdivision I, 1, b. Attorney Not Insurer. In Hill v. Mynatt, supra, the court said: "If all of us had to go out for mistakes of judgment upon points of new occurrence, or of nice or doubtful construction, it is apprehended that the ranks of the profession, and of judges not final in their jurisdiction, would be decimated at an appalling rate. We recognize and approve the rule attaching liability to the attorney whose client suffers loss on account of his failure to understand and apply well-established principles of law, settled by textbooks and cases published long enough for him, exercising reasonable diligence, to have informed himself of them. In other words, an attorney has no right to be a clam, and shut himself up in the seclusion of his own self-conceived knowledge of the law. He must keep pace, so far as reasonable diligence and a fair amount of common sense will enable him to do so, with the literature of his profession, and what the courts have decided. But the law does not require and never has required of a member of the profession that he should be a true Sir Oracle of what the courts have decided or will decide as the law applicable to every given state of facts. In the case at bar attorneys of the greatest eminence in the profession may have well doubted as to the best course to pursue to attain success for their client. There is no imputation in the evidence that they acted except in the utmost good faith, for what they believed to be the best for their client. The most that can be said is that they fell into an error of judgment upon a doubtful question of law." In Harriman v. Baird, supra, it was said: "There is nothing in the case to justify a finding that the advice which was given to the defendant by the plaintiffs was improper or unskillful. An attorney is not required to insure a client as to the ultimate result of the proceedings which he had advised, nor is the client justified in refusing to compensate him because in the subsequent development of affairs it appears that a course other than that adopted would have turned out more advantageous for the client. If that were so in every litigated case the professional adviser of one party or the other would not be entitled to compensation. No one can say, looking at the problem which was presented to the plaintiffs as to what advice they would give the defendant at the time, just what course it would ultimately appear would be most advantageous for him to adopt, and the record clearly shows that they acted for him in the utmost good faith, advising him as appeared to them at the time to be for his interest, and expended a large amount of money and a great deal of time in endeavoring to extricate him (the defendant) from the position in which he was placed."

But in undertaking to advise a client, the attorney impliedly guarantees that he has a sufficient knowledge of the law for that purpose, and that he will use reasonable care and skill therein. Should he fail in this respect he will be responsible to his client for any damage sustained by reason of such failure. Pinkston v. Arrington, 98 Ala. 489, 13 So. 561. See also Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 482, 68 Am. Dec. 134; Citizens' Loan Fund, etc. Assoc. v. Friedley, 123 Ind. 143, 23 N. E. 1075, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 L.R.A. 669; Thomas v. Schee, 80 Ia. 237, 45 N. W. 539; Heffner v. Wise, 51 La. Ann. 1637, 26 So. 415; Cochrane v. Little, 71 Md. 323, 18 Atl. 698; Ryan v. Long, 35 Minn. 394, 29 N. W. 51; Gihon v. Albert, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 278; Couse v. Horton, 23 App. Div. 198, 49

N. Y. S. 132; Cleveland v. Cromwell, 110 App. Div. 82, 96 N. Y. S. 475. And see the cases cited infra in this subdivision.

The rule that an attorney is liable for advice negligently given is most frequently applied to erroneous advice given with respect to the validity of title to property, or the existence of incumbrances thereon.

Oregon.—Currey v. Butcher, 37 Ore. 380, 61 Pac. 631.

Pennsylvania.—Lawall v. Groman, 180 Pa. St. 532, 37 Atl. 98, 57 Am. St. Rep. 662.

In Byrnes v. Palmer, 18 App. Div. 1, 45 N. Y. S. 479, affirmed 160 N. Y. 699, 55 N. E. 1093, the court said: "It is also true that the same rule that applies to the liability of an attorney in the conduct of a litigation is applicable to his liability in examining titles. He is certainly not a guarantor that the titles to which he certifies are perfect. He is only liable for negligence or misconduct in their examination. But in determining the question of negligence on the part of an attorney in examining a title, it is necessary to bear in mind the marked difference between proper conduct in that employment and in a litigation. In a litigation a lawyer is well warranted in taking chances. To some extent litigation is a game of chance. The conduct of a lawsuit involves questions of judgment and discretion as to which even the most distinguished members of the profession may differ. They often present subtle and doubtful questions of law. If in such cases a lawyer errs on a question not elementary or conclusively settled by authority, that error is one of judgment for which he is not liable. But passing titles, as a rule, is of an entirely different nature. A purchaser of real estate is entitled not only to a good but to a marketable title, that is, a title free from reasonable doubt. (Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1; Cambrelleng v. Purton, 125 N. Y. 610.) In Jordan v. Poillon, 77 N. Y. 518, the court of appeals refused to compel a purchaser at a judicial sale to take title. Though the objection presented a mere question of law, the court declined to pass upon it and determine it in the absence of parties interested who would not be concluded by the decision. It is, therefore, the duty of a conveyancer to see that his client obtains a marketable title, and to reject titles involved in doubt, unless the client is fully informed of the nature of the risk and is willing to accept it. A careful lawyer might readily advise a client that he was entitled to a piece of real property, and that it was proper to bring an action for its recovery, while, at the same time, he would reject a title which involved the same question as to which he had advised a suit."

An attorney is liable in damages to his client where he neglects to advise him concerning matters which come within the scope of his duties. Jamison v. Weaver, 81 Ia. 212, 46 N. W. 996; Hill v. Montgomery, 84 Ill. App. 300, affirmed 184 Ill. 220, 56 N. E. 320; Broholm v. Anderson, 178 Ill. App. 623.

So an attorney is liable where he fraudulently gives advice to the injury of his client. See Leoff v. Lawton, 97 N. Y. 478. An attorney is liable for damages to his clients from his advice to one of them to testify falsely in a matter committed to the attorney's legal guidance. Flynn v. Judge, 149 App. Div. 278, 133 N. Y. S. 794, wherein the court said: "The learned [trial] court stated its view 'that to allow the perjurer himself to sue the man who advised him to commit perjury, to recover damages, would be a most monstrous proposition.' Without quarrel with the soundness of the general proposition, and without considering a germane limitation in cases of fiduciary relation, it seems to us that the learned court lost view of the purpose and bearing of the testimony. The plaintiffs were not seeking to recover damages for a perjury of one of their number, from the inciter of the perjury. They sought to recover what they had been compelled to pay on account of a breach of defendant's obligation as an attorney and counselor at law; and their contention was that as an attorney he advised one of their number to testify falsely in a matter committed to his legal guidance. This was bad or improper advice, in violation of the obligation of the defendant under his retainer, and damage resulting therefrom might, we think, be actionable."

Liability cannot be predicated on the mere expression of an opinion as to matters of fact, as, for instance, the probability of realizing a certain sum under a judicial sale. Reumping v. Wharton, 56 Neb. 536, 76 N. W. 1076, wherein the court said: "The testimony of Mr. Reumping rather tended to show a misapprehension of conditions of fact than of law on the part of Messrs. Wharton & Baird. In effect, plaintiff testified that upon the entry of the decree in the district court these gentlemen said to him it would be of no advantage to him for an appeal to be taken in his behalf, because the property would sell for sufficient to pay plaintiff's claim though it stood in the fourth class. This conjecture was not one which involved the exercise of legal knowledge; indeed, it is quite likely that in the ratio in which attorneys at law qualify themselves to judge of the value of real property they may disqualify themselves for the proper performance of their professional duties. Even if plaintiff in this case relied upon the knowledge of the value of real property possessed by his counsel, any mistaken estimate in that respect would not subject such counsel to liability for damages."

A failure to advise his client on subjects concerning which his opinion is not sought, and of which he is unaware does not render an attorney liable. In re Fuller, 4 Kulp (Pa.) 479. In that case it was said: "The charge of negligence against the attorney in not advising the assignee to keep the trust funds separate was properly dismissed by the auditor. His advice was not asked upon the subject, and he did not know that they were being used by the assignee in his business."

2. INVESTMENTS OR SECURITIES.

An attorney who agrees to invest funds for his client must use reasonable care, diligence, and skill in seeing that the investments are safely and prudently made, and that the client is amply secured, and he is responsible for any loss occasioned by his failure so to do. Langdon v. Godfrey, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 445; Middleton v. Pollock, 4 Ch. D. (Eng.) 49, 46 L. J. Ch. 39; Birt v. Burt, 36 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 943; Page v. Trutch, 5 Am. L. Rec. 155, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,668; Watson v. Calvert Bldg. etc. Assoc. 91 Md. 25, 45 Atl. 879; Kissam v. Squires, 102 App. Div. 536, 92 N. Y. S. 873; Lawall v. Groman, 180 Pa. St. 532, 37 Atl. 98, 57 Am. St. Rep. 662; Rogers v. Priest, 74 Wis. 538, 43 N. W. 510.

In loaning money to another for his client, the attorney should act only for one of the parties, and if he assumes to act for both, although he may be paid by one only, he is responsible for a failure to do for each what his duty as attorney requires him to do. Donaldson v. Haldane, 7 Cl. & F. (Eng.) 762; Taylor v. Blacklow, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 235, 32 E. C. L. 100, 3 Scott 614; Cory v. Wirth, 21 Kan. 10; Ryan v. Long, 35 Minn. 394, 29 N. W. 51; Arnold v. Robertson, 3 Daly (N. Y.) 298. In Gott v. Brigham, 41 Mich. 227, 2 N. W. 5, it appeared that an attorney engaged to lend money for a client, lent it, and took a note for the amount made to himself, which he indorsed and delivered to her. It was held that she could not recover against him under a declaration alleging that he had engaged to advise her as to all proper actions necessary for her to take for her security, and complaining that he did not in fact advise her that she must protest the note at maturity in order to charge the indorser. So in Lawall v. Groman, 180 Pa. St. 532, 37 Atl. 98, 57 Am. St. Rep. 662, it was held that an attorney employed by the borrower is liable to the lender for negligence if he assumes to act for him. The court said: "In the present case it is undeniable that the defendant was acting for Roberts the borrower, from whom he received his compensation, and to whom alone, upon the manifest understanding of all parties he was to look for it. But that fact does not of itself prevent the relation of attorney and client between plaintiff and defendant, if such was the mutual understanding. There was no evidence of custom in that respect, and the court below might not be able to say as matter of law, certainly we cannot, that such was in fact the custom. But outside of the existence of any general rule there was evidence from which the jury might have inferred that such was the understanding of these parties in this particular case. The defendant unquestionably acted to some extent for and in behalf of the plaintiff. After the money was paid over he kept the mortgage which was then the property of plaintiff, and he put it on record. In so doing he was clearly acting for plaintiff, and if he had negligently delayed recording until a subsequent judgment or other incumbrance slipped in ahead of it, there can be no question that he would have been liable for the negligent performance even of a duty voluntarily assumed. But there was evidence that he did more for plaintiff than put the mortgage on record. Lawall testified that he told defendant 'to search the title and the records in reference to liens' and that 'he said he would,' and more to the same effect. The presumption is that this was done in behalf of plaintiff. To Roberts, the borrower, the priority of other incumbranches was of no concern with regard to this loan, except as bearing on plaintiff's willingness to advance the money, but to plaintiff it was a material fact as part of the inducement or consideration for risking the investment. We are of opinion therefore that there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury on the existence of the relation of attorney and client in the case. But the nonsuit was also erroneous for another reason. Independent of the relation of attorney and client, there was evidence, already noticed, that defendant undertook certain duties for the plaintiff. The learned judge rightly says that the collusion or fraud could not be found on the evidence in the case, but this does not exclude liability arising from negligence. The principle settled in Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith's Lead. Cases, that one who undertakes to do, even without reward, is responsible for misfeasance, though not for nonfeasance, has been generally adopted. If, therefore, defendant, knowing that plaintiff was relying on him in his professional capacity to see that her mortgage was the first lien, although Roberts was to pay the fees, undertook to perform that duty, he was bound to do it with ordinary and reasonable skill and care in his profession, and would be liable for negligence in that respect."

But an attorney who has not assumed personally to invest his client's money, and who is called on only to lend his professional aid for the purpose of carrying his client's proposed venture into effect, by investigating the title to the property or other security constituting the subject-matter of the proposed investment, and the preparation of the necessary legal documents, assumes no responsibility for loss not occasioned by any negligence on his part. Thus he will not be liable because of the insufficiency of the security. Hayne v. Rhodes, 8 Q. B. 342, 55 E. C. L. 342, 10 Jur. 71; Cohn v. Heusner, 9 Misc. 482, 30 N. Y. S. 244. The mere giving of money to a solicitor for the purpose of general investment does not of itself create the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, and so make the solicitor liable as trustee for a deficiency in the security. Mare v. Lewis, 4 Ir. Eq. (Eng.) 219. In Scholes v. Brook, 64 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 674, affirming 63 L. T. N. S. 837, a firm of valuers, employed on the recommendation of plaintiff's solicitor to value certain property, were held to be liable for their negligence; but the solicitor was held not to be liable, although he pointed out to the valuers certain suspicious facts, but failed to communicate them to his client. In Cohn v. Heusner, 9 Misc. 482, 30 N. Y. S. 244, the court said: "A solicitor or attorney at law is under no duty to dissuade his client from entering upon a contemplated business venture. Having concern for the latter's prosperity, the former may tender his advice in that regard, but if he fails so to do he is not chargeable with neglect. The special skill which the solicitor or attorney engages himself to exert in his client's behalf is such as is peculiar to his profession, but the relation of solicitor or attorney and client imposes upon the former no duty as to an exercise of sagacity in business ventures superior to that of the latter. An attorney at law or solicitor, therefore, who has not assumed personally to invest his client's money, and who is called upon only to lend his professional aid for the purpose of carrying his client's proposed venture into effect, by investigation of the title to the property or security constituting the subject-matter of the proposed investment, and the preparation of the necessary legal documents, assumes no responsibility for loss which may come from the client's ill venture."

If, however, an attorney is employed for the purpose of passing on the sufficiency of security, he is liable for negligence or fraud in so doing. Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259, 11 E. C. L. 219.

3. PREPARING, RECORDING OR KEEPING WRITTEN INSTRUMENT.

An attorney employed to prepare a written instrument is responsible for any loss sustained by his client as the result of his negligence in so doing. Parker v. Rolls, 14 C. B. 691, 78 E. C. L. 691; In re Duntley, 227 Fed. 381, 142 C. C. A. 77; Stein v. Kremer, 112 N. Y. S. 1087.

In Stannard v. Ullithorne, 10 Bing. 491, 25 E. C. L. 212, 4 Moo. & S. 359, Tindal, C. J., said: "It may be assumed as a general principle that an attorney, by reason of the emolument he derives from the business in which he is employed, undertakes, and is bound to take care, that his client does not enter into any covenant or stipulation that may expose him to a greater degree of responsibility than is ordinarily attached to the business in hand, or, at all events, that he does not do so till the consequences have been explained to him." In Stein v. Kremer, 112 N. Y. S. 1087, it was said: "As alleged and as testified, the plaintiff having agreed with intending employers for a year, he and they jointly employed the defendants, counselors at law, to draw a contract for his employment for that period, and the contract, by one of them drawn and which the plaintiff as to his part paid for on an advice signed, was, as ruled by this court on a former appeal, a contract determinable at will. Upon such allegations, testimony, and determination, the complaint might not be, as it was, dismissed when the plaintiff rested." In Tonn v. Pier, 89 N. J. Eq. 422, 89 Atl. 510, it appeared that the attorney for a vendee acted for both parties in drawing up the papers and that he failed to protect the rights of the vendor as to security for the deferred payments. The court said: "At the time the agreement was signed the attorney for the defendant undertook to draw for the complainant the mortgage securing the purchase money, and he was to prepare the deed. It does not appear that he ever did in fact draw the mortgage, and, according to his account, the defendant having told him that he was going to pay the amount in cash, he did not, when he went to have the deed executed and delivered, take with him any mortgage, and he had the deed executed and delivered and recorded without securing the complainant in any way for her unpaid purchase money upon the delivery of the deed, or securing for her any evidence that it was still due to protect her against the deed itself. By assuming to draw the mortgage for the complainant, under the agreement, the attorney undertook the duty of taking care of her interest, as well as that of the purchaser, upon the delivery of the deed. . . . There was a clear violation of the duty on his part to protect the interest of this old woman, on taking the title to her property from her, and this whole situation, which existed from the time of receiving the deed up to the time of the alleged payment of the money in February, shows the business advantage that was taken of her, and imposes on the defendant the decided burden of proving, by testimony other than his own, that this money was paid."

Where an attorney agrees to have certain documents recorded, and neglects to do so, he will be responsible for any damage resulting from his negligence in that respect. Stott v. Harrison, 73 Ind. 17; Fenaille v. Coudert, 44 N. J. L. 290; Arnold v. Robertson, 3 Daly 298, appeal dismissed 50 N. Y. 683; Stuart v. Walkup, 114 N. Y. S. 483; Miller v. Wilson, 24 Pa. St. 114; Lynch v. Wilson, 22 U. C. Q. B. 226. In Miller v. Wilson, 24 Pa. St. 114, the court after reciting that the plaintiff had entered into an agreement with one Carson to pay her an annuity, his obligation being secured by a mortgage, said: "The defendant, Miller, was employed and paid to adjust the business agreeably to this arrangement; and the shape it took was assumed under his direction. He drew the papers, consisting of the bond, the mortgage, and a power of attorney to himself to enter satisfaction on the judgments. He took the power of attorney and executed it. He also took the mortgage, promising to have it recorded, and assuring the plaintiff that she would thus be made entirely safe.

He did not record it, but withheld it until the property was encumbered with other liens (in some of which he himself had an interest) to an amount greater than its value. Carson became hopelessly insolvent, and, excepting his worthless bond, the plaintiff has no security for her claim. The defendant's counsel think that he ought not to pay for the great injury which his neglect has occasioned. The court of common pleas and the jury thought otherwise, and we are of the same mind. The argument is, that the plaintiff has not as yet suffered any actual loss from the defendant's violation of duty; and that she can recover from Miller only in case Carson makes default; because, the mortgage being but a security for the bond, there is nothing due on the former until the condition of the latter is broken. But we hold it for clear law, that Miller did not merely substitute his personal responsibility in place of the mortgage; that he did not become Carson's surety in the bond; but that he subjected himself to an immediate action, in which the plaintiff may recover compensation for all she has lost, and all she is likely to lose, through his misconduct."

But the mere fact that an attorney is employed to prepare papers which are required to be recorded does not make it the attorney's duty to have them recorded. There must be a special undertaking for this purpose, or the original employment must be broad enough to include it. Fenaille v. Coudert, 44 N. J. L. 286, wherein the court said: "Attorneys are doubtless liable for negligent omissions to file pleadings and to take the regular steps necessary in the progress of suits in which they have been retained and in which they act for their client. But the filing of such a contract as that in question in this case is not a necessary concomitant of its existence or of its binding force. Whether it should be filed or not must depend upon circumstances. The owner may be thoroughly satisfied of the probity or responsibility of the builder. In such case he may consider it judicious not to file such a contract. By the evidence in this case it would seem that some reasons were supposed to exist why it was not judicious to file this contract. But at all events, the filing of such a contract is not necessary, and whether it should be filed or not is a question not to be determined by the attorney employed to draw it. I have not been able to find any case imposing upon attorneys the duty of filing, recording or registering papers which they have drawn, by reason merely of their employment to draw them. When employed to securely invest money of a client, they are doubtless liable for failing to register or record the securities or to give notice of the lien acquired when necessary for the security of the investment. Watts v. Porter, 3 El. & Bl. 743, 77 E. C. L. 743. Weeks on Attorneys, § 311, and cases cited. They have been held liable, as any other person might be, on express contracts to record papers drawn by them. Miller v. Wilson, 24 Pa. St. 114. But when the record or registration or notice is not necessary to effectuate the purpose of their employment, I find no case holding them liable for failure."

Where a client intrusts important papers to his attorney, the latter should not only return them when the relation of attorney and client ceases, but should not wilfully do anything by which another can gain information concerning the papers; and the fact that the client, without cause, discharges the attorney without paying him and employs another, does not alter the case, though it may give the attorney a right to retain the papers by virtue of his lien. In re Hahn, 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 423. See also In re Wheateroft, 6 Ch. D. (Eng.) 97, 26 W. R. 69, 46 L. J. Ch. 669; In re Thomson, 20 Beav. (Eng.) 545; Howard v. Gunn, 32 Beav. (Eng.) 462, 1 Jur. N. S. 718; Robertson v. Clocke, 18 App. Div. 363, 46 N. Y. S. 87. A person is not entitled to the possession of notes placed in the hands of an attorney for collection where an interest in the notes is held by others, and he does not show their consent to such possession, nor offer to indemnify them. Bougher v. Scobey, 23 Ind. 583. The minutes of testimony taken by a counsel on the trial of an action in which he is retained belong to himself, and not to his client. Anonymous, 31 Me. 590.

But an attorney whose office is broken open is not liable for the loss of papers stolen therefrom, where there is no negligence on his part. Hill v. Barney, 18 N. H. 607.

4. LITIGATION.

a. Generally.

The general rule is that an attorney who undertakes to conduct litigation impliedly contracts to exercise due care, skill and knowledge of the law in the transaction of his client's business, and his negligence in that regard is a breach of his contract. Castner v. Gray, 54 Colo. 551, 131 Pac. 404; Walpole v. Carlisle, 32 Ind. 415; Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144, 19 N. E. 739; Rooker v. Bruce, 45 Ind. App. 57, 90 N. E. 86; Burnette v. Elliott, 72 Kan. 624, 84 Pac. 374; Breedlove v. Turner, 9 Mart. O. S. (La.) 353; Whitney v. Abbott, 191 Mass. 59, 77 N. E. 524; Childs v. Comstock, 60 App. Div. 160, 74 N. Y. S. 643. To subject an attorney to liability a failure to exercise reasonable care and skill must be shown. Boynton v. Brown, 103 Ark. 513, 145 S. W. 242; Lane v. Storke, 10 Cal. App. 347, 101 Pac. 937; National Hollow Brake Beam Co. v. Bakewell, 224 Mo. 203, 123 S. W. 561; Gleason v. Clark, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 57; Jaquiss v. Hagner, 72 N. Y. 605; Kissam v. Bremerman, 44 App. Div. 588, 61 N. Y. S. 75; Avery v. Jacob, 59 Super. Ct. 585 mem. 15 N. Y. S. 564; Youngman v. Miller, 98 Pa. St. 196; Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 203. But where the client shows negligence the law casts on the attorney the burden of showing an adequate excuse. Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144, 19 N. E. 739.

An attorney is prima facie liable in damages to his client for a loss occasioned by his neglect to bring suit within the time limited by statute. Drury v. Butler, 171 Mass. 171, 50 N. E. 527; Kreatz v. McDonald, 123 Minn. 353, 143 N. W. 975; Moore v. Juvenal, 92 Pa. St. 484; Fox v. Jones, 4 Willson Civ. Cas. Ct. App. (Tex.) § 29, 14 S. W. 1007. In King v. Fourchy, 47 La. Ann. 354, 16 So. 814, the court said: "The testimony in the record convinces us of the following facts in this case: That the defendant was employed by the plaintiff to institute a suit for slander against one Salvadore Dumiglia; that a sum of thirty-five dollars was deposited with plaintiff for costs. That the defendant filed the petition in the suit, and deposited the necessary sum to cover the costs for the filing of this petition; that he neglected to deposit the amount for service of citation, and through his neglect or inattention the demand of plaintiff against the defendant in the suit for slander became prescribed; that another attorney was employed to prosecute the suit, and the defendant on the trial pleaded the prescription of one year, and the plaintiff's demand was dismissed; that the receipt offered in evidence by the defendant in this suit on the return of the money deposited by the plaintiff had no reference to nor did it include the demand of the plaintiff against this defendant for damages for the neglect to deposit costs for the service of citation in the demand against the defendant in the action for slander; that the plaintiff in the slander suit had a good cause of action, and that had she obtained her judgment for a reasonable amount, the defendant had sufficient property to respond to the judgment. . . . The defendant is undoubtedly, on the facts stated, responsible for the prescription of the demand, and is therefore responsible in damages." In Zeitlin v. Morrison, 167 App. Div. 220, 152 N. Y. S. 1000, wherein it appeared that delay in beginning suit was due to the act of the client, the court said: "It is undisputed that defendants prepared for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for plaintiff, who, being eighteen or nineteen years of age, would have to sign the petition for such appointment. The defendant Schiff testified that he delivered these papers to the plaintiff's brother for the purpose of having him obtain her signature, and that they were never returned. While the brother denied receiving any such instructions, or that he took the petition away, he did not deny Schiff informed him of the necessity of his sister's signing it as a preliminary to bringing the action. Until the petition had been signed an action could not be started. The conduct of the plaintiff and her brother, after it is claimed defendants were retained, indicates with a reasonable degree of clearness they knew an action had not been started. The plaintiff at the time of the accident was eighteen or nineteen years of age. After defendants were consulted, she gave her claim no further attention for several years. Nor did the brother make any further inquiry for upwards of three years."

An attorney is liable for neglecting to notify his client of the giving of insufficient security by the adverse party. McWilliams v. Hopkins, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 382.

In Manufacturers' Paper Co. v. Lindblom, 80 Ill. App. 267, it was said as to the duty of an attorney who has been served with notice of a motion in a case which is in his hands: "When they were served with notice on Friday or Saturday before that appellants' counsel would on Monday, June 11, 1894, at 10 A. M., or as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard, move that the demurrers be overruled, making no objection to such notice at the time and failing to make any objection known to the court, it became their imperative duty, in the interest of their clients, to attend before the court in obedience to the notice, and see to it that the motion was not heard without being placed upon the calendar of contested motions, or that they were heard and had knowledge of the disposition made of it by the court."

An attorney employed to defend a suit is liable in damages for his failure or neglect so to do. Burnette v. Elliott, 72 Kan. 624, 84 Pac. 374; Grayson v. Wilkinson, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 268. See also Newman v. Schueck, 58 Ill. App. 328. In Hill v. Finney, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 616, it appeared that one A, having been sued for a divorce by his wife, employed an attorney to defend him, telling him he had a good defense, and would consent to a compromise verdict provided no evidence should be taken in the case. The attorney advised him to consent to the compromise, and had him stay away from the trial; as a consequence, the wife's evidence was introduced and was not contradicted, though A had evidence to overthrow it. A then sued his attorney, alleging that such evidence, going uncontradicted, had damaged him. It was held that if he was induced not to defend, in consideration of the fact that no evidence would be adduced against him, the attorney was liable as for gross negligence. In Grayson v. Wilkinson, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 268, it was said: "The case of Godefroy v. Jay, 7 Bing. 413, 20 E. C. L. 183, settles this principle; that if an attorney is retained, and suffers a judgment to go by default, he is liable for damages, and it is for him to show that the party has suffered no actual damage. It is not for the plaintiff to show that he had a good defense; and the case cited from 2 Chit. R. 311 is to the same effect. The right of action is tested by the contract. If an attorney undertakes to defend a suit, he must do so, and if he does not the plaintiff will be entitled to damages."

To make an attorney liable for a failure to put in a defense it must appear of course that his client informed him as to the nature of his defense and that it was a meritorious one. Grayson v. Wilkinson, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 268; Benton v. Craig, 2 Mo. 198. Where a client failed to appear when her case was called and did not furnish her counsel with a list of witnesses, and failed to appear for trial, it was held that her counsel was not warranted in abandoning her defense without having previously given her timely notice of his intention so to do. Brown v. Green, 132 La. 1090, 62 So. 154. An attorney is also liable for any loss occasioned by confessing judgment against his client without authority. Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 296, 5 Am. Dec. 237; Cyphert v. McClune, 22 Pa. St. 195; Jones v. Williamson, 5 Cold. (Tenn.) 371. And see Thompson v. Pershing, 86 Ind. 303. As to an attorney's authority to confess or consent to the entry of judgment, see the note to Glade Spring Bank v. McEwen, Ann. Cas. 1914C 542.

b. Pleading.

It is the duty of an attorney to prepare, file, and cause to be served when necessary all such pleadings as are essential properly to present his client's cause for the consideration of the court; and he renders himself liable for any loss or injury which his client sustains in consequence of his failure so to do. Hunter v. Caldwell, 10 Q. B. 69, 59 E. C. L. 69, 11 Jur. 770, affirmed 12 Jur. 265; Kenen v. Hill, 38 N. Bruns. 342; Walker v. Goodman, 21 Ala. 647; Gambert v. Hart, 44 Cal. 542; Burnette v. Elliott, 72 Kan. 624, 84 Pac. 374; Thompson v. Lobdell, 7 Rob. (La.) 369; Varnum v. Martin, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 440; McWilliams v. Hopkins,

4 Rawle (Pa.) 382. In Varnum v. Martin, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 440, it appeared that an attorney, being employed to sue on a claim, made a writ, using a blank form in which the common counts in indebitatus assumpsit were printed with blank spaces for sums, names, dates, etc. "There were no other counts. The writ directed the officer to attach property to the value of 1200 dollars, and the ad damnum was laid at the same sum, but the defendant inserted a declaration for 12 dollars only instead of 1200. . . . The defendant proved that formerly in the blank forms of writs, the word hundred was printed. The plaintiffs proved in answer that for a year or more previous to the making of the writ in question, the blank forms had omitted the word hundred: and that the blank forms used by the defendant for the June term previous were of the new kind; and that at the time when he made the writ in question, he made another writ against Bissell in favor of two of the plaintiffs, in which he wrote the word hundred, the blank forms used in both cases being of the same kind." The court said in sustaining a recovery against the attorney: "In a case like this, where care was required, it was the duty of the attorney to read over the writ, to see that it was correct. And the defendant cannot allege in excuse, the change which had taken place in the blank forms, for the later forms had been in use for a year or longer, and on the same day that the writ in question was made, he used one of these forms and inserted the word hundred."

But an attorney does not guarantee the sufficiency of every pleading prepared by him or under his directions. He is responsible to his client only for those mistakes which indicate a lack on his part of the attainments and diligence commonly possessed and exercised by legal practitioners of ordinary skill and capacity. Rapuzzi v. Stetson, 160 App. Div. 150, 145 N. Y. S. 455, wherein it was said: "As to the liability of an attorney, he is not held to the rule of infallibility, but is responsible to his client only for those mistakes as a pleader which indicate a lack on his part of the attainments and diligence commonly possessed and exercised by legal practitioners. Courts often differ as to the sufficiency of a pleading without subjecting the judges to the reproach of ignorance or incompetency on account of conflicting views. . . . The question as to whether pleading the payment of the transfer tax was a condition precedent and hence required to be alleged in the complaint, or was a condition subsequent and hence required to be set up in the answer in order to be available as a defense, was decided by the court of appeals by a vote of four to three; Judge Vann writing the dissenting opinion in which Judges Cullen and Collin concurred. Prior to the decisions in Bean v. Flint, no court seems to have passed upon that question. It is clear, in view of this division of opinion in the court of appeals and of the facts before referred to, that the defendants cannot be held to any liability by reason of having believed as the testimony shows, and acted upon the belief, that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege and prove the payment of the transfer tax, nor because of not having applied for permission to amend the answer by pleading the nonpayment of such tax." So in Kissam v. Bremerman, 44 App. Div. 588, 61 N. Y. S. 75, it was held that the mere fact that a complaint proved to be demurrable did not show that the attorney who prepared it was incompetent or negligent. The court said: "Nor does the allegation that the complaint in the Carter case showed no cause of action necessarily import any negligence on the part of the attorney who drew it. An attorney does not guarantee the sufficiency of every pleading prepared by him or under his direction, but he is responsible to his client only for those mistakes as a pleader which indicate a lack on his part of the attainments and diligence commonly possessed and exercised by legal practitioners of ordinary skill and capacity. See Von Wallhoffen v. Newcombe, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 236; 2 Shear. & R. Neg. (4th ed.) sec. 559. The mere fact that a complaint turns out to be demurrable does not show that the attorney who prepared it was incompetent or negligent. If he sets out the facts of the plaintiff's case fully and in proper form, and the question whether they constitute a cause of action or not is fairly debatable, and after being so advised his client desires to obtain the decision of the court thereon, the attorney is justified in proceeding with the suit. Courts often differ as to the sufficiency of a pleading, without subjecting the judges to the reproach of ignorance or incompetency on account of their conflicting views."

An attorney should not be held liable for defective pleadings prepared and filed by other counsel. Lowry v. Guilford, 5 C. & P. 234, 24 E. C. L. 295; Fray v. Foster, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 681. See also Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 203.

An attorney cannot be held liable for a failure to plead the statute of limitations where the pleading is filed under an order of court requiring an answer to the merits. Thompson v. Dickinson, 159 Mass. 210, 34 N. E. 262.

c. Attachment.

A proceeding by attachment being auxiliary to the main action, so far as the services of an attorney are required in that proceeding they fall within the general employment in the action. Foulks v. Falls, 91 Ind. 315.

An attorney who releases an attachment without the consent of his client is liable for the damage caused thereby. Walker v. Goodman, 21 Ala. 647, wherein the court said: "The allegation is, that defendants having been retained as attorneys to prosecute an attachment suit, for want of care and skill 'dismissed the levy of the attachment,' and 'released and relinquished all liens which had accrued by reason of such levy,' by which plaintiff 'lost her demand and the means of recovering the same.' This count undoubtedly presents a substantial cause of action against an attorney for negligence. The degree of negligence necessary to charge him is a question of fact for the jury."

It has been held that an attorney, charged with the collection of a demand, having procured an attachment to be made of the debtor's property, which was replevied from the possession of the officer making the attachment, was bound to act as attorney in the defense of the replevin suit, and was responsible for his negligence therein. Smallwood v. Norton, 20 Me. 83, 37 Am. Dec. 39, wherein it was said: "The defendants were engaged as attorneys to prosecute and collect the plaintiff's debt. They were under legal obligation to discharge this duty with competent skill and fidelity. The object of the suit, instituted by them for the plaintiff, was to obtain judgment, and as the fruits of it, satisfaction of the execution, which issued. They had caused the debtor's property to be attached; and it was their duty, by all legal means, to make that attachment available. They became professionally charged with all legal ancillary proceedings necessary to make the attachment effectual."

The mere employment of an attorney to collect a claim imposes no duty on him to execute an affidavit and bond in attachment for his client. Foulks v. Falls, 91 Ind. 315. In that case it was said: "It is not the duty of attorneys to make affidavits in attachment proceedings. They sometimes do so, but the propriety of such course has always been doubted by the profession, and in some instances the right has been questioned. Such a practice should be discouraged rather than imposed as a duty. See Abbott v. Zeigler, 9 Ind. 511. It clearly would be unreasonable to hold that under a general employment, such as the contract in this case makes, it is the duty of the attorney to furnish a bond and incur the personal liability that might result therefrom. The propriety of lawyers signing bonds for their clients has always been questioned, and many courts have adopted rules absolutely prohibiting it. See Ohio, etc. R. Co. v. Hardy, 64 Ind. 454. The employment and contract imposed no duty upon appellant to make and execute such affidavit and bond; nor would positive instructions from appellee requiring such services have imposed such duty. The undertaking of the attorney is to perform such services as properly belong to the profession; such as the client, for want of learning and skill, cannot himself perform; but it does not require him to assume the burdens and risks of both attorney and client."

d. Trial.

It is the duty of an attorney who has been retained to conduct the trial of a cause for either party, to be prepared for that purpose when the trial is called. Mercer v. King, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 490; Reece v. Rigby, 4 B. & Ald. 202, 6 E. C. L. 451. See also Hatch v. Lewis, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 467, 7 H. & N. 367, 7 Jur. N. S. 1085.

Under the English practice, an attorney prepares for trial, and turns it over to an advocate or counsel to conduct the trial. Where an attorney fails to hand over his briefs to counsel in time, in consequence of which the latter is unprepared and the client suffers a nonsuit, the court will grant a new trial, but will compel the attorney to pay all the costs made necessary by such proceeding. De Rouffigny v. Peale, 3 Taunt. 484; Townley v. Jones, 8 C. B. N. S. 289, 98 E. C. L. 289; Hawkins v. Harwood, 4 Exch. 503, 7 Dawl. & L. 181.

The attorney is required to be in attendance and personally to supervise every step of the proceeding. Holy v. Built, 3 B. & Ad. 350, 23 E. C. L. 91. See also Mordecai v. Solomon, Say. 172; Cresswell v. Bryon, 14 Ves. Jr. 272. But where two or more attorneys are engaged, and the contract does not require all of them to be present at the trial and participate therein, they may agree, on consultation, that some of their number need not attend. Phillips v. Edsall, 127 Ill. 535, 20 N. E. 801. See also Rust v. Larue, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 416, 14 Am. Dec. 172; Eggleson v. Boardman, 37 Mich. 19. In Phillips v. Edsall, supra, the court said: "Appellant was entitled, under the contract, to the services of all three of the attorneys in each one of the suits mentioned therein. But, it will be noted, the contract was to act as his attorneys and counsel, and do all things deemed necessary to faithfully represent and defend his interests in said cases, according to their best judgment and ability. The spirit of the contract did not require that all three of the attorneys should be present in court when each and every step was taken in each and every one of the six cases, unless in their best judgment such presence was necessary or advisable. The conduct of all the parties to the contract in regard to the trial and proceedings, in this and the other suits, clearly indicates it was understood by them as is above suggested. It appears that all three of the attorneys acted together in the case in question, and that appellees, after consultation with Mr. Hawley in regard to the case, attended to the trial, and that no complaint was made, at the time, that they did not all three participate therein."

The trial must be conducted with that reasonable degree of care, skill, diligence and learning which is to be expected from the average lawyer, and, failing in this respect, the attorney must answer in damages to the extent of his client's loss. Reece v. Righy, 4 B. & Ald. 202, 6 E. C. L. 451; Swannell v. Ellis, 1 Bing. 347, 8 E. C. L. 542, 8 Moo. C. Pl. 340; Godefroy v. Jay, 7 Bing. 413, 20 E. C. L. 183; Drais v. Hogan, 50 Cal. 121; Skillen v. Wallace, 36 Ind. 319; Grayson v. Wilkinson, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 268. And see the reported case. In Skillen v. Wallace, supra, it was said: "The substance of the complaint was, that the plaintiff was the owner of a valuable piece of ground, describing it, in the city of Indianapolis; that one Carlisle was wrongfully in possession of it; that he employed Walpole, who was an attorney at law, to bring and prosecute a suit for the recovery of possession, and damages for its detention. Walpole brought and prosecuted the suit; that the jury in that suit brought in a verdict for the plaintiff for the whole ground, which was of great value; that when the verdict was brought in by the jury, Walpole took and altered it so as to cover a very small and much less, and a totally valueless, piece of ground, and asked the jury to find the verdict thus altered, which they did; that this was carelessness, negligence, and unskilfulness on the part of Walpole, by which the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and for which sum he claims judgment. A demurrer, for want of sufficient facts, was sustained, and exception taken, and the correctness of this ruling is the only question before us in this case. It is not pretended that an attorney is not liable in damages for his negligence, carelessness, or unskilfulness in his profession, by which his client is injured, and it would be supererogation to cite authorities on this point. But it is contended that the verdict was the jury's and not Walpole's; that all that was done was in the presence and with the sanction of the court and jury, and that, therefore, Walpole cannot be liable, however much his action may have injured his client. We do not concur in this view. If a plaintiff is entitled to recover one thousand dollars, and a jury brings in a verdict for that sum, and the plaintiff's attorney asks the jury to reduce or alter the verdict to five hundred dollars and they do so, can it be contended that for this act he would not be liable to his client? We cannot see that there is any legal difference in the case before us and the one supposed."

It has been held that an attorney is not necessarily negligent in permitting an incompetent witness to testify. Garsed v. Boyd, 12 W. N. C. (Pa.) 16. See also Breedlove v. Turner, 9 Mart. O. S. (La.) 354. Or in failing to take an exception to an erroneous ruling. Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 227, wherein it was said: "There seems to have been no want of ability, learning, or care, in the argument by defendant's counsel. The argument, however, did not prevail; and the court charged the jury, that the testimony was sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations. The counsel, notwithstanding the decision of the court, adhered to his opinion, but omitted to take a bill of exceptions. Why he did not is not disclosed. It is manifest it was not because he was ignorant of the law; for he had twice asserted, and maintained by argument, the true doctrine of the law as we understand it. It may have been the result of negligence; or because deferring somewhat to the opinion of the presiding judge; and made by his failure in the court below distrustful of the maintenance of his views in the appellate court, his judgment dictated the expediency of a forbearance to except. We are not to presume negligence, when the facts of the case may as well consist with some other hypothesis. Mardis v. Shackleford, 4 Ala. 493. We cannot say that there was negligence. There was manifestly no ignorance of law. It is a case in which one, attentive to his duties and understanding the law, has committed an error of judgment, in determining whether he should yield to or revise a decision of the court. The degree of confidence which one has in his own opinion, and the amount of respect which he has for that of the presiding judge, are all elements influencing the decision of such a question. The ruling of the court involved not merely a knowledge of the law, but the ascertainment of the meaning of the testimony. The judge doubtless understood the law correctly, and only erred in the conclusion that the testimony established with requisite clearness a willingness and liability to pay the debts. While we think the testimony was not sufficient, it is undeniable, that the question is not so clear that it might not differently strike the minds of able lawyers. When a lawyer yields to the opinion of the presiding judge, in reference to such a question, and forbears to take an exception, he cannot be convicted of a want of professional skill, professional knowledge, or professional diligence." In Gabbert v. Evans, 184 Mo. App. 283, 166 S. W. 635, it was said that whether it is better to present evidence or to submit the case on the proof offered by the adverse party is a delicate question of judgment and that an attorney will not ordinarily be held liable for an error in deciding it.

e. Entry and Protection of Judgment.

It is the duty of an attorney to take all such steps as may be necessary for the due entry and enrolment of a judgment to which his client is entitled; and his neglect of that duty will render him liable for any loss sustained by the client. Brown v. Bulkley, 14 N. J. Eq. 451; Griggs v. Drake, 21 N. J. L. 169. See also Farrand v. Land, etc. Imp. Co. 86 Fed. 393, 58 U. S. App. 559, 30 C. C. A. 128. In Griggs v. Drake, supra, it was said: "The record is undoubtedly drawn in a very inartificial manner, and is very improperly encumbered with copies of the original entries in the book of minutes. The case before us is so striking an instance of the want of skill of many of those intrusted with the duty of enrolling or recording the judgments of our courts as to suggest the inquiry whether the attorney of the plaintiff fully performs his duty to his client, who, when skill is required, does not see to it that the judgment is properly made up. Certainly, a client whose judgment should be reversed for error in entering the same on the record, would have just cause of complaint against his attorney."

So, an attorney is bound to obtain judgment before the debtor's property is encumbered, where by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence he can do so. Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144, 19 N. E. 739.

It has been held that, in the absence of a special agreement, an attorney's duty does not extend to the preservation of judgments from expiration under the statute of limitations. McKowen v. Kernan, 35 La. Ann. 331; Cook v. Foster (Pa.) 6 Atl. 150. In the case first cited it was said: "There is, however, another and last defense urged against the demand made in this suit, which, in our opinion, should and must prevail, and that is, that there was no special contract or agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, that he, defendant, should have the judicial mortgage reinscribed, and there was no obligation or duty resulting from his employment as attorney in the suit to do so. The evidence satisfies us that there was no such special engagement about the reinscription of the judgment, and not even a request from the plaintiff to the defendant to do so. From his employment in the suit mentioned, it was obligatory on the defendant to prosecute the same to the best of his ability, and there is no complaint that he did not do so. The reinscription of the mortgage formed no part of the demand in the suit, but was an act outside of it, to be performed by the recorder upon a simple request, requiring no professional knowledge or skill to make it. The plaintiff lived in the parish; as tutor of the minor claiming the judgment he knew or should have known the precise situation of affairs, and was bound to do and perform whatever was necessary, with respect to this judgment, to protect the rights of his wards therein. Defendant was under no obligation to attend to the reinscribing for him in the absence of any request to do so; it was no part of the attorney's duty." So in Cook v. Foster, supra, the court said: "The court's affirmance of the defendant's fourth point, which reads as follows: 'The mere entry of a judgment by an attorney at law, without more, imposes on him no liability to notify his client, or revive the judgment when the lien is about to expire,' was undoubtedly proper. In such case an attorney is employed for a special purpose,—the confession of the judgment,—and when that is done his duty ends. Non constat that the client desires him to take charge of the judgment after its entry, for the additional responsibility necessarily involves additional fees which the owner of the judgment may not be willing to pay. As well might prothonotaries who have, under the act of assembly, the same power to confess judgments on judgment bills as have attorneys at law be charged with their subsequent care and revival."

An attorney is liable to his client for any loss caused by his unauthorized or negligent allowance of the vacation or opening of a judgment. Clussman v. Merkel, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 402. As to the authority of an attorney to vacate or open a judgment in favor of his client, see the note to Tritsch v. Covington, Ann. Cas. 1916B 722. In Clussman v. Merkel, supra, after holding that an attorney has authority to consent to the opening of a default judgment, the court said: "It would be more discreet for an attorney, before giving such a consent, to confer with his client. If the client knew and could state facts tending to show that by vacating the judgment unconditionally he would be in danger of losing his claim, and that it would be secure if the judgment was to stand as security for such sum as might ultimately be recovered, he might with propriety refuse to consent that the defendant be permitted to answer except upon the terms that the judgment should stand as security. In the case of Merkel v. Adair, by the terms of the consent given, the judgment recovered was to stand as security for any sum that might be recovered in that action. If an attorney waives such a default without consulting or obtaining the consent of his client, and upon the facts then existing and known to the client, and which upon such a consultation it may be justly inferred he would have communicated to the latter, the attorney might expect that the court, according to its customary practice, would impose terms which would make the collection, of whatever sum might be ultimately recovered, reasonably safe; I think he acts at his peril in waiving it, and should be held responsible for any loss directly and naturally resulting from such action on his part."

f. Enforcement of Judgment.

After judgment has been duly entered, an attorney is, in most jurisdictions, impliedly authorized to proceed for the enforcement thereof, and liability may be predicated on his failure to do so. Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 52 Am. Dec. 262; Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316; Crooker v. Hutchinson, 1 Vt. 73. In the case first cited, it was said: "The first writ of execution (being a fi. fa. with an alternate ca. sa. clause) was issued with promptitude, and although there was subsequently a hiatus of near nine months between the return day of this writ of execution and the issuance of the alias, the return of the sheriff on the first, that the defendant 'was not to be found in his county,' was, under the state of the case as to this point, as shown by the testimony, amply sufficient, in our opinion, to exonerate the defendant from gross negligence in this delay. There was also, we think, sufficient legal testimony to authorize the jury to find that, in failing to sue out further process of execution against the defendant, Smith, after the sale of the negro, the defendant in this action, was influenced bona fide by a prudent regard for the interest of his client and to exonerate him as to this conduct from gross negligence. But we are unable to find any testimony in the record going to exonerate him from the duty of taking further steps against Pullen, the security in the forthcoming bond. This bond had been taken by the sheriff of Arkansas county in discharge of his official duty, and a part of this duty in the premises was to take sufficient security. This, of itself, in the absence of testimony to the contrary, would have authorized a prudent man to infer that Pullen was solvent. And although there was no direct evidence that the defendant knew Pullen's place of residence, reasonable diligence would have induced him to make inquiry as to the fact from the sheriff of Arkansas county, who had taken the forthcoming bond, if indeed he was uninformed as to this fact. No such exonerating proof was adduced, nor are there any facts or circumstances proven as to Pullen's pecuniary condition or other collateral facts that authorized a finding that in failing to pursue him with other process the defendant was superinduced bona fide by a prudent regard for the interest of his client. Nor is it shown that, in his failure to proceed further, the defendant was controlled in the performance of his duties by any instructions either express or implied from his client. If the judgment upon the forthcoming bond was void, he might have disregarded it and taken other proceedings; if erroneous and not void, he might have taken steps for its reversal. And although it may be void or erroneous, it will not, by any means, follow that for this reason the defendant was necessarily guilty of gross negligence for want of knowledge and skill. (Godfrey v. Dalton, 6 Bing. 460, 19 E. C. L. 132; Russel v. Palmer, 2 Wils. C. Pl. (Eng.) 325, 6 Munf. (Va.) 557.) But the defendant took no steps at all, and has failed to develop by his testimony any fact or circumstances by way of excuse, and but for those touching the doubtful pecuniary condition of Mrs. Smith, he would not have excused himself for not taking further steps against her."

If the failure of an attorney to collect a judgment is due to negligence it is immaterial that he acts in good faith. Miller v. Prescott, 157 Wis. 264, 146 N. W. 1124.

An attorney is liable to his client for any loss resulting from his negligence in the enforcement of a judgment. Phillips v. Bridge, 11 Mass. 246; Enterline v. Miller, 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 463. In the case last cited it was said: "An attorney must be held to know the return day of process issued by his direction, must keep himself informed of the steps taken by the sheriff in its execution, and must give all instructions necessary to secure his client's interests. It is usual for the attorney, on execution process, to give directions respecting the property which he desires should be sold, especially when this is real estate; and, if he omits this, he should at least ascertain what has been done in the premises by the sheriff and act as the interest of his client requires. He must be held to know that when the return day of a fi. fa. has passed without a levy, the writ is functus officio; that a vend. ex. is issued only for a sale by virtue of a levy made on an antecedent writ; and he must at all times inform himself of the state of the record, and of the sheriff's proceedings, before taking or directing any further step based thereon. . . . The proceedings subsequent to the return day of the fi. fa. were wholly irregular, and not title passed by the sale. They were in disregard of well-settled rules of practice, which every attorney must be expected to understand and observe. An attorney is not, indeed, responsible for a mistake of the sheriff to which he in no way contributes. But when he acquiesces in such a mistake, and directs further proceedings, founded on it, he makes the error his own, and is answerable for the loss to his client arising from such proceedings."

Ordinarily, however, an attorney's duties with respect to the enforcement of judgments are fully performed when he causes proper process for that purpose to be placed in the hands of the officer whose duty it is to execute it, and gives such instructions as are necessary for the guidance of such officer. The attorney need not attend personally to the levy or sale under the process. Williams v. Reed, 3 Mason 405, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,733; Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 52 Am. Dec. 262; Gaines v. Becker, 7 Ill. App. 315. See also Holmes v. Peck, 1 R. I. 242. Nor does the general duty of an attorney require him to search for property which may have been fraudulently disposed of, or to institute new and collateral proceedings with reference to such property. Morgan v. Giddings (Tex.) 1 S. W. 369. So, negligence cannot be predicated on an attorney's failure to levy an execution where it appears that the judgment debtor had no property which would have been subject thereto. Siddall v. Haight, 132 Cal. 320, 64 Pac. 410.

g. Proceedings for Review.

As a general rule, the implied authority of an attorney ends with the entry of a final judgment in the trial court; and, while there are some exceptions to this rule (see note, 16 Ann. Cas. 928), it has been held that he will not be held liable for failure to take proceedings for the review of a cause unless he has been directed, and has agreed, to do so. Hey v. Simon, 93 S. W. 50, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 315, wherein the court said: "The rule is, that if an attorney is employed to bring an action, his authority ends with the rendition of final judgment in the case, and that he has no authority to take an appeal without further employment or direction from his client. Richardson v. Talbot, 2 Bibb. (Ky.) 382. We do not mean to say that a broader authority may not be conferred upon an attorney when he is employed. We only mean that the authority to bring or prosecute an action ends with the termination of the suit. The language of the petition in this case which we have quoted shows no more than that Simon was employed to institute and prosecute the actions against Harding. When the cases were decided in the Harrison circuit court it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to direct his attorney as to what further steps he should take. It is not alleged in his petition that Hey was not present at the trial, or did not know of the judgment, or that he gave any directions to Simon as to taking an appeal; and no facts are shown from which any liability would be imposed upon Simon for not informing him of the necessity for executing a supersedeas bond. It is not alleged that he did not know it was necessary to execute a supersedeas bond, or that he could or would have given the bond if Simon had informed him that it was necessary to do so."

Where he has been retained for this purpose, however, it is the attorney's duty to take all proper steps to bring the cause before the appellate court, and his failure to do so will render him liable for any loss suffered by his client as a consequence thereof. Drais v. Hogan, 50 Cal. 121; Rosebud Min. etc. Co. v. Hughes, 16 Colo. App. 162, 64 Pac. 247; Childs v. Comstock, 69 App. Div. 160, 74 N. Y. S. 643. Where a solicitor is relied on to perfect an appeal, counsel engaged in the same case are not liable. Cornelissen v. Ort, 132 Mich. 294, 93 N. W. 617. In Drais v. Hogan, supra, it was said: "But assuming that the defendant had the management of the cause in the district court—and in view of the implied findings below, we must assume that he did—the grossest mismanagement after all is found in his failure to appeal from the judgment itself. The complaint of Budd and Dudley, upon which the judgment against Lucinda Drais was founded, was radically defective, and wholly insufficient to support that judgment. An appeal from the judgment itself would have brought up the pleadings as being part of the judgment-roll, and must have terminated in a virtual defeat of the action. An inspection of the record in that cause, in view of the uniform decisions of this court, from the case of Rowe v. Kohle, 4 Cal. 285, to the present time, as to the capacity, or rather the want of capacity, of a married woman to bind herself by such a contract as was alleged in that case, is decisive upon this point. In this view it was inexcusable in the defendant to have permitted the time limited by statute for an appeal from the judgment itself to pass away, and so to allow the rights of the defendant in that action to become lost in the abortive attempt to obtain a new trial, when such new trial, even had it been properly obtained, was not necessary for her protection under the circumstances of the case."

In Montrose v. Baggott, 161 App. Div. 494, 146 N. Y. S. 649, it was held that the making of a stipulation which did not as a matter of law have the effect of releasing the sureties on an appeal bond was not negligence, though a trial court erroneously gave the stipulation such an effect.

In Gabbert v. Evans, 184 Mo. App. 283, 166 S. W. 635, it was held that no damage resulted to the client from the negligent failure of an attorney to take an appeal within the time limited by statute where every question involved could be reviewed on a writ of error, which was still available at the time the attorney was superseded by another. The court said: "While a writ of error is denominated a new suit and an appeal is a continuation of the former suit, yet, for all practical purposes, the one is as effective in having errors of the trial court corrected by an appellate court as the other. It is the common practice in the appellate courts of this state when appeals fail for any reason, or even on dismissing same voluntarily, to at once bring the case up by writ of error. The only answer to this suggested by the defendant is that plaintiffs failed to advise her of her right to take the case up on writ of error. The evidence, however, shows that the judgment of the Young case was compromised and settled within three or four months after its rendition. It further appears that defendant, as so often happens, when she lost the case in the trial court, became dissatisfied with her attorneys, the plaintiffs, and straightway consulted and employed a new attorney to advise her in the further conduct of the cause and that he negotiated and arranged the compromise. The defendant practically ceased to communicate with or to ask or take advice from plaintiffs. She had abundant time to sue out a writ of error, and no doubt her new attorney advised her of such right to do so, if she was really advised that a review of the case by an appellate court would avail her anything and desired to pursue that remedy, of which evidence is lacking."

5. COLLECTION OF CLAIMS.

a. In General.

An attorney to whom claims have been intrusted for collection must exercise the same reasonable degree of care, skill and diligence as is required in the performance of other professional duties; and if he neglects to do so, he will be liable to his client to the extent of the loss sustained by reason of his negligence.

In Oldham v. Sparks, 28 Tex. 425, it was said: "Gross neglect by an attorney at law in failing to collect a claim received by him for that purpose would render him liable to his client for the amount of damages consequent upon such negligence. (Cox v. Livingston, 2 Watts & S. 103.) There is nothing in the petition which negatives the existence of such neglect in the present case. On the contrary, the facts that the claim was in the hands of plaintiffs in error several years without any effort being made to collect it, and that it became barred by limitation whilst in their possession, and they have rendered no reasonable excuse therefor, show sufficient negligence on their part to entitle the defendant in error to the judgment she obtained before the justice of the peace." In Cox v. Sullivan, 7 Ga. 144, 50 Am. Dec. 386, the court said: "The court below did not err in charging the jury, that money raised by attorney upon a judgment in his own favor, by extraordinary diligence, ought not to be applied by him to the claim of his client in his hands for collection. The facts were, that the defendant, having a judgment against the debtor of his client, employed an agent at the cost of one-half his debt, to subject property in one of the remote counties of the state, and did subject it. Such a contract he could not make for his client without special authority. He is bound to the highest honor and integrity, to the utmost good faith. As a general rule, he will not be permitted to pursue his own interests when they conflict with those of his client. By assuming the trust to collect, he pledges himself to protect his interest against all others, even his own. Yet, if in the exercise of a diligence beyond the powers and obligations of his trust, he realizes a fund out of the common debtor, we know of no rule of law or equity which would compel him, at the peril of accountability in damages, to pay it to his client. To appropriate money raised as this was, is no violation of professional honor. What facts will constitute professional faith and fulfil the requirements of professional honor, it would be in vain to attempt to ascertain by any general tests. Each case, in this regard, must be determined by its own facts. Clearly, however, it is the interest of the community, and also of a profession distinguished for its liberal views, its lofty honor, and its great social and moral influence, that the liability of its members, upon the score of good faith, should be subject to an exceedingly stringent rule." In Riegi v. Phelps, 4 N. D. 272, 60 N. W. 402, with respect to the duty of an attorney employed to make a collection to disclose to his client the facts relating to a proposed compromise, it was said: "They were under obligations to disclose to her, or to those acting for her, who had employed them, all facts affecting her rights. They were bound to apprise her of the amount which had been collected before securing her assent to accept from them any sum in settlement of the note. To inveigle her into consenting to receive only thirty per cent of the amount collected, by a suppression of the facts, was not only a betrayal of trust, but, under the circumstances, amounted to a positive fraud." As to the matters within the implied scope of an employment to collect, the court said in Stubbs v. Beene, 37 Ala. 627: "It must be conceded, that an attorney at law, who receives a claim for collection, in the absence of proof to the contrary, will be presumed to have received it for collection by suit; and that, by the implied terms of such contract, he is required to give his professional skill and attention to all the ordinary stages of the litigation. See Mardis v. Shackelford, 4 Ala. 493; also, Smedes v. Elmendorf, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 187. So, if any cross litigation be instituted, which bears directly on the further progress of the suit under his control, it is possibly his duty to represent his client in such defensive cross litigation. Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316; Smallwood v. Norton, 20 Me. 87. But those matters which lie outside of the regular line of professional attorneyship, and which partake rather of the character of agencies, rest on a different principle. While an attorney may lawfully perform many of these agencies, he is not, in the absence of an express engagement to do so, bound to perform them. They are not among the implied obligations he incurs, when he assumes the relation of attorney for another."

An attorney who accepts depreciated money is liable to his client for the loss sustained. Botts v. Crenshaw, Chase 224, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,690; West v. Ball, 12 Ala. 340; Van Vacter v. Brewster, 1 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 400; Pidgeon v. Williams, 21 Grat. (Va.) 251. See also Wickliffe v. Davis, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 69; Lord v. Burbank, 18 Me. 178.

An attorney does not guarantee or insure the collection of claims placed in his hands, and if he acts in good faith, to the best of his skill, and with a reasonable degree of care and diligence, he is not responsible for failure to collect. Marsh v. Whitmore, 21 Wall. 178, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 482; Stubbs v. Beene, 37 Ala. 627; Moore v. Winston, 66 Ala. 296; Nisbet v. Lawson, 1 Ga. 275; Bougher v. Scobey, 23 Ind. 583; Nickless v. Pearson, 81 Ind. 427; Nickless v. Pearson, 84 Ind. 602; Hughes v. Boyce, 2 La. Ann. 803; Odlin v. Stetson, 17 Me. 244, 35 Am. Dec. 248; Wilson v. Russ, 20 Me. 421; Wright v. Ligon, Harp. Eq. (S. C.) 166; Read v. Patterson, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 430; Morgan v. Giddings (Tex.) 1 S. W. 369; Tuley v. Barton, 79 Va. 387; Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. 199. See also supra, subdivision I. 1. b. Attorney Not Insurer. As to the validity of an agreement whereby a larger measure of liability was assumed the court said in Morrill v. Graham, 27 Tex. 646: "It is also charged in the petition, that Morrill, by an express promise and undertaking to this effect, bound himself to pay Graham the amount of his debt upon his ultimate failure to collect it. It is quite evident from an inspection of the charge of the court that the verdict of the jury did not rest upon this latter ground. We need, therefore, at present, only say, that such a contract, if supported by a sufficient consideration, is unquestionably valid and binding, and that limitation would not commence running against it until the final termination of the proceedings advised and instituted by the attorney, for the collection of the debt for which he has thus bound himself. The mere confidence, however, on the advice of the attorney, or acquiescence in the course he wished to pursue in the matter would not be sufficient to support an action upon the promise of the attorney, to pay the debt, if he should fail to collect it. But it would be otherwise, if in consideration of such promise the client should agree not to withdraw the business from the hands of the attorney, or consent, on the faith of such promise, to waive a proceeding which otherwise he would have taken, and by reason of which his debt would have been secured." See to the same effect Gregory v. Gleed, 33 Vt. 405.

An attorney who receives and holds a claim for the convenience of the owner, and for the purpose only of receiving and paying over the money paid thereon, no compensation being charged or received, cannot be held responsible in case the debt is barred by limitation. McAdoo v. Lummis, 43 Tex. 227. Where an attorney is authorized to use his discretion as to what is best to be done in the interest of a client whose claim he has undertaken to collect, he cannot be held liable for a failure to succeed unless such failure is occasioned by a want of knowledge of the elementary principles of law such as every practicing attorney is presumed to understand, or, having such knowledge, he does not exercise it. Morgan v. Giddings (Tex.) 1 S. W. 369. See also Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 52 Am. Dec. 262; Bennett v. Phillips, 57 Ia. 174, 10 N. W. 328; Wright v. Ligon, Harp. Eq. (S. C.) 166; Morrill v. Graham, 27 Tex. 646; Crooker v. Hutchinson, 2 D. Chip. (Vt.) 117; Hopkins v. Willard, 14 Vt. 474. In the case last cited it was said: "The demand was left with the defendants for collection, without any express instructions as to the course to be pursued by them, and the question must depend upon the implied powers of the attorney in such case. Certainly no fault can be found with the charge of the court, which requires the attorney to use common diligence in the collection of the demand, by which we are to understand that degree of diligence which a man of ordinary prudence would use in his own business. If, in the absence of any special instructions, such degree of diligence is used, the attorney cannot be charged with negligence, as this, in a case like the present, simply implies a want of ordinary care. The court told the jury that the defendants had a discretion not to have the debtor committed, if there was good reason to believe that such a course would be injurious to the creditor, and that after commitment, he had the same right to release the debtor from jail, and that he might do this, without consulting the creditor, when he resided at a distance, provided he acted as a man of common prudence, and in so doing he might be guided by the apparent circumstances of the debtor. In Briggs v. Georgia, 10 Vt. 68, it was held that, in this state, there is combined in the character of attorney that of agent to ascertain extent, and that an attorney, employed to conduct a litigated suit, might employ assistant counsel in the absence and upon the credit of his client. Much more should the attorney, who receives a demand for collection from a distant creditor, combine the character of agent. This will be, ordinarily, beneficial for the creditor, and is in accordance with our course of business. When the creditor is remote, he cannot be supposed to be particularly advised of the situation of the debtor; and if the attorney uses the requisite diligence, he must certainly be justified in acting upon the result of his information. Though we may have extended the powers of an attorney somewhat beyond his powers at common law, yet, it is believed, that the views now expressed are in accordance with a long course of practice in this state, founded in good reason."

b. Failure to Care for Proceeds.

Money collected by an attorney belongs to the client. It has been said that the attorney occupies toward such money the relation of a trustee, so long as he chooses to treat and preserve the fund as a trust fund, and that the circumstances under which he will be liable for its loss are precisely those which govern in the case of any other trustee. Naltner v. Dolan, 108 Ind. 500, 8 N. E. 289, 58 Am. Rep. 61, wherein it was also said that whenever a trustee, unless properly authorized to do so, puts the fund in such shape as to invest himself with a legal title to it, the cestui que trust has his election, either to treat the fund, according to the appearance of things, as the property of the trustee, and regard the latter as his debtor, or he may demand that the title be transferred to him. See also supporting the same rule, Robinson v. Ward, 2 C. & P. 59, 12 E. C. L. 28, R. & M. 274, 21 E. C. L. 438; Gilbert v. Welsch, 75 Ind. 557. If a person acts for another as solicitor and as trustee, and receives money in the latter capacity, it is not by operation of law eo instante transferred to his hands as solicitor. Scott v. State, 2 Md. 284.

An attorney making a collection must notify the client with reasonable promptness, Robinson v. Ward, 2 C. & P. 59, 12 E. C. L. 28; Jett v. Hempstead, 25 Ark. 462; Spencer v. Smith, 45 Ind. App. 17, 87 N. E. 154; Voss v. Bachop, 5 Kan. 59; Riegi v. Phelps, 4 N. D. 272, 60 N. W. 402; Gaar v. Hughes (Tenn.) 35 S. W. 1092; unless circumstances make the giving of notice impracticable. Pidgeon v. Williams, 21 Grat. (Va.) 251, wherein it was said that "even when the client is not informed of the fact, circumstances may excuse the attorney for the failure to give notice; as, for example, if his client has left the country, or his whereabouts is not known to the attorney, or he has not the means of communicating with him by reason of a state of war, the relations of one being with one of the belligerents, and of the other with the other belligerent, so that intercourse and intercommunication between them is interrupted."

An attorney should not mingle his client's money with his own, Naltner v. Dolan, 108 Ind. 500, 8 N. E. 289, 58 Am. Rep. 61; Dean v. State, 147 Ind. 215, 46 N. E. 528; see also Robinson v. Ward, 2 C. & P. 59, 12 E. C. L. 28; Ansley v. Anderson, 35 Ga. 8; Norris v. Hero, 22 La. Ann. 605; McAllister v. Com. 30 Pa. St. 536; Pidgeon v. Williams, 21 Grat. (Va.) 251; Sargeant v. Downey, 49 Wis. 524, 5 N. W. 903, nor should such money be deposited in a bank in the name of the attorney individually, Naltner v. Dolan, 108 Ind. 500, 8 N. E. 289, 58 Am. Rep. 61; though a deposit of his client's money to the individual account of the attorney does not, in itself, amount to a conversion. Jackson v. Moore, 72 App. Div. 217, 76 N. Y. S. 164; Peirce v. Palmer, 31 R. I. 432, Ann. Cas. 1912B 181, 77 Atl. 201. In Naltner v. Dolan, supra, it was said: "Money belonging to a client having been received by the attorneys, in payment of a claim left with them for collection, the transmission of such money having been arrested by garnishee process before an opportunity for transmitting it occurred, the question is, having acted in the utmost good faith, and without any suggestion of fault or neglect, are the attorneys responsible for the continued solvency of the bank in which such funds were deposited in their own name, but not with their own funds, notwithstanding the bank was in good credit when the deposit was made? The receipt of money by an attorney, under the circumstances disclosed in this case, does not ipso facto create the technical relation of debtor and creditor between the attorney and client. It is because it does not that a suit cannot be maintained by the latter against the former without first making a demand. Money so collected belongs to the client. The attorney occupies toward it the relation of a trustee, so long as he chooses to treat and preserve the fund as a trust fund. The circumstances under which he will be liable for its loss are precisely those which govern in the case of any other trustee. While it is preserved in its trust character, if he exercises the same caution in respect to depositing it, if a deposit becomes necessary or proper, as a prudent man would in regard to his own money, and a loss happens, he will be excused. . . . The authorities, however, distinguish between cases in which the deposit was made in such a manner as to preserve its trust character on the books of the bank in which the fund was deposited, and those in which the owner of the fund might be put to the trouble of proving by extraneous evidence that the fund was not the individual money of his trustee. Whenever a trustee, unless properly authorized to do so, puts the fund in such shape as to invest himself with a legal title to it, the cestui que trust has his election, either to treat the fund, according to the appearance of things, as the property of the trustee, and regard the latter as his debtor, or he may demand that the title be transferred to him. If a deposit is made in such manner as, on the face of the books of the bank in which the deposit is made, to authorize the trustee, his assignee, or legal representative, to claim it as the fund of the depositor, the cestui que trust has the option to do likewise. . . . Whatever diversity of opinion may be found in respect to the rights of the bank, or other creditors of the depositor, the authorities agree that a trustee who either invests or deposits trust money in his own name, without in some way designating it as trust property, will be responsible for any loss that may occur to the fund while so invested or deposited. Gilbert v. Welsch, 75 Ind. 557; 2 Leading Cases in Equity, 1805. Having put the owner of the fund to the hazard of losing it, or of maintaining its trust character by such proof aliunde as may be available to him, the trustee thereby gives the former the privilege of treating the latter as his debtor, or of supplying the proof, or accepting his admission of the facts, at his option. Applying the principles stated to the facts found, the conclusion follows, that the appellants assumed the risk that the bank, in which the fund was deposited in their name, and from which it could only have drawn by their check, would be able to respond with the money when their check for it should be presented. The fact that none but money belonging to clients was deposited in the account in which the fund in question was placed does not alter the case. The controlling consideration is, that it was deposited to the credit of the firm, without anything to designate or preserve its trust character. They took and retained the legal title to the deposit in themselves. In the event of a controversy, the character of the fund would have depended wholly on extraneous proof. This being so, the owner had the right to elect to stand upon the title to the deposit, as he found it. Having so elected, there is no rule of law which authorizes any inquiry into the motives for so taking the title, short of an express or implied direction, from the owner of the fund."

If money collected is properly deposited in the name of the client and the latter is promptly notified, the attorney is protected notwithstanding the subsequent failure of the bank. Rogers v. Hopkins, 70 Ga. 454; Pidgeon v. Williams, 21 Grat. (Va.) 251. See also Kimmell v. Bittner, 62 Pa. St. 203; Gaar

v. Hughes (Tenn.) 35 S. W. 1092. In Pidgeon v. Williams, supra, it appeared that an attorney, having collected a claim, deducted his fees and deposited the balance in a bank, which was then solvent and in good standing, to the credit, not of his private account, but of an account called the collection account, to the credit of which he was in the habit of depositing all moneys collected for clients. The name of the client, for whose benefit the deposit was made, was entered in the bank book opposite the entry of the deposit. The client neglected to call for his money for some years, and until after the bank had become insolvent. It was held that the attorney was not liable for the money so deposited and lost.

c. Failure to Pay Over Proceeds.

It is the duty of an attorney who makes a collection to pay the proceeds promptly to his client.

97, Ann. Cas. 1914C 636, 139 N. W. 762, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 524.

In Ott v. Hood, 152 Wis. 97, Ann. Cas. 1914C 636, 139 N. W. 762, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 524, it was said: "It is often said, in adjudicated cases of this kind, that no cause of action arises except upon demand and refusal to pay, so one is liable to indulge in the idea that there is an unconditional rule to that effect. Such rule presupposes that the collector has reasonably notified his principal of the collection and only waits opportunity to pay over the money personally, or remit the same in such manner as such principal may direct. The client need not, in order to protect his interests in such circumstances as here, keep in touch with the attorney's office in order to demand the money. He may wait for notice, relying upon the duty to give such notice within a reasonable time, and in case of failure he may sue without further ceremony. The delay completes the cause of action as perfectly as demand and refusal."

A similar liability rests on an attorney to turn over any property other than money which is received for the client. Cameron v. Clarke, 11 Ala. 259; Commonwealth Bank v. Patton, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 190; Keenan v. Scott, 64 W. Va. 137, 61 S. E. 806.

An attorney is not justified in delaying the payment of the proceeds of a collection because a third person informally claims the fund. Jacobson v. Jones, 128 Ill. App. 55; Dunn v. Vannerson, 7 How. (Miss.) 580. See also Boulden v. Hebel, 17 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 312. Compare Sims v. Brown, 6 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 5, holding that there is no difference between the nature and the extent of the liability of an attorney and that of any other agent in respect to moneys collected by him for his principal and claimed by a third person; and that accordingly, where an attorney, after notice from the plaintiff that she claimed moneys collected by him in an action brought in behalf of one A., paid it over to his client, the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the attorney the amount so paid over. See also Peyser v. Wilcox, 64 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 525; Mahler v. Hyman, 17 N. Y. S. 588.

The relation in which an attorney stands to his client will not permit him to file an ordinary bill of interpleader on every claim made to the fund which has been collected by him for his client. Marvin v. Ellwood, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 365. But where the fund has been formally claimed by a third party the attorney is warranted in demanding indemnity from his client before he turns it over to him, and, should the client fail so to indemnify him, the attorney may seek an interpleader, or other proceeding in the nature thereof, for the purpose of determining the ownership. Marvin v. Ellwood, 11 Paige

(N. Y.) 365; Peyser v. Wilcox, 64 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 525; Mahler v. Hyman, 17 N. Y. S. 588.

The fact that the attorney knows that the debtor has filed a petition in bankruptcy does not require him to withhold payment to his client of money collected. In re Martin, 167 Fed. 236.

As a rule, payment must of course be made to the client or his agent. Wallace v. Peck, 12 Ala. 768; Fargo Gaslight, etc. Co. v. Greer, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 164, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. 589. It has been held that an attorney, who received the amount of a note left with him for collection by a client, and applied it conformably to his instructions, although the note was not negotiable, and was payable on its face to a third person, and no assignment to the client indorsed on it, was not liable to the person who was apparently entitled to the note, but of whose actual claim to the money due on it the attorney had no notice, if it appears that such person himself had placed the note in the hands of the client, with authority to collect it; and that it made no difference, that the attorney was surety for the debts, to which, by the direction of his client, he had applied the amount collected. Penny v. Caldwell, 1 Bailey L. (S. C.) 345. But a payment to a third person on the direction of the client or his agent will protect the attorney. Long v. Sampson, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 532; Atkinson v. Howlett, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 364; Strohecker v. Hoffman, 19 Pa. St. 223; Kimmell v. Bittner, 62 Pa. St. 203; Paxton v. Steele, 86 Va. 311, 10 S. E. 1. Compare Nisbet v. Lawson, 1 Ga. 275, wherein it was held that if an attorney collects money under the direction and in the name of an agent knowing that it belongs to the principal, and by order of the agent pays it in discharge of debts of the agent, it is not a discharge of the attorney from his liability to his principal.

In Peck v. Wallace, 19 Ala. 219, it was held that when a person places a note in the hands of an attorney for collection, and takes from him a receipt for it in his own name, but does not claim it as his own, and does not claim any lien on it, and the note itself is payable to a third person, and not indorsed, a payment by the attorney of the proceeds of the note to the payee will discharge him from all liability to the person who places the note in his hands.

Where a claim is collected by one to whom it is remitted by the attorney for collection, he may pay it to the attorney. Tyler v. Cockrell, 107 S. W. 799, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1126. And if he assumes the responsibility of making payment to the owner, both he and the attorney who remits the claim to him, will be liable if payment is made to the wrong person. Lewis v. Peck, 10 Ala. 142.

But it seems that, in the absence of a beneficial interest in the claim, the attorney cannot sue his subagent for the fund in his own name. Gunn v. Cantine, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 387; Herron v. Bullitt, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 497. See also Poor v. Guilford, 10 N. Y. 273, 61 Am. Dec. 749. And on the other hand the owner of the claim may recover the proceeds from one to whom the claim is remitted by his attorney for collection. Ex p. Edwards, 7 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 155; Robbins v. Heath, 11 Q. B. 257 note b, 63 E. C. L. 257 note b; Hanley v. Cassan, 11 Jur. (Eng.) 1088; Iron-ton Rolling Mills Co. v. Ross, 6 Bush (Ky.) 103; Thacker v. Dun, 1 Mo. App. 41; Riegi v. Phelps, 4 N. D. 272, 60 N. W. 402. See also Cobb v. Becke, 6 Q. B. 930, 51 E. C. L. 930. Compare Robbins v. Fennell, 11 Q. B. 248, 63 E. C. L. 248.

The attorney may deduct his lawful fees from the amount collected. Com. v. McKay (Ky.) 20 S. W. 276; Tyler v. Cockrell, 107 S. W. 799, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1126; In re Klein, 101 N. Y. S. 663. But the fact that the amount of his fees is in dispute does not warrant the attorney in retaining the whole sum collected until the dispute is settled. Conyers v. Gray, 67 Ga. 329; Robinson v. Hawes, 56 Mich. 135, 22 N. W. 222. See also Hamel v. People, 97 Ill. App. 527. But it seems that he may retain the full amount claimed by him. See Robinson v. Hawes, 56 Mich. 135, 22 N. W. 222. In that case, after stating the facts, the court said: "The facts above stated show that, at the utmost, according to the affidavit, the defendant's claim did not exceed $683.05 against plaintiff, and that amount would be the greatest sum he would be entitled to retain out of the moneys received by him, conceding for the purpose of this question that he could retain money received from one suit to apply upon services rendered in others. The facts, therefore, shown by the affidavit, prove clearly and without question that defendant retained and refused to deliver to plaintiff at least the sum of $1,516.95 more than he had a right to do. It needs no argument to show that such conduct was improper. It was misconduct in his professional employment, for which an action will lie sounding in tort, based upon neglect or violation of professional duty; and the evidence offered was admissible, and tendered to support the first two counts of the declaration. An attorney has an undoubted right to a lien upon the money or papers of his client which have come to his possession, derived from, or pertaining to, the suit in which his legal services were rendered, to secure payment, not only for his services in that suit, but also for all professional services rendered his client in other suits; but where he receives money, he has no lien upon or right to retain any sum beyond the amount owing him from his client for professional services, and it is clearly his duty to pay over to his client, on demand, any sum he has received beyond what his client owes him for such services. Indeed, the statute makes such neglect or refusal of the attorney to pay over moneys collected or received for his client or other person, within a reasonable time after demand, a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment or fine. How. Stat. sec. 9152. In a case where there is a disagreement between the attorney and client as to the amount due him for professional services, and the attorney retains in good faith what he believes to be justly his due, he would not be liable to the client in this form of action [trover]; he would not be guilty of professional misconduct or a violation of professional duty. But the evidence in this case shows that the amount retained was far beyond the amount owing to defendant, and also that the pretext upon which the defendant claimed the right to keep it was unfounded in fact; and the inference to be drawn is that it was not detained by defendant in good faith, or in the honest belief that it was fairly due to him from the plaintiff. The relation of attorney and client is one of confidence based upon the ability, honesty and integrity of the attorney; and he cannot be justified in retaining in his hands money belonging to the client, for the purpose of forcing the client to settle at unreasonable terms demanded by the attorney, or for the purpose of driving a hard and extortionate bargain with his client. The honor of the profession, as well as the dignity and purity of courts of justice, whose officer the attorney is, require that such practices shall not be sanctioned."

III. Extent of Liability.

Unless a person seeking to recover for the negligence of his attorney shows that substantial injury has resulted, his recovery will be confined to a nominal sum. Lane v. Storke, 10 Cal. App. 347, 101 Pac. 937; Hinckley v. Krug, 34 Pac. 118; Nave v. Baird, 12 Ind. 318; Cornelissen v. Ort, 132 Mich. 294, 93 N. W. 617, 9 Detroit Leg. N. 604; Joy v. Morgan, 35 Minn. 184, 28 N. W. 237; National Hollow Brake Beam Co. v. Bakewell, 224 Mo. 203, 123 S. W. 561; Arnold v. Robertson, 3 Daly (N. Y.) 298; Lamprecht v. Bien, 125 App. Div. 811, 110 N. Y. S. 128; Quinn v. Van Pelt, 56 N. Y. 417; Harter v. Morris, 18 Ohio St. 492; Forrow v. Arnold, 22 R. I. 305, 47 Atl. 693; Collier v. Pulliam, 13 Lea (Tenn.) 114. In Quinn v. Van Pelt, supra, it was said: "The action is not brought for the purpose of annulling or rescinding the contract, or recovering back the consideration, but for the enforcement of the contract and the recovery of damages for its alleged breach. Various breaches are set out in the complaint, and damages therefor to the amount of $20,000 are demanded. The plaintiff holds the defendant to his engagement, and claims from him damages for its nonperformance to a much larger amount than the consideration which the defendant received for his undertaking. This claim necessarily affirms the contract, and concedes the right of the defendant to retain the consideration. Whatever we may think of the propriety of the original arrangement, we are compelled, in obedience to well-settled rules of law, to hold that in such an action the onus is upon the plaintiff to prove the breach of the agreement and the amount of damages sustained by reason thereof, and that she can recover only the damages thus proved. The court, at the trial, reversed this order of proceeding and held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the consideration, less such sum as the defendant should prove to be the value of the services actually rendered by him under the agreement. We think that this was an erroneous view of the case, and it necessarily follows that we must reverse the judgment. If regarded as an action ex delicto, for the breach by an attorney of his professional duty, the same result must follow. The measure of damages is not the amount of the fee which he received. The damages may be more or less than the amount of the fee, and the burden rests upon the plaintiff to prove them, and not upon the defendant to prove how much of his stipulated fee he actually earned." In Joy v. Morgan, 35 Minn. 184, 28 N. W. 237, wherein it was charged that a mechanic's lien was lost because of the negligence of the claimant's attorney, it was said: "Plaintiffs' recovery (if any) must be of damages, and if, notwithstanding defendant's negligence, they have collected their demand through the lien proceedings, they have suffered no damages, and cannot recover. Prima facie they have collected their demand by bidding in the property sold in the lien proceedings. If they have in fact failed to do so, it is because Mrs. Bowdish had no interest in the lot sold, or not sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' judgment and costs of sale. If this is so, it is for plaintiffs to overcome the prima facie presumption against them by so showing." In Lane v. Storke, 10 Cal. App. 347, 101 Pac. 937, wherein it was alleged that an attorney wrongfully withdrew from a suit before the trial, the court said: "The damages claimed in both counts are based solely and alone upon the alleged fact that the result of the trial in the case of Allen v. Williams and the proceedings in bankruptcy against the firm of Williams & Company and Williams would have been different under the management of defendant. There are no means whereby such question can be determined. Observation teaches us the result of trial cannot be predicted with any degree of certainty, even though conducted by lawyers possessing the marked skill and ability attributed under oath, upon information and belief, to defendant. While defendant might have obtained a judgment against Williams for the $4,000, or secured an adjudication of his insolvency, all as contended by plaintiff, still we cannot say the result might not have been even more disastrous to his client had he not withdrawn as her attorney. Judgment for a greater sum might have been obtained against her in the one case, and in the other she, too, as well as Williams and the copartnership, might have been adjudged solvent."

In the absence of circumstances warranting the allowance of punitive damages, the client can recover no more than the actual damage sustained by him.

In Vooth v. McEachen, 181 N. Y. 28, 2 Ann. Cas. 601, 73 N. E. 488, several statements of the rule were quoted with approval, the court saying: "As we have seen, the action was for a wilful violation of duty in settling a claim without authority. The measure of damages applicable in such cases may be the same as if the action was based upon negligence. In either case, we think the damages recoverable are those shown to exist, and that the burden of showing the amount of damages suffered rests upon the plaintiff. In III Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 391 the rule is stated as follows: 'In a suit by a client against an attorney for negligence in conducting the collection of a claim, whereby the debt was lost, the burden rests on the former to allege and prove every fact essential to establish such liability. He must allege and prove that the claim was turned over to the attorney for collection; that there was a failure to collect, and that this failure was due to the culpable neglect of the attorney, and that but for such negligence the debt could or would have been collected.' Again, at page 396, the rule as to unauthorized acts is stated as follows: 'An attorney, being without authority to take certain steps in regard to his client's matters, is liable personally for any injury suffered by his client in consequence of his improperly assuming to act where he has no authority. . . . But in these, as in other cases, the client must show that he has suffered actual damage in consequence of the unauthorized acts of his attorney.' In Weeks on Attorneys at Law (2d ed. § 319) the measure of damages is stated to be: 'In actions against attorneys for negligence or wrongs, the debt lost and costs sustained through their negligence furnish, when the action can be maintained, the obvious measure of damages, where this measure definitely exists.' In 2 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (§ 753) it is said: 'Where an attorney is chargeable with negligence, an action lies immediately. . . . The damages do not necessarily extend to the nominal amount of the debt lost by the attorney's negligence, but only to the loss actually sustained. . . . The existence of the debt, alleged to have been lost by the attorney's negligence, must, of course, be proved by competent evidence.'" The rule was laid down and the authorities discussed in Goldzier v. Poole, 82 Ill. App. 469, where it was said: "In suits against attorneys at law for damages by reason of negligence of the attorney in the management of the client's litigation, it is a general rule that the extent of the damages must be affirmatively shown, for the attorney is only liable for the actual injury which his client has sustained, and not necessarily for the nominal amount of the client's demand. Weeks on Att'ys at Law (1st ed.) 293; 2 Greenleaf Ev. secs. 146, 148; Suydam v. Vance, 2 McLean 99, [23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,657]; Cox v. Livingston, 2 Watts & S. (Pa.) 103; Harter v. Morris, 18 Ohio St. 493; Eccles v. Stephenson, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 517; Cox v. Sullivan, 7 Ga. 144.

Hence, when a claim is alleged to have been lost by the attorney's negligence, in order to recover beyond nominal damages, it must be shown that it was a subsisting debt, and that the debtor was solvent. Weeks on Att'ys at Law, 293; Russel v. Palmer, 2 Wils. C. Pl. (Eng.) 325, also reported in 2 Comyn on Cont. 3d Am. Ed. p. 252; Bruce v. Baxter, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 477; Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76; Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212. There are decisions holding to the contrary, but we think that the weight of authority supports the rule as announced by the citations above. All of the decisions to the contrary will be found to have been based, either directly or indirectly, upon the authority of Godfrey v. Jay, 7 Bing. 413, 20 E. C. L. 183. That case was decided in 1831, and appears to have been altogether based upon the authority of Marzetti v. Williams, 1 B. & Ad. 415, 20 E. C. L. 412, which was decided in King's Bench in 1830. But in Marzetti v. Williams it was only held that the plaintiff was entitled to nominal damages in absence of proof of actual damages. The authorities cited in Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144, relied upon by appellee, do not support that decision, in so far as it announces the doctrine contended for by counsel for appellee. In Collier v. Pulliam, 13 Lea (Tenn.) 114, the decisions contra are distinguished from cases like the one here, where the interest lost by negligence of the attorney is a demand for money or damages, and where the value of the interest lost, and hence the actual injury resulting from the negligence, depends wholly upon the validity of the demand, and the solvency of the one against whom the demand was made. We do not regard decisions in cases where the attorney is chargeable with fraud (Jennings v. McConnel, 17 Ill. 148, and others), as in point or controlling in cases where, as here, the only ground of action is negligence." In Whitney v. Abbott, 191 Mass. 59, 77 N. E. 524, it appeared that an attorney by negligently bringing suit deprived his client of the security of a contract for the conditional sale of an engine. The court said: "The measure of damages was the market value of the engine at the time of bringing the action which deprived him of that right." In Dean v. Radford, 141 Mich. 36, 104 N. W. 329, it appeared that an attorney negligently failed to carry out his client's instruction to pay the interest on a mortgage, by reason whereof the mortgage was foreclosed and the land sold for less than its value. Holding that the attorney was not liable for the difference between the value of the land and the price secured the court said: "Was the circuit judge right in holding that Mr. Radford should not be liable for the loss of the real estate? It has already appeared that the plaintiff agreed in the mortgage to keep the property insured, to pay the taxes, and pay interest every six months, and that in case of default in any of the above particulars the principal and interest might be declared due. His testimony was to the effect that he had no other way to get the money. It is not claimed the property was bid in for the benefit of Mr. Radford. It is not claimed he agreed to pay any other amount than the $168, or to take care of any other amounts which might become due as interest, in insurance, or taxes. Can it be said that, if the $168 had been paid, the subsequent instalments of interest would be paid as these became due, and there would be no foreclosure? It is true the plaintiff testified he had negotiated for a builder's construction loan, which he believed he could have obtained; but it is apparent from his testimony that there was no good basis for that belief. Can it be said the failure to pay the $168 was the proximate cause of the loss of the real estate?"

If a person sustains loss because of the negligence of his attorney in the collection of a debt, the measure of damages is the amount of the loss actually sustained, and not the nominal amount of the demand. Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 52 Am. Dec. 262; Cox v. Sullivan, 7 Ga. 144, 50 Am. Dec. 386; Eccles v. Stephenson, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 517; Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316; Voth v. McEachen, 181 N. Y. 28, 2 Ann. Cas. 601, 73 N. E. 488; Crooker v. Hutchinson, 2 D. Chip (Vt.) 117. Where an attorney negligently fails, in violation of express instructions from his client, to issue execution on a judgment, he is liable in any event for nominal damages, and if the judgment could have been collected by execution, and is afterwards lost through the insolvency of the debtor, he is liable for the full amount of the judgment; but if the client discharges the negligent attorney, and the judgment could then have been collected by execution, which the client negligently fails to have issued, and the debtors afterward become insolvent, the attorney is liable only for nominal damages, the negligence of the client being the proximate cause of the loss. Read v. Patterson, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 431.

Punitive damages may be recovered where the wrong charged and proved against the attorney shows malice, fraud, or such gross negligence or recklessness as to indicate, on the part of the attorney, a wilful or wanton disregard of his client's rights. Thus it has been held that punitive damages may be recovered where an attorney falsely gives his client information that leads her to a second marriage which renders her liable to indictment and prosecution for bigamy. Hill v. Montgomery, 84 Ill. App. 300, affirmed 184 Ill. 220, 56 N. E. 320. So, an attorney may become liable for punitive damages which his client has been obliged to pay, or which he has failed to recover from another, because of his attorney's negligence. Patterson v. Frazer (Tex.) 79 S. W. 1077. But see Forrow v. Arnold, 22 R. I. 305, 47 Atl. 693, wherein the following facts appeared: "A., an attorney, issued for B., his client, a void writ upon which C. was arrested. After judgment in favor of C., an action of malicious prosecution was commenced against B. by C., in which he recovered the sum of $400 as damages. This amount, which was largely punitive, was based upon one or more allegations of the gravamen, viz.: (1) That the officer (through ignorance and without instructions from A.) took C. to the county seat after bail had been procured; (2) that the affidavit was false in stating that B. had a just claim against C.; and (3) that it was false in stating that C. was about to leave the state. After satisfaction of the judgment, B. brought an action against A. for negligence and recovered the amount of said judgment as damages." It was held that "none of the things alleged as gravamen against B. upon which punitive damages were recovered could be charged upon A. as the proximate result of his neglect;" and also that "A. was liable for issuing the void writ, for the cost of prosecuting the original suit; the judgment against B. in that suit; and, if C. should sue for an illegal arrest, the judgment against B. on that account."

The attorney may, of course, show any facts which have a tendency to mitigate the damages. Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144, 19 N. E. 739; as, for instance, a settlement by the client of the action in connection with which the negligence is charged, Drury v. Butler, 171 Mass. 171, 50 N. E. 527; or that the client continued to employ the attorney after he had knowledge of the alleged negligence, Derrickson v. Cady, 7 Pa. St. 27. But in a suit against an attorney for negligence in not moving for a return of property in a replevin suit, on nonsuit, it is not competent for him to show, in reduction of damages, that the plaintiff in replevin was the real owner of the property, as that would amount to a retrial of the replevin suit. Smallwood v. Norton, 20 Me. 83, 37 Am. Dec. 39.

IV. Defenses.

Those defenses which consist in a showing that the attorney has exercised reasonable skill and diligence or that his errors were excusable are necessarily included in the discussion of the criteria of negligence in other subdivisions of this note. As to the effect of showing that no injury resulted from the act complained of, see supra, subdivision III. Extent of Liability. The statute of limitations is treated infra, subdivision X. Limitation of Action.

An attorney may prove that he was not retained in time to perform the act which he is charged with having neglected, Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 203; or that his client failed to give him the information requisite to a proper performance of his duties, Hastings v. Halleck, 13 Cal. 204; Salisbury v. Gourgas, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 442; Benton v. Craig, 2 Mo. 198. In Hastings v. Halleck, supra, it was said: "The plaintiff alleges that he had a good defense to the whole of the claim of Adams & Co. because of an unauthorized change in the plans of building (which had been agreed on by all the parties interested in the property), made by Woods and Haskell, the agent and resident partner of Adams & Co. by which alone the additional expense was incurred, and the advances made necessary; that defendants were fully informed of this defense, but failed to set it up in answer to the suit, and by stipulation for the affirmance of the judgment, after deducting interest, deprived plaintiff of the benefit of a new trial, in which such defense could have been established. The only evidence that the defendants were apprised of, the grounds of defense stated, is contained in an allegation in the complaint (which plaintiff insists is not sufficiently controverted by the answer), and the fact that the plaintiff was, while the suit was pending, and before his second departure from the state, in frequent consultation with defendants, and living upon terms of close intimacy with one of them. It is at all times difficult, if not impracticable, to produce evidence of the tenor of confidential communications between client and attorney, and perhaps the evidence offered, being the only kind of which the case is susceptible, would be sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that plaintiff had put defendants in possession of all the facts which constituted his defense to the action. But in order to charge the defendants with negligence in failing to set up such defense, he must show by evidence the existence of such facts, and that they were susceptible of proof at the trial by the exercise of proper diligence on the part of his attorneys." So in Lee v. Dixon, 3 F. & F. (Eng.) 744, it was held that an attorney was not liable for bringing an action in the wrong court where he was misled by his client as to the amount in issue.

An attorney may show that he acted in the matter complained over under the instruction of his client. Holmes v. Peck, 1 R. I. 242.

In Carr v. Glover, 70 Mo. App. 242, it was said: "The referee found that Mr. Glover 'acquiesced' in the pleading as filed by Mr. Carr. The learned trial judge says the mere acquiescence is not sufficient to estop Glover from pleading negligence on the part of Carr. Ordinarily this would unquestionably be true. As a rule a client not only acquiesces in pleadings prepared and filed by his attorney, but he implicitly relies upon him in that regard. But the ordinary relations between client and attorney did not exist in this case. Here the client was an able lawyer. As shown by the correspondence between him and his attorney, the pleadings to be filed and the effect of a plea to the jurisdiction were discussed, and authorities cited by each." In Cornelissen v. Ort, 132 Mich. 294, 93 N. W. 617, 9 Detroit Leg. N. 604, it was held that an attorney charged with negligence may show that the client relied on another attorney with respect to the matter complained of.

An attorney, sued for negligence or want of skill, cannot set up in defense of the action the fact that the contract between him and his client was champertous. Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 482, 68 Am. Dec. 134, wherein it was said: "Champerty, in the stipulation of commissions, cannot avail the attorneys in this case. That portion of the contract being void, the attorneys having performed services could have maintained an action for reasonable compensation. Holloway v. Lowe, 1 Ala. 246, approved in Elliott v. McClelland, 17 Ala. 206. Being entitled to the benefits of the retainer, it would be monstrous to relieve them from its responsibilities."

An attorney charged with negligence in failing to make a collection may prove, in his defense, that the claim which he was employed to collect was not owing to his client, Jackson v. Tilghman, 1 Miles (Pa.) 31; or that it was not collectable, Marsh v. Whitmore, 21 Wall. 178, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 482; or that the failure to collect was due to the act of the client, Ransom v. Cothran, 6 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 167.

V. Release by Client of Liability of Attorney.

The client may, of course, release his attorney from all liability in the performance of his professional duties. Derrickson v. Cady, 7 Pa. St. 27. See also Hamsher v. Kline, 27 Pa. St. 397. In the case first cited it was said: "On the 31st December, 1842, the parties came to an arrangement, which resulted in a mutual release. There is no evidence on that subject, except the paper signed by the plaintiff, viz.:

'A. Cady v. L. Wood and R. Sexton.	}	Judgment in the Common Pleas of Crawford County.

In consideration of David Derrickson releasing me from his charges as counsel for me heretofore, I do not hereby release him; and he not to act as counsel for me any further, unless employed again.

December 31, 1842.

Asa Cady.'

The court claimed the exclusive right to declare the legal effect and operation of this paper, and instructed the jury that it did not embrace the present controversy; in this case it formed no defense. What, then, did it embrace? Here was a misunderstanding between the attorney and his client. The former alleging that he had general discretionary powers, and that he had exercised his best judgment and abilities in the case. The latter denying this, and complaining of the unfortunate release of the Meadville lots, executed more than two years before. There is not an allegation in the paper book of any other point of dissatisfaction. The attorney releases his client from his charges as counsel; and for that consideration, the client releases him, from what? Why, in the case stated in the release; and he is no longer to act as his attorney in the case. As there was no ground of complaint but the one between the parties, and the case of Cady v. Wood and Sexton, stated in their mutual release, it could relate to no other matter."

But the rule that an attorney dealing with his client for his own benefit is bound to show that the transaction was in all respects fair and equitable (see 2 R. C. L. tit. Attorneys at Law p. 966) is applicable; and it must be clearly shown that the giving of the release was free from fraud, influence, or mistake, and that the client was fairly acquainted with all the material facts and circumstances. Kissam v. Squires, 102 App. Div. 536, 92 N. Y. S. 873, wherein it was said: "The proof is abundant to show that the plaintiff relied entirely upon the judgment and fidelity of the defendant in intrusting to him her money for purposes of investment. He assumed to know the values of the respective properties in which he invested her money, and he also knew that she relied thereon. At the time the instrument of ratification was signed, it does not appear that she had full knowledge upon the subject of the Bartlett loan. It is true that the defendant testified that he told her generally concerning the transaction. He does not, however, say that he informed her that he had loaned the money to Bartlett upon insufficient security for its safe protection. In respect to the conversation, his statement is, in general terms, that he explained all of the transactions to her, and that she expressed satisfaction therewith. The defendant says, 'I then asked her to give me something to show her satisfaction with what I had done during her absence, especially as the holders—' At this point he was interrupted by the presentation of a paper, and made no further statement concerning it, aside from the fact that he dictated a statement to the stenographer, who took it down on the machine. An examination of the paper itself shows that it was something more than a satisfaction and an approval of his transactions, as, among its provisions, is the following: 'And I agree to save yourself and said Thomas and Foraker harmless of any and all claims, cost or damage growing out of any proceedings connected with any of the several aforesaid matters.' It is quite evident from the language of this document that the defendant was anxious not only to procure an expression of satisfaction, but the execution of such a paper as would hold him harmless from all his acts. The rule governing dealings in such relation had been announced in the law in no uncertain terms.

Applying these rules to this case, and considering the finding of the referee in connection with the evidence in the case, we are of opinion that this transaction did not operate as a ratification of the defendant's acts, and as a release from his liability to her for his negligent acts. It must be made to appear that she knew and fully understood the entire transaction, and what her legal rights were in the premises, before force will be given to the ratification and release."

VI. Imposition of Costs on Attorney.

The court has inherent power to impose costs on an attorney who has been guilty of misconduct.

Thus an attorney who inserts impertinent or scandalous matter in pleadings may be ordered to pay the costs of having it expunged. N. Y. Code Civ. Pro. § 545. See also Cook v. Rosslyn, 3 Giff. (Eng.) 175, 7 Jur. N. S. 1070, 5 L. T. N. S. 133; Powell v. Kane, 2 Edw. (N. Y.) 450; Powell v. Kane, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 265; Cushman v. Brown, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 539; McVey v. Cantrell, 4 Hun (N. Y.) 522. In Brown v. Brown, 4 Ind. 627, 58 Am. Dec. 641, it was said: "The court taxed the costs of the cause against the attorney of the plaintiff, because of the unnecessary grossness and indelicacy of the petition, and of his improper deportment in reading it. To set aside this taxation, the cause is brought here. To protect itself against gross violations of decency and decorum, is a necessary incidental power of a court. They have the right to punish in this way such misconduct as is alleged in this case on the part of an attorney. It is a power to be exercised at the sound discretion of the judge, and this court can interfere only where it is shown to have abused its discretion." In Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Yankee Film Co. 92 Fed. 134, it was held that the continuation of a pending suit for infringement of a patent, and the taking of testimony therein by complainant after he had filed a petition for a reissue on the ground of the invalidity of the patent in suit, constituted a "multiplication of proceedings," so as unreasonably and vexatiously to increase the costs, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 982 (2 Fed. St. Ann. 291) and on a dismissal of the suit after the granting of a reissue the defendant was held to be entitled thereunder to a special allowance commensurate with the expense occasioned thereby.

In some instances costs have been imposed where counsel was guilty of negligence only. In re Bolton, 9 Beav. 272, 10 Jur. 22; Ridley v. Tiplady, 20 Beav. 44, 24 L. J. Ch. 207, 1

Robbins*, 63 N. C. 309.

In Ex p. Robbins, supra, it was said: "It is said that there is no precedent in North Carolina, either reported or that can be recollected, of a court compelling an attorney to pay costs for negligence merely. That may be admitted; but the power to do this is not a distinct power, but only a branch of the general power to punish for contempt; it is treated in all the books, in connection with the other instances, and referred to the same source. Upon the authorities cited, there can be no doubt of the practice of the English courts to regard what is called in Pitt v. Yalden [4 Burr. 2060] ubi supra, 'lata culpa,' or 'crassa negligentia,' on the part of an attorney, as a contempt of court; and no reason is seen, why this instance of the general power should be denied to the court of this state, unless it be taken away, as is argued for the appellants, by an implication from sec. 5, ch. 9, Rev. Code. This statute provides that, when a plaintiff shall be compelled to pay costs, by the neglect of his attorney to file a declaration in proper time, he may recover such costs from the attorney, by warrant. This implication does not arise; it is a well-known principle, that when one remedy exists at common law, and a statute gives another, the latter is cumulative."

An attorney who assumes to represent a party to an action is personally liable for costs if he acts without authority, or his supposed client is nonexistent.

Compare Hamilton v. Wright, 37 N. Y. 502, where it appeared that an attorney prosecuted an action of ejectment in the name of the grantors and grantee in a deed, against a defendant in possession, and failed, and it was held that the grantors were liable for costs notwithstanding the prosecution was without their knowledge, the defendant having a right to presume a retainer.

In Thomas v. Finlayson, 19 W. R. (Eng.) 255, it was held that the rule that proceedings taken by a solicitor, without proper authority, would be annulled with costs to be paid by him, did not apply unless he was aware of the circumstances which invalidated his authority, and moreover, that notice from the other side was not sufficient to fix him with knowledge, if he had good reason to suppose that the facts stated in the notice were true.

Where a solicitor employed by one of several administrators files a bill in the names of all, he will not be compelled to pay costs, although the name of a coadministratrix is inserted without her consent. Dare v. Allen, 2 N. J. Eq. 288.

But costs will not be imposed on counsel merely because of inadvertence, or slight, or excusable error. Matter of Tacke, 1 Connolly 119, 3 N. Y. S. 431; Hauser v. Herzog, 141 App. Div. 522, 126 N. Y. S. 337; Bird v. Wessels, 119 N. Y. S. 329. In Bird v. Wessels, supra, it was said: "Costs upon a motion in a special proceeding are discretionary; but they cannot be imposed upon the attorney, except in the form of a fine. No basis for the punishment of the attorney appears in this case. Mistaken zeal, not coupled with deceit or other improper conduct, should not be punished in this form by any court."

VII. Liability to Third Person.

The liability of an attorney to a third person for acts done in his representative capacity is beyond the scope of the present discussion. See generally 2 R. C. L. tit. Attorneys at Law, p. 1029. The question arises most frequently in respect to the liability of an attorney for malicious prosecution in bringing a suit for his client, which is discussed in the note to Anderson v. Canaday, Ann. Cas. 1915B 714.

The liability of an attorney for negligence is confined to the client. An attorney is under no obligation to exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence towards strangers, as he is with respect to his client, and, therefore, he is not responsible to them for mere negligence. Fish v. Kelly, 17 C. B. (N. S.) 194, 112 E. C. L. 194; National Savings Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621; Buckley v. Gray, 110 Cal. 339, 42 Pac. 900, 52 Am. St. Rep. 88, 31 L.R.A. 862; Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 104 Mo. 234, 15 S. W. 1112, 24 Am. St. Rep. 333, 12 L.R.A. 746; Killip v. Empire Mill Co. 2 Nev. 34; Currey v. Butcher, 37 Ore. 380, 61 Pac. 631. In Buckley v. Gray, supra, it was said: "It is a general doctrine, sustained by an overwhelming weight of authority, that an attorney is liable for negligence in the conduct of his professional duties, arising only from ignorance or want of care, to his client alone—that is, to the one between whom and the attorney the contract of employment and service existed, and not to third parties. The exceptions to this general rule, if they may be in strictness deemed such, are where the attorney has been guilty of fraud or collusion, or of a malicious or tortious act. Responsibility for a fraudulent act is independent of any contractual relation between the guilty party and the one injured; and one committing a malicious or tortious act to the injury of another is liable therefor, without reference to any question of privity between himself and the wronged one. Where, however, neither of these elements enter into the transaction, the rule is universal that for an injury arising from mere negligence, however gross, there must exist between the party inflicting the injury and the one injured some privity by contract or otherwise, by reason of which the former owes some legal duty to the latter." So in the leading case of National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621, it was held that an attorney who was employed by the owner of land to report in his title was not liable for an error in his report thereon to a third person who relying thereon loaned money to the client. The court said: "Satisfactory proof is exhibited that the defendant was duly employed by the pretended owner of the lot to examine his title to the same; and it is conceded that he did so, or that his son made the search for him, and that he made and signed the certificates in question, and that he was paid for his services by his employer; nor is it questioned that the title was defective as alleged. Concede that, and it follows as an implication of law that the defendant assumed to possess the requisite knowledge and experience to perform the stipulated service, and that he contracted with his employer that he would use reasonable care and skill in the performance of the duties. For a failure in either of these respects, if it resulted in damage to his employer, he, the employer, is entitled to recover compensation. Chase v. Heaney, 70 Ill. 268. Decisions of the courts of the highest authority support that proposition; but the difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs is that they never employed the defendant to search the records, examine the title, or make the report, and it clearly appears that he never performed any such service at their request or in their behalf, and that they never paid him anything for the services he did perform in respect to the transaction; nor is there any evidence tending to show any privity of contract between them and the defendant, within the meaning of the law as expounded by the decisions of the court. Every imputation of fraud is disclaimed, and it is clear that the transaction is not one immediately dangerous to the lives of others. Where there is fraud or collusion, the party will be held liable, even though there is no privity of contract; but where there is neither fraud or collusion nor privity of contract, the party will not be held liable, unless the act is one imminently dangerous to the lives of others, or is an act performed in pursuance of some legal duty."

In this connection it must be borne in mind that the liability of an attorney to a person for whom he assumes to act is none the less because his services are gratuitous (see supra, subdivision I. 1. a. Degree of Care or Skill Required in General) and that an attorney assuming to represent both parties to a transfer of realty is liable to either though he is employed by one only (see supra, subdivision II. 2. Investments or Securities and II. 3. Preparing, Keeping or Recording Written Instrument).

VIII. Form of Action for Negligence or Breach of Duty.

An action against an attorney for negligence originates in contract. At common law the client could sue either in assumpsit or in trespass on the case, though the latter form of action was usually adopted, and under modern practice those remedies or their code substitutes may be employed. Swannell v. Ellis, 1 Bing. 347, 8 E. C. L. 542; Legge v. Tucker, 1 H. & N. (Eng.) 500; Russell v. Palmer, 2 Wils. C. Pl. (Eng.) 325;

Poole, 82 Ill. App. 469; Hill v. Montgomery, 84 Ill. App. 300, affirmed 184 Ill. 220, 56 N. E. 320. See also Morrison v. Burnett, 56 Ill. App. 129; Stimpson v. Sprague, 6 Greenl. (Me.) 470; Salisbury v. Gourgas, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 442; Wilson v. Coffin, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 316; Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316; Currey v. Butcher, 37 Ore. 380, 61 Pac. 631; Holmes v. Peck, 1 R. I. 242; Croker v. Hutchinson, 1 Vt. 73. Book account does not lie. Smalley v. Soragen, 30 Vt. 2.

In Currey v. Butcher, 37 Ore. 380, 61 Pac. 631, it was said: "The overruling of the motion constitutes the first assignment of error. It was based upon the contention that the complaint states two causes of action,—one for a breach of contract, and the other in tort for certain alleged fraudulent acts of the defendants in the course of their employment, but, as we understand the pleading, the gist of the action is the negligence of the defendants in the performance of a duty which they owed to the plaintiff by reason of their employment. She avers that they undertook and agreed to examine for her the title to certain land which she contemplated purchasing, and that the work was so negligently and carelessly done that they failed to discover and report to her a judgment lien thereon, by reason of which she was damaged. Where one adopts the legal profession, and assumes to exercise its duties in behalf of another for hire, the law imposes a duty to exercise reasonable care and skill, and if an injury results to his client from want thereof he is liable to respond in damages to the extent of the injury sustained. This duty and liability arises from the relation of the parties under the contract, rather than from the contract itself, and at common law the injured party could sue, either in assumpsit, for a breach of the implied promise, or in case, for the neglect of duty: 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 107. In the latter instance it is necessary to aver the contract of employment, showing the relation of attorney and client, as a matter of inducement, because without such contract there could be no duty to the plaintiff, and hence no liability. As stated by Mr. Justice McDonald, in Emigh v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 4 Biss. 114, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,449: 'When there is a contract, either express or implied, from which a common-law duty results, an action on the case lies for a breach of that duty, in which case the contract is laid as mere inducement, and the tort arising from the breach of duty as the gravamen of the action. Thus, if a lawyer or physician is engaged by special contract to render professional services, and if, in the performance of such services, he is guilty of gross ignorance or negligence, an action on the case will lie against him, notwithstanding such special contract.'

A bill in equity cannot be based on the mere fact of negligence of an attorney in the performance of a professional duty. British Mut. Invest. Co. v. Cobbold, L. R. 19 Eq. (Eng.) 627, 44 L. J. Ch. 332, 23 W. R. 487; Williams v. Reed, 3 Mason 405, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,733; Crothers v. Lee, 29 Ala. 337; Nancrede v. Voorhis, 32 N. J. Eq. 524. In Universal Sav. Corp. v. Morris Plan Co. 234 Fed. 382, it was held that the client's remedy for the disclosure by his attorney of information acquired in the course of his employment was by an action at law for damages and not by an injunction to prevent the use of the information thus disclosed.

If an attorney's fraudulent act results in damage to his client he is liable in an action at law. Roberts v. Gates, 146 Mich. 169, 109 N. W. 264; Currey v. Butcher, 37 Ore. 380, 61 Pac. 631; Allen v. Frawley, 106 Wis. 638, 82 N. W. 593. Under the New York statute (Civ. Code Proc. § 70) making an attorney liable in treble damages to one injured by his deceit or collusion, such misconduct must impede or prejudice the rights or remedies of the injured party, and must be adjudicated in the proceeding. Franzone v. Tumminelli, 67 Misc. 549, 123 N. Y. S. 455. See also Looft v. Lawton, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 588. In Roberts v. Gates, supra, it appeared that an attorney employed to clear a title purchased an adverse title for himself taking it in the name of a third person. The client was compelled to purchase from that person at an increased price, which was paid over to the attorney. The court said: "The learned trial judge was of opinion that, as matter of law, plaintiff could not purchase the title of Mr. Ballard (Sholes), pay the amount demanded, and charge it to Gates, although Gates may have been employed as an attorney and have been guilty of a breach of the contract of employment; that, possibly, if plaintiff had contested his ejectment suit concerning the land to a conclusion and had been compelled to pay a certain amount for breach of his covenants of warranty, and the jury had found the employment to be as claimed, and the breach of it, he might have recovered such sum from the defendant Gates. I know of no legal objection, the facts being established, to the recovery by plaintiff in an action at law of this sum of money as money in the hands of the defendant Gates which, in equity and good conscience, belongs to plaintiff, and in my opinion the case should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions."

In case of a fraud perpetuated by means of the fiduciary relation of attorney and client a bill in equity will lie. Brainard v. Singo, 164 Ala. 353, 51 So. 522; Maloney v. Terry, 70 Ark. 189, 66 S. W. 919, 72 S. W. 570; Robinson v. Sharp, 201 Ill. 86, 66 N. E. 299; Kelly v. Allin, 212 Mass. 327, 99 N. E. 273; Broyles v. Arnold, 11 Heisk. (Tenn.) 484. Thus equity has jurisdiction of a bill by a client against his attorney charging that the latter, in settling a claim against the client, fraudulently procured and retained a greater sum from the client than was paid to settle the claim. Maloney v. Terry, 70 Ark. 189, 66 S. W. 919, 72 S. W. 570, wherein the court said: "We are asked to reverse only upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. The appellants contend that there was a complete and adequate remedy at law, and for that reason the court of chancery should have transferred the cause to the law court. For the purpose of this motion we must look only to the complaint, and treat its allegations as true. It sets up the trust relation, and shows that the money sued for was obtained through fraudulent representations, and was received and is held in fiduciary capacity. That was sufficient to give the chancery court jurisdiction. Having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it does not have to give it up because a court of law could also give complete and adequate redress."

The duty of an attorney to pay over money collected by him for his client rests in contract and is to be enforced by an action of assumpsit or its modern equivalent. Cameron v. Clarke, 11 Ala. 259; Ellis v. Henry, 5 J. J. Marsh (Ky.) 247; Houx v. Russell, 10 Mo. 246; Sackett v. Breen, 50 Hun 602 mem. 3 N. Y. S. 473; Jackson v. Moore, 72 App. Div. 217, 76 N. Y. S. 164; Bredin v. Kingland, 4 Watts (Pa.) 420; Campbell v. Boggs, 48 Pa. St. 524; Albright v. Mercer, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 63; Palmer v. Thompson, 4 Rich. L. (S. C.) 607. But see Albright v. Mercer, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 63. If there has been an actual conversion of the fund by the attorney the action for its recovery may sound in tort. Pratt v. Brewster, 52 Conn. 65; Tinkham v. Heyworth, 31 Ill. 519; Clegg v. Baumberger, 110 Ind. 539, 9 N. E. 700; Stage v. Stevens, 1 Denio (N. Y.) 267; Yates v. Blodgett, 8 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 278; Sinclair v. Higgins, 111 App. Div. 206, 97 N. Y. S. 415. And see Jones v. Winsor, 22 S. D. 480, 118 N. W. 716; Flanagan v. Pearson, 42 Tex. 1, 19 Am. Rep. 40. But a mere failure to pay over the proceeds of a collection, or a deposit thereof in a bank in the name of the attorney, is not sufficient to warrant an action in form for conversion. Jackson v. Moore, 72 App. Div. 217, 76 N. Y. S. 164; Gopen v. Crawford, 53 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 278; Pierce v. Palmer, 31 R. I. 432, Ann. Cas. 1912B 181, 77 Atl. 201; Cotton v. Sharpstein, 14 Wis. 226, 80 Am. Dec. 774. In Jackson v. Moore, supra, it was said: "Although the cause of action which the plaintiff set forth in her complaint is one based upon a tort entirely, viz., a clear claim that the defendant had converted to his own use certain specific moneys received by him from Keck for her, and which she claims has damaged her to the amount of $260.80, she has been allowed to recover, as upon an accounting, for such share of a fund that the defendant collected for herself and brothers as she upon this trial testified to be hers. This was a clear error. Such a recovery is based upon an entirely different liability from that set forth in the complaint. When an attorney collects a debt due to his client, he does not convert the money received by placing it in bank to his own credit, and mixing it with his own funds. The money so received is not the client's property, and the attorney's obligation regarding the same is one resting on contract merely,—to account for it, and pay over such sum as, upon an accounting, shall be found to be due from him thereon. And even if he neglects to so account and pay for a demand made, he is not liable in trover, as for a conversion of such amount. Walter v. Bennett, 16 N. Y. 250. Therefore, upon the facts as stated in the complaint, an action of trover could not be sustained against the defendant."

A bill of equity will not ordinarily lie in case of a failure to pay over the proceeds of a collection. Marsh v. Whitmore, 1 Hask. 391, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,122; Crothers v. Lee, 29 Ala. 337; Pfau v. Fullenwider, 102 Ill. App. 499. But if an attorney refuses to account as to money collected by him a bill for an accounting will lie.

Pennsylvania.—McDaniels v. Cutler, 3 Brews. 57.

The summary proceedings authorized by statute in most jurisdictions in case of a wrongful withholding by an attorney of money as property of his client are not available to a client complaining only of negligence or mismanagement on the part of his attorney. Lombard v. Whiting, Walk. (Miss.) 229, wherein it was said: "This being a summary remedy, given by statute, cannot be extended beyond the express letter. We are clearly of opinion that an attorney cannot be charged in this mode of proceeding for any misfeasance. And if the plaintiff has any ground of complaint, for an injury sustained by the compromise, he must resort to his action on the case." So in Banks v. Cage, 1 How. (Miss.) 293, the court said: "The defendants, as attorneys at law, acted out of the scope of their power, in receiving notes in satisfaction of the execution, but the notes received by them, cannot for that reason be considered as money. The plaintiff might have resorted to his action against them, but the summary remedy by motion, against an attorney, can only be sustained when he has actually collected the money, by course of law, and refuses to pay it over."

IX. Survival of Action.

The survival of an action for the negligence of an attorney is discussed in the note to Newman v. Gates, 6 Ann. Cas. 649, and no recent cases seem to have passed on this question.

X. Limitation of Action.

In the absence of fraud, the statute of limitations begins to run against a cause of action based on the negligence of an attorney from the time the cause of action accrues; that is, when the attorney commits an affirmative breach of the duty with which he is charged. Battley v. Faulkner, 3 B. & Ald. 288, 5 E. C. L. 288; Short v. McCarthy, 3 B. & Ald. 626, 5 E. C. L. 403; Granger v. George, 5 B. & C. 149, 11 E. C. L. 185; Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259, 11 E. C. L. 219; Sheriff v. Bradshaw, 1 Cro. Eliz. 53; Smith v. Fox, 6 Hare 386, 12 Jur. 130; Rhines v. Evans, 66 Pa. St. 195, 5 Am. Rep. 365; Lawall v. Groman, 180 Pa. St. 532, 37 Atl. 98, 57 Am. St. Rep. 662; Smith v. Owen, 7 Lea 53. Compare Glenn v. Cuttle, 2 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 273; Derrickson v. Cady, 7 Pa. St. 27; McDowell v. Potter, 8 Pa. St. 189, 49 Am. Dec. 503; Downey v. Garard, 24 Pa. St. 52. In Cornell v. Edsen, 78 Wash. 662, 139 Pac. 602, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 279, it was said: "All that appellant is here seeking is damages claimed to have been suffered because of the wrongful act of respondent. The action is plainly one based upon a breach of duty growing out of the relation existing between the parties, a contractual relation which calls for a full disclosure; and when by reason of the failure to make a full and complete disclosure, or the withholding or concealment of facts which should have been disclosed, loss is suffered, there is a breach of duty, and for such breach an action will lie. But, like any other action founded upon a breach of duty imposed either by law or contract, the action arises out of the breach, and the statute of limitations begins to run from the time of the breach and not from the time of its discovery. No action lies for speaking an untruth, unless, by virtue of the relation between the parties, the law imposes the duty of speaking the truth. No action lies for concealment, unless the law imposes the duty of disclosure. In this case the duty is one growing out of the relation between the parties and that relation is one based upon contract. The relation, it is true, is fiduciary, but that does not disturb the fact that it is contractual, and that a cause of action based upon the breach of the contract accrues when the contract is violated and not when the violation is discovered." In Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. 172, 7 U. S. (L. ed.) 821, it was said: "The only question in the case is, whether the statute runs from the time the action accrued, or from the time that the damage is developed or becomes definite. And this we hardly feel at liberty to treat as an open question. It is not a case of consequential damages, in the technical acceptance of those terms, such as the case of Gillon v. Boddington, 1 C. & P. (Eng.) 541, 11 E. C. L. 463, in which the digging near the plaintiff's foundation was the cause of the injury; for in that instance no right or control was violated, and by possibility the act might have proved harmless, as it would have been had the wall never fallen. Nor is it analogous to the case of a nuisance; since the nuisance of to-day is a substantive cause of action, and not the same with the nuisance of yesterday, any more than an assault and battery. The ground of action here, is a contract to act diligently and skilfully; and both the contract and the breach of it admit of a definite assignment of date. When might this action have been instituted, is the question: for from that time the statute must run. When the attorney was chargeable with negligence or unskilfulness, his contract was violated, and the action might have been sustained immediately. Perhaps, in that event, no more than nominal damages may be proved, and no more recovered, but on the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the proof of actual damage may extend to facts that occur and grow out of the injury, even up to the day of the verdict. If so, it is clear the damage is not the cause of action."

Of course, where the attorney conceals from his client the facts which constitute the cause of action, the running of the statute will begin only from the discovery thereof by the client. Voss v. Bachop, 5 Kan. 67; Compare Cornell v. Edsen, supra. As to what constitutes such a concealment, see the note to Fortune v. English, 9 Ann. Cas. 77.

In actions charging an attorney with negligence in failing to collect his client's claims, the statute of limitations begins to run after the lapse of a reasonable time in which the claim might either have been collected, or proceedings to enforce the collection might have been instituted. Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. 172, 7 U. S. (L. ed.) 821; Mardis v. Shackelford, 4 Ala. 493; McArthur v. Baker, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 441; Downey v. Garard, 24 Pa. St. 52; Morrison v. Mullin, 34 Pa. St. 17; Barton v. Dickens, 48 Pa. St. 518; Campbell v. Boggs, 48 Pa. St. 524; Rhines v. Evans, 66 Pa. St. 192, 5 Am. Rep. 365. In the case last cited, it was said: "As the case stands, then, Evans took no step whatever to collect the due bill of $365, and Rhines has lost his money. Under these circumstances, when did the statute of limitations begin to run? All the authorities agree in this, that it began when the cause of action first arose—that is, when Evans first became liable to Rhines for neglecting to collect the money: Campbell v. Boggs [48 Pa. St.] 524; Downey v. Garard [24 Pa. St.] 52; Morrison v. Mullin [34 Pa. St.] 17; Barton v. Dickens [48 Pa. St.] 518. But when did Evans become liable to Rhines for neglect of duty? It is clear he did not at the date of the receipt, for that would allow no time to perform the duty. Clearly a reasonable time must be allowed to begin. The attorney must be invested with some discretion in the absence of peremptory instructions. As remarked by the present chief justice, Morrison's Administrator v. Mullin, supra, 'to give effect to the spirit of the statute, the law sometimes, in the absence of stipulation by the parties, fixes the time when the cause of action shall be taken to have accrued, by the diligence required of the party. When the time for doing an act necessarily precedent to bringing a suit is indefinite, it allows a reasonable time. When that reasonable time has elapsed, the duty of diligence begins.' What is a reasonable time is a question most frequently dependent on circumstances, and therefore to be submitted in such cases to the jury. In the case of Livingston v. Cox, 6 [Pa. St.] 360, a suit against a debtor in failing circumstances seems to have been held an unreasonable time, and the plaintiff Cox recovered against Livingston. And where the duty is immediate, as in the collection of money, the right of action accrues and the statute begins to run from the time of the attorney's receipt of the money, even though he gives no notice of its collection, the law deeming it gross negligence on part of the creditor to neglect to make inquiry for six years, unless the attorney has been guilty of concealment or of some act to put his client off his guard. Ann. Cas. 1917B.—4.

Such is the modern doctrine qualifying and to some extent overruling McDowell v. Potter, 8 [Pa. St.] 189, and some previous cases. See Campbell v. Boggs [48 Pa. St.] 524; Downey v. Garard [24 Pa. St.] 52, and authorities therein cited. The same duty of diligence on part of the creditor to prevent the bar of the statute is to be found in analogous cases; as where a call for instalments under a subscription to stock is necessary: Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. v. Byers [32 Pa. St.] 22. See also Morrison v. Mullin, supra. Let us examine then, in view of these principles, the facts of the case before us. Evans received the note for collection on the 10th of February, 1858, and this suit was not commenced against him until seven years and five months had elapsed. Was the period of one year and five months sufficient to enable the court to say as a matter of law that the delay by Evans for that time to take any steps toward collection was unreasonable? Doubtless it was in the power of Rhines to show, if the facts were so, that during this time Evans had proceeded diligently, and that the lack of diligence occurred afterward during the period of the remaining six years; or to show that Evans had given him false information or otherwise misled him, and thus to prevent the bar of the statute. But as the case stands before us Evans did nothing whatever, and Rhines remained quiescent during this whole period of seven years and five months. Under these circumstances what was to be left to the jury? There were no facts, no circumstances to enable them to determine the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the delay except the mere lapse of time, and this was fully within the knowledge of the court. It became, therefore, a question of law for the court to decide, and surely it is not a difficult question to determine, for no one could assert that it is reasonable the attorney should delay seventeen months without taking a step or that the creditor should delay seven years and five months without making an inquiry or bringing a suit."

Where a claim is lost through the misconduct or fraud of an attorney with whom a collection agency has intrusted it for collection, and the replies of the agency to inquiries made are calculated to throw the claimants off their guard, the statute of limitations begins to run against the claimants only from the time of their discovery of the fraud. Morgan v. Tener, 83 Pa. St. 305.

With respect to the time when the statute of limitations begins to run against an action by the client to recover money collected by an attorney, see the notes to Goodyear Metallic Rubber Co. v. Baker, 15 Ann. Cas. 1207, and Ott v. Hood, Ann. Cas. 1914C 836.

Actions against attorneys for negligence being, in most instances, based on the theory of a breach of contract on the part of the attorney, the statute of limitations, governing the time within which such actions may be brought, may be set up by the attorney by way of defense. Where the negligence charged cannot be said to be a breach of contract, the statute of limitations applicable to torts generally would apply. Mardis v. Shackelford, 4 Ala. 493; Foulks v. Falls, 91 Ind. 315; Cook v. Rives, 13 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 329, 53 Am. Dec. 88; People v. Brotherson, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 602; Thomas v. Ervin, Cheves L. (S. C.) 22, 34 Am. Dec. 586; Smith v. Owen, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 53; Bruce v. Baxter, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 479; Hawkins v. Walker, 4 Yerg. (Tenn.) 188. In Foulks v. Falls, supra, the court, after stating the duties of an attorney to his client, said: "It is not the duty of attorneys to make affidavits in attachment proceedings. They sometimes do so, but the propriety of such course has always been doubted by the profession, and in some instances the right has been questioned. Such a practice should be discouraged rather than imposed as a duty. See Abbott v. Zeigler, 9 Ind. 511. It clearly would be unreasonable to hold that under a general employment, such as the contract in this case makes, it is the duty of the attorney to furnish a bond and incur the personal liability that might result therefrom. The propriety of lawyers signing bonds for their clients has always been questioned, and many courts have adopted rules absolutely prohibiting it. See Ohio, etc. R. Co. v. Hardy, 64 Ind. 454. The employment and contract imposed no duty upon appellant to make and execute such affidavit and bond; nor would positive instructions from appellee requiring such services have imposed such duty. The undertaking of the attorney is to perform such services as properly belong to the profession; such as the client, for want of learning and skill, cannot himself perform; but it does not require him to assume the burdens and risk of both attorney and client."

PRICE ET AL.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Fourth Circuit—February 29, 1916.

231 Fed. 397.

Attorneys — Liability for Negligence.

In a suit against an attorney for negligence, plaintiff must prove the attorney's employment, his neglect of a reasonable duty, and that such negligence resulted in and was the proximate cause of loss to the client.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In a suit against an attorney for negligence, the test of the sufficiency of the declaration is whether its allegations, if proved, would make out a case, and, if proof of the facts alleged as to the negligence and resulting loss would establish a cause of action, the declaration is not demurrable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action by a liability insurer, the declaration alleged that defendants had been for several years plaintiff's retained attorneys, that plaintiff notified them of an action against a policyholder and directed them to enter an appearance and instructed them to make such defense and take such steps as should be necessary to prevent a judgment, that they neglected to do so and a default judgment was recovered, and that plaintiff attempted to settle the suit, and could have settled it for $2,000 if the default judgment had not been rendered. It is held that while defendants were not advised of any facts constituting a defense, and it was not even alleged that there was a defense or that plaintiff intended to defend on the merits, and the inference was permissible that plaintiff's real purpose was to have a formal appearance or plea entered which would prevent a judgment for a time and enable plaintiff to make an advantageous settlement, the declaration sufficiently showed defendants' employment by plaintiff.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In a liability insurer's action against its attorneys for negligence, the declaration alleged the bringing of an action for injuries against a policyholder, that plaintiff was bound to indemnify the policyholder against loss not exceeding $5,000 and was bound to defend the suit at its own expense, that it instructed defendants to enter an appearance and make a defense, that it attempted to settle the suit and could have settled it if a default judgment had not been rendered, that defendants failed to enter an appearance or make any defense, and that by reason thereof a judgment for $15,000 was rendered by default, and that plaintiff was bound to pay the amount thereof. It is held that in the absence of any allegation that the policyholder had a defense to the action for injuries, or that the injured person was not justly entitled to recover $15,000, the declaration stated no cause of action, as it was not shown that if the attorneys had made a proper defense no judgment or a judgment for a less sum would have been recovered, and while it did allege that plaintiff was bound to pay the default judgment, though for more than its limited liability, there was no disclosure of facts showing such liability, and the allegation stated only a conclusion of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Though nominal damages were recoverable for the attorneys' failure to do anything whatever, the declaration nevertheless failed to show that the amount involved gave a federal court jurisdiction, since, where the pleadings show that there cannot legally be a judgment for an amount necessary to give jurisdiction, jurisdiction cannot attach, though the damages are laid in the declaration at a larger sum.

[See note at end of this case.]

In a liability insurer's action against attorneys, an amended declaration alleged the bringing of an action for injuries against a policyholder, that plaintiff was bound to indemnify the policyholder against loss not exceeding $5,000 and to defend the suit, that defendants were instructed to appear and defend but neglected to do so and by reason of such neglect a judgment for $15,000 was rendered by default which plaintiff was bound to and did pay, that defendants knew that plaintiff's liability was limited and that it was obliged to defend the suit, that if they had appeared and made a defense plaintiff's liability would have been only $5,000, though the judgment against the policyholder might exceed that amount, and that their negligence was the direct cause of loss to plaintiff of the difference between $5,000 and the amount of the judgment. It is held that, in the absence of any allegation that the policyholder had a meritorious defense which would have defeated a recovery or reduced the amount of the judgment, the declaration was insufficient, since it did not show that plaintiff was under any obligation to pay in excess of $5,000, as the allegation that it was compelled to pay the judgment was a mere conclusion of law without any facts to justify it, and it was evident that it was not liable to the policyholder for more than $5,000 if the policyholder had no meritorious defense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Liability Insurance — Failure of Insurer to Defend Suit — Liability to Insured.

The holder of a liability insurance policy, under which the insurer was bound to indemnify the policyholder against loss not exceeding $5,000 and to defend a suit at its own expense, could not recover more than $5,000 because of the insurer's failure to defend an action resulting in a default judgment for $15,000 without alleging and proving a meritorious defense to the action against it.

Same.

A liability insurer suing its attorneys for negligence in failing to defend an action against a policyholder resulting in a default judgment for $15,000 had the burden of showing that the party recovering the judgment did not have a valid claim against the policyholder for $15,000.

Pleading — Amendment Properly Refused.

A liability insurer suing its attorneys for negligence in failing to defend an action for injuries against a policyholder alleged that it was bound to indemnify the policyholder against loss not exceeding $5,000 and to defend the suit, that by reason of the attorneys' negligence a default judgment was rendered for $15,000, and that it could have settled for no more than $2,000 if the default judgment had not been rendered. An amended declaration proceeded on the theory that the attorneys' failure to defend made plaintiff liable for the full amount of the default judgment and sought to recover the difference between the amount of the judgment and $5,000. After the sustaining of a demurrer to the amended declaration, it asked leave to amend further by striking out the averment that it could have settled for not exceeding $2,000 had the judgment not been rendered. It is held that it was not error to refuse to allow this amendment, where it was not shown that the allegation sought to be stricken was inadvertently made, or that it was not in precise accordance with the facts established, as in one aspect of the case the facts averred would defeat a recovery if there was no meritorious defense to the action against the policyholder because the action would not then involve the jurisdictional amount.

Error to United States District Court, Southern District of West Virginia: KEL-LEB, Judge.

Action by Maryland Casualty Company, plaintiff, against George E. Price et al., partners, doing business as Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay, defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Sitting: PRITCHARD, KNAPP and WOODS, Circuit Judges.

[400] KNAPP, J.—The Maryland Casualty Company brings this suit for damages alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendants as attorneys at law employed by the plaintiff. The averments of the declaration filed January 6, 1915, may be summarized as follows:

That one Gail V. Lynch brought an action against the Wylie Permanent Camping Company to recover the sum of $15,000 for personal injuries received by her in August, 1908, while a passenger on one of the camping company's coaches in Yellowstone Park; that under its contract of insurance the plaintiff was bound to indemnify the camping company against any loss suffered by it in such suit, not exceeding $5,000, and was also bound to defend the suit at its own expense; that the defendants, who had been for several years the retained attorneys of plaintiff, were instructed by it to enter an appearance for the camping company in the suit of Mrs. Lynch, and to make such defense and take such steps as might be needful to prevent a judgment; that the defendants thereupon advised plaintiff that it was not necessary to enter an appearance at rules to avoid a default judgment, but that they would look after the case for the plaintiff and keep it advised in regard thereto; that the plaintiff, relying upon its attorneys to discharge their duty in the premises, attempted to settle the suit of Mrs. Lynch, and could have settled the same for not more than $2,000, if a default judgment in her favor had not been rendered; that the defendants wholly failed and neglected to enter an appearance or make any plea or defense in the action against the camping company, and that by reason of such neglect a judgment for $15,000, besides interest and costs, was rendered by default; that under its contract of insurance the plaintiff was bound to and did pay the amount of said judgment, amounting to about $20,000, and that said judgment would not have been rendered, and plaintiff would not have had to pay the same, except for the negligence of defendants; and that they thereby became indebted to plaintiff in the sum mentioned.

To this declaration a demurrer was interposed which was sustained by the court below, chiefly upon the ground that the declaration failed to allege properly that plaintiff had suffered any damages by reason of the negligence of defendants, and that it was necessary, in order to make out a case, to allege that the camping company had a good defense to Mrs. Lynch's action or allege that a less sum would have been recovered in that action but for the negligence of defendants.

The plaintiff then filed an amended declaration which repeated all the allegations of the original and added averments to the following effect: That the defendants by reason of their former employment knew that the liability of plaintiff under its contract of insurance was limited, and that by the terms of said contract the plaintiff was obligated to defend the Lynch suit; that the defendants were employed for that purpose; that, if they had appeared for the camping company and made a defense, the extent of the plaintiff's liability would have been only $5,000, although the judgment against the camping company might exceed that amount; and that the negligent failure of defendants to enter an appearance and defend the Lynch suit was the direct [401] cause of loss to the plaintiff of the difference between $5,000, its maximum liability under the policy, and the $20,000 default judgment which it paid.

The defendants demurred to the amended declaration, and this demurrer was sustained by the court for reasons stated in its opinion.

The plaintiff then asked leave to further amend its declaration by striking out the averment that it could have settled the Lynch Case, but for the fact that a default judgment was obtained, for an amount not exceeding $2,000. The court refused to allow this amendment on the ground that it did not appear that the allegation sought to be stricken out had been inadvertently inserted, and because that allegation was an admission of fact which affected the cause of action and the jurisdiction of the court. These rulings are challenged in the assignments of error.

In a suit against an attorney for negligence, the plaintiff must prove three things in order to recover: (1) The attorney's employment; (2) his neglect of a reasonable duty; and (3) that such negligence resulted in and was the proximate cause of loss to the client. And the test of the sufficiency of the declaration in such a suit is whether its allegations, if proven, would make out a case. In other words, if proof of the facts alleged as to negligence and resulting loss would establish a cause of action, the declaration is not demurrable.

With reference to these requirements, we hold that the fact of employment in this case is sufficiently pleaded, though a word of comment upon the averments in that regard may not be unsuitable. The declaration does not allege that the defendants were employed in this particular case, but that under their general employment they were notified of its pendency and directed to take certain action therein. The averment is this:

"This plaintiff notified the defendants of the institution and pendency of said action and directed said defendants as attorneys at law for and representing this plaintiff to enter an appearance on behalf of said Wylie Permanent Camping Company, defendant in said action so brought and pending as aforesaid, and instructed its said attorneys, the defendants herein, to make such defense and take such steps as should be necessary to prevent a judgment being rendered therein against said Wylie Permanent Camping Company; and plaintiff says that it became and was the duty of said defendants and each of them to enter an appearance in said action for the said Wylie Permanent Camping Company and do any and all other things of a legal professional character that were necessary to make up the issue in said action and defend against the judgment therein sought by said Gail V. Lynch."

It will be observed that the defendants are not advised of any facts which would constitute a defense in whole or in part to the suit against the camping company. It is not even stated that there was a defense to the suit, or that the plaintiff intended to defend it on the merits. Indeed, when the declaration is carefully read, and reference is made to what is said about the sum for which the case could have been settled, the inference is certainly permissible that the real purpose of plaintiff was to have a formal appearance or plea entered, which would for the time being prevent a judgment and thus enable plaintiff to effect an advantageous settlement. However, as already said, we do [402] not at all doubt that the declaration sufficiently shows the employment of defendants.

The neglect of a reasonable duty on the part of defendants under their employment is amply alleged, and no question is made as to the sufficiency of the declaration in that regard.

The case then comes to the question whether the averments of the declaration, if proven as set out, would establish that the negligence of defendants resulted in and was the proximate cause of loss to the plaintiff. In other words, does the pleading meet the third requirement above stated by sufficient allegations?

We think it clear that the original declaration does not allege sufficient facts to charge the defendants with liability, because it does not show that plaintiff suffered any damage by reason of their negligence. It is not alleged that if the attorneys had appeared and made a proper defense there would have been no judgment against the camping company, or that the judgment would have been for a less sum. The averment is merely that the default judgment would not have been rendered if defendants had not failed to appear; and the declaration nowhere alleges that the camping company had any defense to the action of Mrs. Lynch, or that she was not justly entitled to recover $15,000, on account of her injuries. It is true that the declaration alleges that plaintiff under its contract of insurance was bound to and did pay the default judgment. But it does not allege how or why, or under what contract provisions, this obligation was incurred. It merely avers that plaintiff was liable to indemnify the camping company against any loss up to $5,000, and that it was bound to defend at its own expense the suit of Mrs. Lynch. In short, there is no disclosure of facts on which the liability is predicated, and therefore the averment at most states only a conclusion of law. It follows that the original declaration was properly held to be insufficient because it does not allege that the camping company had a meritorious defense to the Lynch suit, which the defendants negligently failed to interpose, and that she would not have recovered a judgment, or that such judgment would have been for a much less amount, if the defendants had not failed to discharge the duties of their employment.

We are satisfied that this conclusion is in accord with the weight of authority, although there is some conflict in the reported decisions. Among the cases which sustain the views we have expressed are Harter v. Morris, 18 Ohio St. 492; Bruce v. Baxter, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 477; Spangler v. Sellers, 5 Fed. 882; Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. 199; Goldzier v. Poole, 82 Ill. App. 469; Vooth v. McEachen, 181 N. Y. 29, 73 N. E. 488, 2 Ann. Cas. 601; Gabbert v. Evans, 184 Mo. App. 283, 166 S. W. 635. The rule established by these cases is to the effect that suits against attorneys for negligence are governed by the same principles as apply in other negligent actions. If an attorney, in disregard of his duty, neglects to appear in a suit against his client, with the result that a default judgment is taken, it does not follow that the client has suffered damage, because the judgment may be entirely just, and one that would have been rendered notwithstanding the efforts of the attorney to prevent it. It is said that [403] there is a difference between the case of an attorney who fails to do anything for his client, and one who makes an inexcusable mistake in attempting to comply with instructions; but we do not perceive any basis in principle for such a distinction. In either case the burden is upon the client to prove the damages he has suffered. Some of the cases hold that nominal damages may be recovered if the attorney fails to do anything whatever; but such a holding would not avail the plaintiff here, because upon that theory the amount involved would be insufficient to give the court jurisdiction. Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. 170 U. S. 468, 18 S. Ct. 645, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 1111. In that case the Supreme Court said:

"In determining from the face of a pleading whether the amount really in dispute is sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon a court of the United States, it is settled that, if from the nature of the case as stated in the pleadings there could not legally be a judgment for an amount necessary to the jurisdiction, jurisdiction cannot attach even though the damages be laid in the declaration at a larger sum. Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550, 560, 6 S. Ct. 501, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 729, 732; Wilson v. Daniel, 3 Dall. 401, 407, 1 U. S. (L. ed.) 655, 657."

As above stated, the original declaration was held demurrable because it did not allege that there was a meritorious defense to the Lynch suit which would have defeated recovery, or reduced the amount of the judgment, if the defendants had not failed to perform their duty. The amended declaration likewise omits these averments, and plaintiff contends that the necessity for making them is avoided by the added allegations of the amendment, the substance of which has been already recited. The contention advanced is set forth in the brief as follows:

"It must be borne in mind, however, that this suit is not by the defendant against whom the default judgment was rendered, but is by a casualty company with a limited liability, and the obligation to defend. This is important because it makes it unnecessary to charge that the actual defendant had a good defense to the action in which the default judgment was rendered. The defense which the attorneys were employed to make, if proper skill was used in and attention given thereto, would not affect the liability of the casualty company as to any sum above the $5,000 maximum liability under the policy."

It will thus be seen that under the amended declaration plaintiff seeks only to recover what it paid out in satisfaction of the default judgment in excess of its contract liability of $5,000. The right to recover this excess is based on the ground that, if plaintiff had performed its obligation to defend the Lynch suit, the extent of its liability would have been $5,000, even if there were no defense to that suit; that this obligation to defend was committed to defendants; and that by reason of their neglect the plaintiff suffered damages to the amount of the difference between $5,000 and the sum actually paid in satisfaction of the default judgment. It is sought in this way to avoid the necessity of proving that there was a meritorious defense to the Lynch suit. Indeed, the plaintiff says in effect that it does not at all matter whether or not there was a defense to that suit, since the defendants knew or should have known the character and extent of its obligation, and are therefore liable for the excess over $5,000.

We are persuaded that this contention, however plausible, will not bear the test of close examination. The declaration avers that the [404] plaintiff, by virtue of its contract of insurance, was under an absolute liability of $5,000, and also under a contingent liability arising out of its obligation to defend any suit against the insured. It does not attempt to recover the $5,000 paid on account of its absolute liability, because for that purpose it would have to show that the judgment would have been for less than $5,000 if the attorneys had defended the suit. But it says that it would not have been obliged to pay in excess of the $5,000, which was paid on account of its absolute liability, except for the negligence of defendants, as it was compelled to pay this excess because of the breach of its obligation to defend. But the difficulty is that the declaration fails to allege any facts which show that the plaintiff was under obligation to pay in excess of $5,000. True, the declaration alleges that by reason of the negligence of defendants the plaintiff breached its contract to defend any suit against the camping company, and that in consequence it was compelled to pay the default judgment. But the allegation that it was compelled to pay the default judgment is clearly a non sequitur, because no facts are stated which show how or why it was compelled to pay that judgment, except the averment that it violated its obligation to defend the suit. This is at best a mere conclusion of law without the disclosure of any facts which justify the conclusion.

It seems evident that the contingent liability of plaintiff for breach of contract to defend the Lynch suit could not exceed the damages suffered by the camping company because the suit against it was not defended; and manifestly that damage is the difference between the default judgment and the judgment which would have been rendered if the suit had been properly defended. But if there was no defense to that suit, and none of any sort is alleged by the plaintiff, there would be no difference because on that assumption the default judgment is the same as or no greater than the judgment which would have been recovered if defense had been made, and therefore no damage has been suffered by the camping company. If this be a correct analysis of the situation, it follows that the default judgment, so far as it exceeded $5,000, was paid without legal liability and cannot be recovered from defendants.

This appears from another point of view. If the camping company sued plaintiff to recover the amount of the default judgment, it would have to allege and prove, in order to recover more than $5,000, substantially the same facts that we think the plaintiff must allege and prove in this action. In either case, it would be necessary to allege and prove a meritorious defense to the Lynch suit. In other words, it comes to the question of which party must assume the burden of proof, and we are constrained to hold that the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that Mrs. Lynch did not have a valid claim against the camping company for $15,000, and that she would have failed to secure a judgment, or only secured one for a less amount, if her suit had been defended. For this reason we are of opinion that the new averments in the amended declaration do not avoid the necessity of alleging and proving that there was a meritorious defense to the Lynch suit, which if duly interposed would have defeated the action or reduced [405] the judgment, and the amended declaration is therefore demurrable because it does not so allege.

The remaining question needs but a word of comment. We are convinced that the court below did not err in refusing to allow plaintiff to further amend its declaration by striking out the following averment:

"Plaintiff avers that it could have compromised and settled the claim upon which the said action of Gail V. Lynch against Wyllie Permanent Camping Company was instituted by the payment of a sum of money not in excess of $2,000, up to the time that the default judgment was rendered in said action as hereinafter set forth."

It is not shown that this allegation was inadvertently made, or that it is not in precise accordance with the facts. Moreover, in one aspect of the case, the facts averred would defeat plaintiff's right to recover, if there were no meritorious defense to the Lynch suit, because the jurisdictional amount would not then be involved. The state and federal statutes quoted by plaintiff are clearly designed to prevent injustice on account of formal defects in pleading, and to permit liberal amendments to cure such defects; and this purpose is emphasized in the authorities cited. We have carefully examined these statutes and decisions and are satisfied that they do not support the plaintiff's contention. Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case lays down the rule that for negligence in the discharge of a professional duty an attorney is liable only for the damage actually sustained by his client, and that the amount of that damage must be proved and not left to conjecture as to the possible outcome of litigation had the negligent act not been performed. The liability of an attorney for negligence is discussed in the note to McLellan v. Fuller, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

Appeal from District Court, Leavenworth county.

Action by Jennie B. Withers, plaintiff, against Caroline A. Barnes et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

William Dill, William W. Hooper and Elijah Robinson for appellant.

A. E. Dempsey, Floyd E. Harper and Stewart Taylor for appellees.

[798] DAWSON, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court of Leavenworth county in an action brought by Jennie B. Withers against her sister Caroline A. Barnes and her brother Hiram Wilson Barnes to recover an interest in certain real estate, apparently the family domicile, conveyed to Caroline by her father, Delos N. Barnes. The brother disclaimed any interest in the property and alleged that it belonged to his sister Caroline by virtue of a valid deed executed and delivered to her during their father's lifetime.

The father had been a man of considerable property. [799] His will disposed of extensive land holdings and city lots in the counties of Leavenworth, Wyandotte and Sedgwick in this state and in Platte and Jackson counties in Missouri. The beneficiaries were his son Hiram and his three daughters, Mrs. Jennie B. Withers, Miss Caroline A. Barnes and Miss Jessie Barnes. To the casual reader of the will, no great departure from an equitable division of the property between his children is apparent. The division would appear sufficient to make them all well-to-do. The plaintiff married about 1882. The mother died in 1893, and Caroline remained single and kept house for her father until his death in 1912. The will was executed February 2, 1903. The deed to the disputed property was in terms of general warranty and in part recited:

"This indenture made this 1st day of April, 1904, between Delos N. Barnes, a widower of Leavenworth, in the county of Leavenworth and the state of Kansas, of the first part, and Jessie Barnes and Caroline A. Barnes, or the survivor, of the second part."

At that time the daughter Jessie was an invalid, and she died June 3, 1907. A few days after her death, the father handed some deeds to Caroline saying:

"Here are some deeds I want you to have. These deeds have to be delivered. You take these down to Mr. Dempsey and get a receipt for them. . . . I suppose now you will be marrying some good-for-nothing fellow and turn me out of doors."

Caroline followed her father's instructions and Mr. Dempsey kept the deed until after the death of Mr. Barnes in March, 1912, when it was recorded. During the period between the making of his will and his demise Mr. Barnes made some other deeds to Caroline and the others, but with their consent he at various times sold some of such properties to third parties. Obviously this must have been done before any such deeds to his children were recorded and perhaps before they were delivered.

[800] The testimony of Mr. Dempsey, in whose custody the deed was placed by Caroline by the advice or direction of her father, is also pertinent on the question of delivery, and that question is the determining factor in this lawsuit. Mr. Dempsey's testimony, abridged, reads:

"I am a practicing attorney in the city of Leavenworth since the fall of 1894, starting in to practice here; I occupied offices with Judge Gillpatrick; he went on the bench in 1900, but for some years after that he made the same office his headquarters; he and the deceased, Delos N. Barnes, were close friends, and the latter often called at the office to visit with the judge, and I got quite well acquainted with him; sometimes when Judge Gillpatrick was not present he would engage in conversation with me; the only matter that had a legal phase that he discussed with me was in connection with these deeds I have mentioned here; that was perhaps along in 1904, I can't fix the date exactly; on more than one occasion he mentioned the matter of drawing up deeds for his two girls, who were at home, and he said he had consulted with Judge Gillpatrick and Senator Baker whether it would be legal to make deeds and leave them in the hands of someone for these girls, or whether it might be better for him to deliver the deeds direct to them. The first time that I knew that he had made any deeds was when Miss Carrie Barnes brought them to my office some time in 1907; she came with these deeds to my office and left them with me to keep for her, and I gave her a duplicate receipt for them, and kept a copy of the receipt myself. . . . These deeds remained in my possession until they were recorded, at the direction of Caroline A. Barnes.

"I met Mr. Barnes several times after the deeds were left with me by Miss Caroline, but he never mentioned anything about them."

The jury made special findings of fact, and in accordance therewith the district court gave judgment for defendant Caroline A. Barnes.

The principal contentions of counsel for appellant are, (1) that the evidence proved no proper delivery of [801] the deed; and (2) that if the deed conveyed title to Caroline, it was only an undivided half interest.

We have recited the main facts upon which the ultimate fact of delivery depends. The deed was executed to Jessie and Caroline, or the survivor, in 1904. The father retained possession of the deed until after the death of Jessie in 1907. There was therefore no delivery as to Jessie. After Jessie died he gave the deed to Caroline under the circumstances narrated by her and it was deposited with Mr. Dempsey as testified by him. Did this constitute a delivery? The district court so found. Was there any reservation of control of that deed by the father? No such evidence is adduced. What are the inferences? That the father was not doing a useless or futile thing; that he intended the ordinary consequences of his acts; and these also are in keeping with his conversations with witnesses that he intended that Jessie and Caroline, who had stayed at home and kept house for him, should have the home place. They are also in harmony with his proved purpose that Caroline, who had the care of Jessie, the invalid, should have that property. These conversations were after the deed was executed in 1904 and before its delivery in 1907, and were competent under all the rules of evidence.

The judgment of the district court on this question cannot be disturbed.

What merit is there to the contention of appellant that Caroline should only take a half interest in the property? The conveyance was to Jessie and Caroline, or the survivor. We have already noticed that Jessie had died before the delivery of the deed. The grant to Jessie failed also because a conveyance cannot be made to a dead person. But it is urged that section 2966 of the General Statutes of 1909, which abolished survivorship in joint tenancies, nullifies the words "or the survivor" in this conveyance. We think not. Considering the circumstances, the intent of this conveyance [802] is as plain as the noonday sun. The father intended that these two daughters, or the survivor of them, should have the family domicile. He was not concerned about the intricacies of a form of land holding which had been abolished in Kansas. If both daughters had lived until delivery of the deed, they would be technically tenants in common—merely the owners in fee simple. Since one of them died, the survivor of them took the entire fee in strict accord with the language of the grant. Section 2966 of the General Statutes of 1909 abolished joint tenancies and the doctrine of survivorship by operation of law. It would be far-fetched indeed to hold that the grantor of a fee could not purposely make a conveyance which would confer common ownership on two grantees or the entire fee on one of them upon the death of the other.

The judgment is affirmed.

I. Introductory.

The purpose of the present note is to show, by a review of the cases, the rule of the common law of England with respect to the question whether the creation of an estate in two or more owners resulted in a joint tenancy or in a tenancy in common, to show the trend away from the rules of the early common law, the changes therein by the courts and by statute, and the present status of those two estates in the law. The note confines itself strictly to a consideration of joint tenancy and tenancy in common, excluding consideration of coparcenary, jointure, and entireties. Cases treating of the attributes and distinguishing characteristics of the various estates in cotenancy, and of the rights of cotenants have not been included, except where a decision has been made on the specific question whether a given cotenancy was joint or in common.

The note excludes, therefore, cases dealing with the following questions: (1) Whether a devise creates a life estate and remainder or a joint tenancy; (2) whether an estate is an estate tail or a joint tenancy; (3) whether property of partners is partnership property or in common; (4) whether an estate is held in severalty or in common; (5) whether an estate is held in severalty or jointly; (6) the devolution of joint tenancies; (7) the creation of tenancy in common by the destruction of the unities of a joint tenancy; (8) community property; (9) coparcenary; (10) jointure; (11) entirety.

For cases relating to a joint deposit in a bank as creating a joint tenancy, see the note to Kennedy v. McMurray, Ann. Cas. 1916D 515; and for a discussion of the question of a devise to persons "jointly" as creating a joint tenancy, see the note to Overheiser v. Lackey, Ann. Cas. 1914C 229.

II. In England.

1. AT LAW.

At the early common law the general rule was that a transfer of an estate to two or more grantees, in the absence of an expressed intention to sever the interests, was deemed to create a joint tenancy rather than a tenancy in common. The law favored joint tenancy rather than tenancy in common, because the latter estate tended to split up feudal services and hence to disorganize the feudal military system. Fisher v. Wigg, 1 Salk. 391; Ward v. Everet, 1 Ld. Raym. 422; 2 Blk. Com. 180, 193. In Fisher v. Wigg, supra, it was said, as indirectly quoted in the report of the opinion: "Joint tenancies were favored, for the law loves not fractions of estates, nor to divide and multiply tenures. N. B. Whilst the estate continues in joint tenancy, there is no alteration of the tenure. But if you turn it into a tenancy in common, all the entire services multiply." And Sir William Blackstone said, on this point: "Now if an estate be given to a plurality of persons, without adding any restrictive, exclusive, or explanatory words, as if an estate be granted to A and B and their heirs, this makes them immediately joint tenants in fee of the lands. For the law interprets the grant so as to make all parts of it take effect, which can only be done by creating an equal estate in them both. . . .

A tenancy in common may also be created by express limitation in a deed; but here care must be taken not to insert words which imply a joint estate; and then if lands be given to two or more, and it be not joint tenancy, it must be a tenancy in common. But the law is apt in its constructions to favor joint tenancy rather than tenancy in common; because the divisible services issuing from land (as rent, etc.) are not divided, nor the entire services (as fealty) multiplied by joint tenancy, as they must necessarily be upon a tenancy in common." 2 Blk. Com. 180, 193.

Thus a settlement of lands on a husband and wife for life, remainder to the heirs of both their bodies, simpliciter, without further qualifying words, has been held to create a joint tenancy, with survivorship, among the children of the marriage. Staples v. Maurice, 4 Bro. P. C. 580, wherein it was said: "There is nothing hard, severe, or unreasonable in the law of joint tenancy, there being always an equal chance of survivorship in all the joint tenants; and wherever that equality does not subsist, as between a corporation and a private person, there can be no joint tenancy. If any of the joint tenants have a bad opinion of their own lives, they may sever the joint tenancy and destroy the right of survivorship, by a deed granting their respective shares in trust for themselves, or may enter into covenants not to take advantage of each other by survivorship. But if the joint tenancy be not severed, it is an evidence of intention in the party to submit to the chance of survivorship, or of that supineness and neglect to which our law affords no assistance."

It was a general rule of the law courts, however, that if the wording of the gift showed a clear expression of an intention to sever the interests, or to transfer the estate to the grantees as one of severed interests, the granted estate could be deemed a tenancy in common. Bois v. Roswell, 1 Lev. 232; Fisher v. Wigg, 1 Salk. 391; Denn v. Gas-kin, 2 Cowp. 657; Cooper v. Jones, 3 B. & Ald. 425, 5 E. C. L. 333; Goodtitle v. Stokes, 1 Wils. K. B. 341; Doe v. Prestwidge, 4 M. & S. 178, 16 Rev. Rep. 436. See also Hurd v. Lenthall, Style 211.

Where there were words of survivorship, however, they were conclusive in law as to the intention to create a joint tenancy rather than a tenancy in common; and the addition of words which tended to show an intention to sever the interests, such as "equally to be divided between them" was not sufficient to cause a court of law to construe the estate to be a tenancy in common. Hurd v. Lenthall, Style 211; Ward v. Everet, 1 Ld. Raym. 422.

Anciently it was held that the words "equally to be divided" were not sufficient in a will to show an intention to sever, and to pass a tenancy in common, but that they created a joint tenancy. This was held in the sixth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 1564, by Mountague, C. J., who said that if a man devise his land to his two sons, "equally to be divided between them," they are joint tenants till division is made, for the said words, viz., "to be divided" are words in the future tense. Bendl. 19. The same ruling was made in Dickens v. Marsh, 1 Cro. Eliz. 330 (54 Eliz. A. D. 1611) wherein it also appears that the future tense of the words "to be divided" was the reason for the decision. Croke's report of the decision on that point is as follows: "They all conceived it was a joint estate, and that they shall not take by parts in common; for he doth not appoint a division to be made. But Fenner said, that in 2 Eliz. Hide v. Southcot, it was adjudged, that a devise of land to two equally divided, this was a tenancy in common. But here it is to two equally to be divided; and it is not certain that a division shall be made." See also Fisher v. Wigg, 1 Salk. 391. This old rule was questioned, but without decision, in Dyer 25a. Later, however, it was held that "equally to be divided" when used in a will created a tenancy in common. Fisher v. Wigg, 1 Salk. 391, wherein it was said: "A devise to two and their heirs equally to be divided was formerly looked on as a joint estate. Vide Dy. 25, 158; Benl. 19; 3 Cro. 330. Now indeed it is an estate in common, not by force of the words, but that it appears to be the intention of the party that there should be no survivorship." See also Hurd v. Lenthall, Style 211. This was the settled rule in equity. See the cases cited infra, in subdivision II. 2. In Equity.

Even after the rule was changed as to wills, it was still held by the courts of law that the words "equally to be divided" in a deed created a joint tenancy rather than a tenancy in common. Ward v. Everard, 1 Salk. 390, 1 Ld. Raym. 423. See also Hurd v. Lenthall, Style 211. And see 2 Blk. Com. 193. In Ward v. Everard, supra, it was said, per Holt, C.J.: "The words, equally to be divided, cannot make a tenancy in common in a deed, though they may in a will; and the words, to have and receive 20l. a-piece, are an explanation how the money on receipt is to be distributed, viz., so much to one, and so much to another; but do not sever the grant nor the rent; for it is not several rents nor several grants, but one rent and one grant undivided." In Hurd v. Lenthall, Style 211, it was said by Roll, C. J., that "the words equally to be divided in a will do make a tenancy in common by construction, but in a grant it would be otherwise."

In time, however, this rule in turn was changed and it was held at law that the words "equally to be divided," used in a deed, showed an intention to sever the interests, and they were accordingly construed to create a tenancy in common. Fisher v. Wigg, 1 P. Wms. 14 (Holt, C.J., dissentienti). The word "equally" was held to be of the same effect as "equally to be divided," creating a tenancy in common. Denn v. Gaskin, 2 Cowp. 657. A devise to several "in ratable and equal proportion" showed an intent to create a tenancy in common, and it was held to create such rather than a joint tenancy. Bois v. Roswell, 1 Lev. 232. And the words "equally between them, share and share alike" were held to have the same effect at law. Cooper v. Jones, 3 B. & Ald. 425, 5 E. C. L. 333.

Deeds of uses, like wills, were construed according to the intention of the grantor, so that a deed of uses to several, equally to be divided, conveyed a tenancy in common, not a joint tenancy. Goodtitle v. Stokes, 1 Wils. K. B. 341.

The ancient tendency of the courts of law to construe a grant to two or more as a joint tenancy rather than a tenancy in common led to the practice of inserting the words "to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants," which was suggested by Sir William Blackstone as the usual and the safest way to limit a tenancy in common. 2 Blk. Com. 193-194, wherein it is said: "And this nicety in the wording of grants makes it the most usual as well as the safest way, when a tenancy in common is meant to be created, to add express words of exclusion as well as description, and limit the estate to A and B, to hold as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants."

Where these express words of exclusion as well as of description, "to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants," were used, they of course governed the construction of the estate by the law courts. Doe v. Prestwidge, 4 M. & S. 178, 16 Rev. Rep. 436.

The preference for joint tenancies, with their feature of survivorship, was an outgrowth of the feudal necessity of keeping estates in a simple condition, so as not to split up the feudal military services. Being based on principles of feudal military tenure, the reason for the preference ceased with the ceasing of those tenures. The modern tendency in England, even in the law courts, is to construe cotenancies as tenancies in common rather than as joint tenancies. It seems that this change of tendency had its incipency in the effect which the statute of 12 Chas. II. had of abolishing military tenures and converting them into free and common socage. This suggestion was made as early as 1747, though it was made, it will be noticed, in a court of equity, not a court of law. Haws v. Haws, 3 Atk. 524, wherein the Lord Chancellor said: "The general rules insisted on are true, for certainly joint tenants are not favored here, because they introduce inconvenient estates, and do not so well provide for families, therefore this court [the court of equity] leans against them, and so, I believe, do the courts of law now, though they favored them formerly, and the ground upon which they went, was the multiplication of services under the old tenures, but the statute of 12 Car. 2, c. 24, sec. 1, has reduced the several sorts to socage tenure only." And the same suggestion was made the following year by the lord chancellor in Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. 165, where in it was said: "First, antiently, and before the great alteration in the law by the abolition of tenures, courts of law were very favorable to joint tenancies, to prevent the splitting of tenures and services: but they have since very much gone off from that, and endeavored as much as possible to construe it a tenancy in common, from the inconveniences of construing it joint: and from that time allowances have been given to the words equally to be divided to make a tenancy in common: although in grants to this day they will not."

2. IN EQUITY.

a. Generally.

In equity the tendency, even in early times, was against joint tenancy and toward tenancy in common, because equity deemed a joint tenancy an inconvenient estate. York v. Stone, 1 Salk. 158, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 293, par. 1; Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. 165; Haws v. Haws, 3 Atk. 524; In re Woolley [1903] 2 Ch. 206. See also Jolliffe v. East, 3 Bro. C. C. 25; Staples v. Maurice, 4 Bro. P. C. 580. And see other cases cited infra, this section.

In York v. Stone, supra, Lord Chancellor Cowper said that "a joint tenancy is an odious thing in equity." In Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. 165, the lord chancellor said: "But courts of equity have long before been favorable to tenancies in common, wherever they could lay hold of any words to construe it so, from its being a greater equality, a better provision, and preventing estates from going by accident contrary to the intent." In Haws v. Haws, 3 Atk. 524, it was said by the lord chancellor: "The general rules insisted on are true, for certainly joint tenants are not favored here, because they introduce inconvenient estates, and do not so well provide for families, therefore this court [the court of equity] leans against them." In Jolliffe v. East, 3 Bro. C. C. 25, Lord Thurlow said: "I believe it is very well understood that the court [the equity court] decrees a tenancy in common as much as it can." In the case of In re Woolley [1903] 2 Ch. 206, the court said: "But in a case of ambiguity the court very properly leans to the construction which creates a tenancy in common in preference to a joint tenancy. Not one ordinary person in twenty, I doubt whether one in a hundred, not being a lawyer, has the slightest idea that a devise or bequest to several nominatim, or to a class of persons without more, does not confer upon each a several and separate share which would pass to his representatives. So, as Lord Hatherley says in Robertson v. Fraser

[L. R. 6 Ch. 696] 'anything which in the slightest degree indicates an intention to divide the property must be held to abrogate the idea of a joint tenancy.'"

The attitude of the courts of equity toward cotenancies, and their tendency, on the slightest pretext of expressed intention, to construe them as tenancies in common rather than joint tenancies is well illustrated by the remarks of Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood, in Williams v. Hensman, 1 Johns. & H. 546, wherein he suggested that the legislature ought to enact that a joint tenancy could only be created by express words, so as to relieve the courts of equity from the necessity of relying on verbal minutiae as showing intent to sever. He said: "In these questions of joint tenancy the court has frequently been driven to rely on minute grounds for holding a severance to have taken place, by the unfortunate circumstance that the legislature has not thought fit to interpose by introducing the rule that express words shall be required to create a joint tenancy in place of the contrary rule which is established, that words pointing to severalty of interest are necessary to constitute a tenancy in common. Under certain circumstances, as in the case of mortgages of trust money, a joint tenancy is a considerable convenience; but it would be very desirable that, in general, in the absence of any express direction, a tenancy in common should be the construction adopted."

It has, therefore, been a well-settled rule in equity since early times that a court of equity will deem a cotenancy to be a tenancy in common rather than a joint tenancy if in the grant or limitation of the estate there appear any words or circumstances which show an intention that the interests granted be severed, or that there be no survivorship. Lashbrook v. Cock, 2 Meriv. 70; Hamell v. Hunt, Prec. Ch. 163; Prince v. Heylin, 1 Atk. 493; Owen v. Owen, 1 Atk. 494; Haws v. Haws, 3 Atk. 524; Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. 165; Rigden v. Vallier, 2 Ves. 252; Jackson v. Jackson, 7 Ves. Jr. 535, 9 Ves. Jr. 591; Horn v. Coleman, 1 Smale & G. 169; In re Phene, L. R. 5 Eq. 346; Atty.-Gen. v. Fletcher, L. R. 13 Eq. 128; Robertson v. Fraser, L. R. 6 Ch. 696; Kew v. Rouse, 1 Vern. 353; Ive v. King, 16 Beav. 46. See also Harrison v. Barton, 1 Johns. & H. 287, 7 Jur. N. S. 19, 1 L. J. Ch. 213, 9 W. R. 177; In re Woolley [1903] 2 Ch. 206.

But, although equity has long favored tenancy in common, and will hold an estate to be such on slighter expression of intention than courts of law, it is well settled that, in the absence of any expressed intention to sever the interests, equity regards an estate granted by will or deed to two or more as being a joint tenancy, with survivorship.

In Morley v. Bird, 3 Ves. Jr. 628, 4 Rev. Rep. 106, it was held in equity that a specific bequest of consols to four daughters simply created a joint tenancy. Arden, M. R., admitting that the tendency of that time in equity was toward tenancy in common, held that without words of severance a cotenancy would still be deemed a joint tenancy. He said: "Great doubts have been entertained by judges both at law and in equity as to words creating a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common; and it is clear, the ancient law was in favor of a joint tenancy; and that law still prevails: unless there are some words to sever the interest taken, it is at this moment a joint tenancy, notwithstanding the leaning of the courts lately in favor of a tenancy in common. A legacy of a specific chattel, a grant of an estate, is a joint tenancy. It is true, the courts seeing the inconvenience of that have been desirous, wherever they could find any intention of severance, to avail themselves of it; and their successive determinations have laid hold of any words for that purpose. 'Equally to be divided' (Rigden v. Vallier, 2 Ves. 252), 'equally, among, between,' even in law I believe, certainly in equity, create a tenancy in common: but without those words it is a joint tenancy." It was held in Morgan v. Britten, L. R. 13 Eq. 28, and in Stratton v. Best, 2 Bro. C. C. 233, that a gift to "all and every the child and children" created a joint tenancy, those words not being deemed sufficient to show an intention to sever the interests. In Eagles v. LeBreton, L. R. 15 Eq. 148, it was held that a testamentary gift, at the death of A & B "to pass to my relatives in America" created a joint tenancy in the American relatives. In the case of In re Laverick, 18 Jur. 304, there was a devise to C. B. and

J. T. for life, and at their death "the said premises to go to their children," and it was held that the children took as joint tenants, not as tenants in common. It was said in that case, per Sir J. Stuart, V. C.: "As to the question, whether they take as tenants in common or as joint tenants, I must hold that they take as joint tenants, for there are no words to show they were to take as tenants in common." In Jolliffe v. East, 3 Bro. C. C. 25, after remarking that equity will construe a cotenancy as in common whenever it can, Lord Thurlow said: "If, indeed, there are not words that will point to a tenancy in common, the rule of survivorship must take place."

A fortiori, if the wording of the gift shows a clear intention on the part of the grantor that the interests shall not be severed, or that there shall be the element of survivorship, a court of equity will bow to this expression of intention and hold the estate to be a joint tenancy. DeWitte v. DeWitte, 11 Sim. 40; Bustard v. Saunders, 7 Beav. 92, 7 Jur. 986; Heasmon v. Pearse, L. R. 11 Eq. 522, L. R. 7 Ch. 275; Barker v. Giles, 9 Mod. 157; Jones v. Hall, 16 Sim. 500; Cock v. Burrish, 1 Vern. 425; Garrick v. Taylor, 29 Beav. 79, 7 Jur. N. S. 116, 30 L. J. Ch. 211, 3 L. T. N. S. 460, 9 W. R. 181, 54 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 556, affirmed in 4 De G. F. & J. 159, 31 L. J. Ch. 68, 7 Jur. N. S. 1174, 5 L. T. N. S. 404, 10 W. R. 49, 45 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1144; Cookson v. Bingham, 17 Beav. 262.

Since the essence of a joint tenancy is that it has the four unities of possession, interest, time and title, out of the necessity of the case a tenancy will, in both law and equity, be deemed in common rather than joint if it lacks any one of these unities. Woodgate v. Unwin, 4 Sim. 129, wherein a limitation to several persons was held not to create a joint tenancy because the cotenants under the limitation would derive title at different times, viz., when they respectively reached the ages of twenty-one, and hence there was no unity of time.

b. Illustrations.

(1) "Equally to Be Divided," and Like Words.

It has long been well established that equity courts consider the words "equally to be divided" or "shared" as creating a tenancy in common in the case of a will, because they show an intention to sever the interests. Prince v. Heylin, 1 Atk. 493; Owen v. Owen, 1 Atk. 494; Haws v. Haws, 3 Atk. 524; Jolliffe v. East, 3 Bro. C. C. 25; Ackerman v. Burrows, 3 Ves. & B. 54. See also Rigden v. Vallier, 2 Ves. 252. And a legacy to two "jointly and between them" has been held to be the same as a legacy to two "to be equally divided between them," and hence to create a tenancy in common. Perkins v. Baynton, 1 Bro. C. C. 118. So a devise to several to hold "share and share alike" creates a tenancy in common. Heathe v. Heathe, 2 Atk. 121; Cormack v. Copous, 17 Beav. 397. In Heathe v. Heathe, supra, it was said: "A question that was made upon the first will, whether the words share and share alike make a tenancy in common or a joint tenancy, is given up, and very rightly, for it has been held these 200 years to be a tenancy in common." And the addition of the mere words "between them" has the same effect. Lashbrook v. Cock, 2 Meriv. 70; Atty.-Gen. v. Fletcher, L. R. 13 Eq. 128.

And it has been held in equity that a devise to several, to be divided equally among them, created a tenancy in common although words of survivorship were added, more weight being given by the court to the intention to divide the interests than to the intention to create a survivorship. Haws v. Haws, 3 Atk. 524; Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. 165. Compare Clerk v. Clerk, 2 Vern. 323, wherein such a limitation was held to create a joint tenancy. And compare also the cases cited supra, under the heading At Law, for the contrary rule of the law courts. In a devise in trust to pay to A, B and C and the survivor or survivors of them share and share alike, the words of survivorship should not, it has been held, be construed to defeat the effect of the words "share and share alike" which would impart a tenancy in common, but should be referred to some time, as the death of the testator or the death of the life tenant. Russell v. Long, 4 Ves. Jr. 551. And with respect to a gift to A, B and C with substitutional gifts over of the "respective shares" of each in case of his death, the reference to the respective shares has been held to be sufficient evidence of an intention to sever, to make the gift a tenancy in common. Ive v. King, 16 Beav. 46.

The words "equally to be divided" have also been held to be sufficient, in a deed operating by way of a covenant to stand seized, to create a tenancy in common. Rigden v. Vallier, 2 Ves. 252. They have been said to be sufficient to create a tenancy in common in the surrender of a copyhold. Rigden v. Vallier, supra. And by the assignment of a term to trustees for several, to be equally divided among them, a tenancy in common has been held to have been created. Hamell v. Hunt, Prec. Ch. 163.

So the word "participate" has been held to be sufficient evidence of intention to sever to make a tenancy in common in equity. Robertson v. Fraser, L. R. 6 Ch. 696, wherein the court construed a residuary bequest to

A and B and a codicil declaring that the residuary bequest should read as if the names A, B and C were inserted in the place of A and B, "so that C should participate in such bequest—with A and B." It was said in that case by Lord Hatherley, L. C.: "I cannot doubt, having regard to the authorities respecting the effect of such words as 'amongst' and 'respectively,' that anything which in the slightest degree indicates an intention to divide the property must be held to abrogate the idea of a joint tenancy, and to create a tenancy in common. Perhaps it would have been well if the courts had held that in bequests, as in partnerships, every community of interest was to be considered a tenancy in common. But that has not been done. However, putting aside such words as 'alike' and 'equally'—for they may be considered more decidedly inconsistent with joint tenancy, inasmuch as the interests of joint tenants are very rarely quite equal, considering the difference that may exist in the ages of the legatees—it does not appear to me that such words as 'amongst' and 'respectively' are at all stronger than 'participate.' I have, therefore, no doubt that the word 'participate' is sufficient to indicate an intention to divide, and to create a tenancy in common. My doubt has been as to the effect of the peculiar form of the codicil; but my doubt is not sufficient to induce me to reverse the decision of the vice-chancellor."

In Campbell v. Campbell, 4 Bro. C. C. 15, it was held that a legacy "to and amongst the children of A & B" showed an intention to sever and created a tenancy in common.

Where there was a devise to A and B, "paying £25 a year out of the rents" to one during his life, viz., £12, 10s. by each of them, it was held that the stipulation for the separate halves of the payment showed an intent to sever and created a tenancy in common. Kew v. Rouse, 1 Vern. 353.

(2) Reference to Statute of Distributions.

Where there is a gift to a class to be ascertained by a reference to the statute of distributions, and where the reference to the statute is not only to ascertain who will take but to denote that they will take according to the shares and by the titles given by the statute, the persons designated will take as tenants in common, rather than as joint tenants. Horn v. Coleman, 1 Smale & G. 169; In re Nightingale [1909] 1 Ch. 385 [1909] W. N. 17. And where there is a reference to the statute, it is to be taken prima facie to mean that the shares and titles are to be such as would be given by the statute, though a contrary intent may appear which will rebut this presumption. In re Nightingale, supra.

But where it appears that the language of a gift refers to the statute of distributions simply to ascertain the individuals without referring to it to define the interests, the legatees will take as joint tenants. Withy v. Mangles, 4 Beav. 358; Elmesley v. Young, 2 Myl. & K. 780. See also In re Gray [1896] 2 Ch. 802.

(3) Power of Appointment or Advancement.

It has been held that a devise or bequest in trust with a power of appointment among the children of the testator shows an intention on the part of the testator that the gift be severed and divided among the children by the donee of the power, and that, therefore, such a devise creates a tenancy in common instead of a joint tenancy. In re Phene, L. R. 5 Eq. 346; Casterton v. Sutherland, 9 Ves. Jr. 445. In the case of In re Phene, supra, it appeared that there was a bequest to executors in trust for M for life and after her death "in trust for the benefit of her children, to do that which they, my executors, may think most to their [the children's] advantage." This was held to show an intention to have the executors divide the fund, the subject of the bequest, among the children and hence to create a tenancy in common. In Casterton v. Sutherland, 9 Ves. Jr. 445, under a devise to the testator's wife for life, and after her death "unto and amongst all and every our children, in such manner and in such proportions as my said wife shall either in her lifetime or by her last will and testament direct and appoint," it was held that the children living at the death of the testator became equally entitled as tenants in common subject to the life estate of the widow.

Likewise it has been held that where a will designates a class to take an original share by substitution in such a way as would ordinarily create a joint tenancy, the fact that the will contains a clause allowing advancements to be made to individuals of this class by the trustees will cause a court of equity to consider the estate conveyed to the class by the will as a tenancy in common instead of a joint tenancy, because an advancement to one and a resulting debit on his share could not be worked out if they took as joint tenants. In re Dunn [1916] 1 Ch. 97, [1915] W. N. 376, 113 L. T. N. S. 1206, 85 L. J. Ch. 168, wherein the court said: "Lord Redasdale said: 'Joint tenancy as a provision for children of a marriage is an inconvenient mode of settlement, because during their minorities no use can be made of their portions for their advancement as the joint tenancy cannot be severed.' Though not directly applicable to the present case, that passage shows the inconvenience of construing a class gift as a joint tenancy, if the testator intended the power of advancement to apply to the members of the class. If, therefore, the power of advancement applies to the class taking the benefit of Henry Treffrey Dunn's share by substitution, as I think it clearly does, the question is whether there is sufficient to enable me to say there is a tenancy in common. In L'Estrange v. L'Estrange ([1902] 1 Ir. Rep. 372, 467) the testator merely devised the residue of his property to trustees for the benefit of his six children, with power to his trustees to advance such sums as they might think fit for their education and advancement. That was a general power and did not refer in terms to the portion or share to which any child would be entitled. After reading the power of advancement, Lord Ashbourne, L. C. said: 'The question is, does the use of these words indicate an intention on the part of the testator to cut down the joint tenancy to a tenancy in common? It is one of those clauses of which, when read for the first time, one may not see the full effect, or ascertain how far the words will go; but when read more closely it is clear that the words confer a power, not of maintenance, but of advancement. If a sum, perhaps of a considerable amount, were advanced for one child, it would be right to debit that sum against his or her share, and that debit could not be worked out if these children were joint tenants, and could not be done unless they were tenants in common.' He then held that the advancement clause was a sufficient indication that the children were to take as tenants in common. And I think that in the same way here the advancement clause enables me to say that the benefit that accrued to H. T. Dunn's nearest blood relations owing to his death in the testatrix's lifetime went to them as tenants in common. And I declare that they take as tenants in common and not as joint tenants."

(4) Joint Tenancy Expressly Intended.

In accordance with the general rule that an expressed intention to create a joint tenancy will prevail in a court of equity, it has been held that a gift to a woman and her children, independently of her husband, or so that the same might not come into the hands of her husband, created in equity a joint tenancy, because it showed an intention that there should be survivorship. DeWitte v. DeWitte, 11 Sim. 40; Bustard v. Saunders, 7 Beav. 92, 7 Jur. 986. And a gift to A, J, and R. share and share alike, but if one of them should die before the age of twenty-one, "his share should vest in and belong to the survivors," was held to be a specific provision for survivorship and created a joint tenancy. Jones v. Hall, 16 Sim. 500.

With respect to a legacy to two nephews "equally to be divided between them" and, further, an appointment that the same be paid to the testator's executors "in trust to be laid out for the benefit of residuary legatees," it has been held that the intent to make the gift joint, apparent in the last clause, outweighed the intent to sever, expressed in "equally to be divided," and that, therefore, a joint tenancy passed to the legatees. Cock v. Burrish, 1 Vern. 425.

And where there is an expressed intent to create a joint tenancy, the courts of equity will go far to uphold that intent. Thus in a case wherein it appeared that there was a devise to trustees, to convey to the testator's three daughters, as soon as they should respectively reach twenty-one, "to them and the heirs of their bodies, and their heirs as joint tenants," it was held that the devise could not create a joint tenancy because, since the daughters would attain their majority at different times, there could not be the unity of time, but the court gave effect to the intent of the testator by construing, by an application of the cy pres doctrine, the limitation to be of cross remainders, like a joint tenancy having the element of survivorship, instead of construing it to be a tenancy in common. Marryat v. Townly, 1 Ves. 102.

(5) Contract for Joint Tenancy.

In a case wherein it appeared that cotenants articulated among themselves for a survivorship in their interests, equity has given force to the agreement by holding that they held as joint tenants. Hayes v. Kingdome, 1 Vern. 33, 23 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 288, the report of which case in Vernon represents the Lord Chancellor, Lord Nottingham, as having said "if there had been no covenant it should survive," but in a note to that remark, 23 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 289, it is said: "According to Lord Nottingham's own report, he said quite the contrary, namely, that if there had not been a covenant for survivorship, equity would have hindered it.—MS. note in Mr. Hargrave's Vernon."

Equity will also decree specific performance of a contract for a joint purchase as a contract for the purchase of a joint tenancy, it appearing from the contract that the intention was to create a joint tenancy and not a tenancy in common. Aveling v. Knipe, 19 Ves. 441, 13 Rev. Rep. 240, wherein it was said, by Sir Wm. Grant, M. R.: "On the face of the agreement they jointly contract with the vendor; but a doubt was suggested, whether a court of equity would in any case execute such an agreement by a conveyance in joint tenancy. It would not, if there were any circumstances, from which it could be collected, that a joint tenancy was not in contemplation: but I have no conception that it is of course upon a controversy between two purchasers to depart from the letter of their agreement, and decree them to be tenants in common."

(6) Purchasers, Joint Adventurers, or Dis-seizors.

A purchase by two or more jointly, each contributing equally, prima facie creates even in equity a joint tenancy, and, in the absence of anything to show an intent to sever, it will be construed to create such an estate. Harris v. Fergusson, 16 Sim. 308, 60 Eng. Rep. (Reprint.) 892; Lake v. Gibson, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 290, par 3. See also Harrison v. Barton, 1 Johns. & H. 287, 7 Jur. N. S. 19, 1 L. J. Ch. 213, 9 W. R. 177. So a purchase by partners, paid for in partnership funds, creates a joint tenancy. Wray v. Wray [1905] 2 Ch. 349, 74 L. J. Ch. 687, 93 L. T. N. S. 304, 54 W. R. 136. But if there is anything in the transaction to show an intention to sever the interest, equity will construe the purchase as creating a tenancy in common. Harrison v. Barton, 1 Johns. & H. 287, 7 Jur. N. S. 19, 1 L. J. Ch. 213, 9 W. R. 177. If the contribution to the purchase is unequal, the purchasers are partners rather than joint tenants. Lake v. Gibson, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 290, par. 3.

It has been held that the rules that apply to the construction of cotenancies created by will or deed have no application to mere joint business ventures, and that such a joint venture will not create a joint tenancy, nor will there be survivorship in the interests of the joint adventurers therein. Jeffereys v. Small, 1 Vern. 217; Lake v. Craddock, 3 P. W. N. S. 158. In Jeffereys v. Small, supra, it was said: "The custom of merchants, as to bills of exchange, is now extended to inland bills, and the custom of merchants is extended to all traders, to exclude survivorship (vide Vin. Ab. Tit. Surv. [D]): and though it is common for traders in articles of copartnership to provide against survivorship, yet that is more than is necessary: and he said, he took the distinction to be, where two become joint tenants or jointly interested in a thing by way of gift or the like, there the same shall be subject to all the consequences of law . . . but as to a joint undertaking in the way of trade or the like, it is otherwise: and decreed for the plaintiff accordingly."

Joint disseizors have been held to occupy lands as joint tenants, because their wrongful act gives them the same possession, the same interest, and the same title at the same time. Thus where R and B, holding as tenants in common, continued wrongfully to hold over after the termination of their estate, their tenancy in common as rightful owners became converted into a joint tenancy as disseizors. Ward v. Ward, L. R.

6 Ch. 789; wherein Lord Hatherley, L. C., said: "Here two persons are in lawful possession of a copyhold; the title under which they hold it comes to an end, but they continue in possession, and thus go on holding a certain share of the property without any title whatever. In what capacity do they so hold on? It appears to me as joint tenants. The possession of each became wrongful as to this share at the same moment of time, so that they acquired their title at the same moment of time, they held by one common right or by one common wrongful title, whichever you please to call it, and they have done nothing to sever their tenancy. The case is very analogous to that of one of three tenants in common conveying his share to the other two without words of severance. The two are joint tenants of the share so conveyed, though they remain tenants in common as to their original shares."

III. In Canada.

In Canada the tendency, at least in the equity courts, has always been in favor of tenancies in common. Fisher v. Anderson, 4 Can. Sup. Ct. 406, wherein the court said: "Though unquestionably at the present day tenancies in common are favored rather than joint tenancies, it cannot be doubted that where the words used create a joint tenancy and there is nothing to indicate a contrary intention, no words or circumstances which, either expressly or by implication, create a severance, that must be taken to be the real intent of the testator, but wherever slight words of severance are found, the court acts upon them, and this the more readily in cases where provision is being made for families, for courts of equity have always inclined to tenancies in common when a question arises upon a provision for children."

In accordance with the modern tendency away from the estate of joint tenancy and in favor of tenancy in common, a statute was enacted in 1834, 4 Wm. IV. ch. 1, sec. 48, providing, for Canada, that when after the day mentioned in the section land shall be granted, etc., to two or more persons other than executors or trustees, in fee simple, or for a less estate, it shall be considered that such persons took or take as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, unless an intention sufficiently appears on the face of the grant, etc., that they shall take as joint tenants. This statute, it will be seen, changed the rule of the common law, that in the absence of qualifying words or express contrary intention a grant to two or more created a joint tenancy instead of a tenancy in common, Adamson v. Adamson, 17 Ont. 407.

This statute only had the effect of changing such estates as before its enactment would have been held to be joint tenancies into tenancies in common. It affected no other estates. Matter of Shaver, 31 U. C. Q. B. 603, wherein the court said: "Such being clearly the state of the law at the time of passing of the 4 Wm. IV. ch. 1, did the 48th section of that statute in any way affect the rights or interests of husband and wife under a conveyance of lands to them during coverture? In our judgment it did not. It appears to us manifest from the language of the section as a whole, that its sole object and effect was, and is, to change the rule of the common law so that assurances, etc., which before the 4 Wm. IV. created a joint tenancy, should when executed after the 1st of July, 1834, create a tenancy in common, unless a contrary intention appeared on the face of the deed, etc., that the grantees should take as joint tenants. It never was contemplated that it should affect a conveyance which before July, 1834, could not create a joint tenancy; the language of the section in question being, that where land shall be granted, etc., to two or more persons, etc., 'it shall be considered that such persons took or take as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants'—that is, as they would before the statute; clearly showing that the only conveyances in the mind of the legislature were those which without the act would have passed the lands in joint tenancy, and, as already shown, a conveyance to husband and wife would not do so."

A gift by will to several "to be divided" between them has been held to create a tenancy in common. Re Hislop, 70 Ont. W. N. 614, affirmed 22 Dominion L. Rep. 710, 8 Ont. W. N. 53.

And even where there are words that import an intention to create a joint tenancy, the addition of words amounting to a division, or showing an intent to sever, are controlling, and the estate granted will be deemed a tenancy in common, not a joint tenancy. Fisher v. Anderson, 4 Can. Sup. Ct. 406; Clark v. Clark, 17 Can. Sup. Ct. 376. In Fisher v. Anderson, supra, after quoting from many of the cases cited supra in subdivision II. 2. In England, In Equity, the court said: "From all which it may safely be affirmed that where words of joint tenancy are coupled with words amounting to a division, there will be a tenancy in common."

Effect will be given, however, to an express purpose to create a joint tenancy, in the absence of words showing that a division or severance of interests is intended. Re Perrie, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 100, 16 Ont. W. Rep. 90, in which case a devise and bequest of real and personal property to two "jointly to enjoy the same," was held to create a joint tenancy.

It has been held in Newfoundland that a bequest in trust "for the benefit of all my children" created a joint tenancy with survivorship. In re MacDougall [1884-1896] Newfoundland L. Rep. 7.

A joint tenancy may be created by disseizin as well as by devise or deed but in such a case the disseizin must take place at the same moment, otherwise the unity of time will be lacking and without that unity the estate cannot be a joint tenancy. Myers v. Ruport, 8 Ont. L. Rep. 668, wherein the plaintiff sought a declaration of title by adverse possession in his favor, claiming as joint tenant with his wife who had been holding adversely to the lawful owners. It was held that he was not a joint tenant with his wife, because his disseizin of the defendants only started at the time that he married his wife, whereas hers started before the marriage, and therefore there was no unity of time.

Where three of five tenants in common acquire title against the other two by adverse possession under the statute of limitations, they acquire such title as joint tenants, so that they become joint tenants of the two-fifths while remaining tenants in common of the three-fifths. In re Livingstone, 21 Can. L. Rep. 521, 2 Ont. L. Rep. 381, in which case the court said: "It was agreed between counsel that no statute is in force in Ontario which declares that titles taken under conveyances, wills, etc., are tenancies in common and not joint tenancies unless R. S. O. 1897, ch. 119, sec. 11, applies to the case. This being so I am of opinion that the two-fifths of the estate acquired as always by the three tenants in common who were in possession were taken by them in joint tenancy and not as tenants in common, and that the three in possession after having as above acquired by virtue of the statute the two-fifths were tenants in common of their original three-fifths and became and were joint tenants as to the two-fifths so acquired. There are, I think, unity of possession of interest of title and of time of commencement of title. At common law a conveyance of land to these three without words of severance would impart to them a joint tenancy, and I think the case analogous here as to the two-fifths acquired as above."

IV. In United States.

1. IN GENERAL.

Joint tenancy, with its jus accrescendi, or right of survivorship, is an estate of distinctly feudal origin, and founded on feudal military expediency. See cases cited supra, in subdivision II. In England. This being so the tendency in America has from the first been away from that estate and in favor of tenancy in common. See cases cited infra, throughout this note. The legislatures of practically every state have advanced what was already a tendency of judicial construction, by statutory enactments more or less radically changing the common law as to the construction of cotenancies. See cases cited infra, particularly Trammell v. Harrell, 4 Ark. 802. Some of those statutes abolish joint tenancies entirely; some of them virtually abolish them by abolishing the jus accrescendi, in whole, or with certain exceptions; and some allow joint tenancies only where the instrument creating an estate expressly declares it to be such, by providing that in the absence of an express declaration of intention to create a joint tenancy an estate to two or more is to be deemed a tenancy in common, thus changing the common law quoad hoc. Because of the variety of these statutes the law of the several states will be treated by jurisdictions.

The federal courts of the United States enforce the statutory provisions of the respective states as to the nature of estates in cotenancy. Randall v. Phillips, 3 Mason 378, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,555; Robinson v. Codman, 1 Sumn. 121, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,970. They likewise follow the interpretation given to state laws on that subject by the state courts. Everitt v. Duss, 197 Fed. 401.

2. ALABAMA.

The incident of survivorship in joint tenancy has been abolished in Alabama by the statute which provides: "When one joint tenant dies before the severance, his interest does not survive to the other tenants, but descends and vests as if his interest had been severed and ascertained." Code of 1907, sec. 3419 (Clay's Dig. 160).

The Alabama court has said several times that by virtue of the foregoing statute joint tenancy is abolished and no longer exists in that state. Dunn v. Mobile Bank, 2 Ala. 152, 156; Parsons v. Boyd, 20 Ala. 112; Hill v. Jones, 65 Ala. 214. In Hill v. Jones, supra, the court said, obiter: "The words of the devise to his wife and daughter, in the will of Thomas M., importing a division of the estate between them, a separate interest in each, would, at common law, have created a tenancy in common. In this state, joint tenancy does not exist, the statute abolishing its distinguishing incident, the jus accrescendi. Code of 1876, sec. 2191."

The statute abolishing survivorship, however, has application only to such joint tenants as hold in their own right. It has no application to such as hold jointly en autre droit and hence the element of survivorship still exists in the case of joint trustees. Parsons v. Boyd, 20 Ala. 112, wherein the court said: "Our statute, it is true, has done away with all joint tenancies, as known at the common law, and declares that when two or more persons shall hold an estate, real or personal, jointly, and one joint tenant dies before severance, his interest in the joint estate shall not survive to the remaining joint tenant or joint tenants, but shall descend to, and be vested in, his heirs or other legal representatives, in the same manner as if his interest had been severed and ascertained. Clay's Dig. 169. This act, however, only applies to such joint tenants as hold the absolute property in their own right, and not to those who hold as trustees merely, or in autre droit. The evil that our statute intended to remedy was, to cut off the jus accrescendi, or right of survivorship, which existed at the common law, and to give to the heirs at law of joint tenants the interest of their ancestors, in the same manner as if they had held as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. It was thought unreasonable that the death of one joint tenant should give the entire estate to the survivor for his own use, to the exclusion of the heirs or next of kin of the deceased tenant. But when the tenants hold as trustees for particular purposes, or in autre droit, and can gain no advantage to themselves by the right of survivorship, then they are not within the reason of the statute, nor does the evil exist which it intended to remedy, for no profit or benefit will result to the survivor, and although he takes, by the death of his cotenant, the entire legal title, yet he will hold it as trustee, or in the right of another, and for his use and benefit. Joint trustees are not within the reason of the statute, nor the evil intended to be remedied by it, and to hold that their joint title is affected by the act could be productive of no good; it could avoid no evil, but, on the contrary, might often lead to protracted litigation, and serious injury to the trust estate."

3. ALASKA.

Joint tenancy is abolished in Alaska by a statute (Civ. Code, p. 367, § 62), a reenactment of the Oregon Code, and all persons having an undivided interest in real property are to be deemed and considered tenants in common. Binswanger v. Henninger. 1 Alaska 509.

4. ARKANSAS.

As to real estate, the common-law rule that a grant to two or more, simpliciter, created a joint tenancy has been changed in Arkansas by a statute which provides that "every interest in real estate, granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors and trustees as such, shall be in tenancy in common unless expressly declared in such grant or devise to be a joint tenancy." [Kirby's Digest, sec. 739 (Rev. Stat. chap. 31, secs. 1-9.)]

Under this statute, a joint tenancy cannot exist in Arkansas, except in the case of executors or trustees, unless the instrument itself declares that the estate granted is to be a joint tenancy. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, wherein the court said: "There can be no question as to the intention of this enactment, and under it we must hold: That it is only where the grant is to executors or trustees, as such, or where by the terms of the grant or devise a joint tenancy is devised, that a joint tenancy can exist. It is, therefore, not sufficient that an estate be granted or devised to several persons, to make them joint tenants. The deed or devise must declare that they are such, in order to bring the parties within the common-law rule upon the subject of joint tenancy. It therefore becomes necessary to determine whether in this devise it was in terms intended that these sons should hold as joint tenants. The language of the devise is as follows: 'I hereby bequeath and devise all my estate, real and personal, including all my effects of every description whatever, subject to the limitations herein set forth, to my sons James Trooper Armstrong, David I. Armstrong and Frank Will. Armstrong, whom I constitute and appoint my sole executors. . . . Upon a fair construction of these provisions, we think that the first clause was intended to be a devise to the sons of the estate simply, and although at the common law they would hold the estate as joint tenants, yet under our statute they hold as tenants in common.'"

And even where under the statute a joint tenancy might otherwise exist, its distinguishing characteristic, the jus accrescendi, has been abolished by another statute (section 4423, Kirby's Digest, Rev. Stat. chap. 82) which provides: "All survivorships of real and personal estate are forever abolished." The statute abolishing the right of survivorship in Arkansas, however, had reference only to survivorship as an incident to the estate of joint tenancy. Accordingly choses in action are not within the statute, and survivorship therein has not been abolished. Trammell v. Harrell, 4 Ark. 602; Sessions v. Peay, 19 Ark. 267. In Trammell v. Harrell, supra, in an elaborate discussion of the history of survivorship as an incident to joint tenancy, it was said: "The 6th sec. of ch. 58 of the Revised Code, p. 476, declares that 'all survivorships of real and personal estate are forever abolished.' Now, the inquiry is as to the meaning of this sentence. Was it intended to abolish the right of action surviving to a joint payee or obligee, and confine us to comparatively encumbered remedies? Or was it to prevent this very state of things that the whole sentence was inserted? In order to ascertain the true meaning of the act we will first inquire what was the old law, the mischief and remedy upon this subject. The territorial law declared that the doctrine of survivorship, in cases of joint tenancy should never be allowed. Now, it is apparent that the revised statutes only reaffirm and reassert that principle. All the states in the Union have similar provisions, and they are all upheld by alike high and patriotic considerations. The doctrine of entails and primogeniture, and the jus accrescendi, and the abolition of all patents of nobility, were the feudal badges which the American government intended to sweep away, and thus break down all hereditary family succession by unfettering property and distributing it equally and justly among all the members of society. What is the meaning of 'all survivorships of real and personal estate?' It means that kind of an estate that springs out of a joint tenancy. To constitute a joint tenancy there must be a unity of interest, of title, of time and possession, and this usually relates to realty, although it is sometimes true in regard to personal estate. The destruction of any one of these unities will terminate the joint tenancy. 2 Black. Com. 185, Co. Lit. 193. Joint tenancies are now regarded with so little favor, both in courts of law and equity, that whenever the expression will admit of it, the estate shall always be regarded as held in common. Fisher v. Wigg, 1 P. Wms. 14n. 1 Ld. Raym. 622. And Lord Cowper says that a joint tenancy in equity is an odious thing. Things personal may be held in joint tenancy; as, if a personal chattel be given to two or more absolutely, they are joint tenants thereof, and unless the jointure be severed, the same doctrine of survivorship will take place as in lands and tenements. 2 Black. Com. 399; 1 Vern. 488. Between partners in trade or farming, generally speaking, there can legally be no survivorship as to personal property in possession, for each of their respective shares goes to their personal representatives, and they become tenants in common with the survivor, the maxim being inter mercatores jus accrescendi locum non habet. Co. Lit. 3, 282, 182a. A court of equity will bar survivorship, although the deceased wished the stock to survive. And if two persons take a farm the lease will survive, but if they lay out money in the way of trade, that shall not survive. Although there is no sur-vivorship as to partnership property in possession, yet, according to the principles of the common law, there is as to choses in action; for, when one or more partners having a joint and legal interest in a contract die, an action against the parties must be brought in the name of the survivor; and the executor or administrator of the deceased cannot join, neither can he sue separately, but must resort to a court of equity to obtain from the survivor the testator's estate. 1 East 497. See Salk. 441. These principles clearly show that the kind of survivorship that the legislature intended to abolish, as to personal estate, related alone to a joint tenancy in such estate, and to the rents and profits issuing out of the realty. It was where the whole interest in the estate passed, and where the survivor took all that the act abolished, and not the mere right of action, which would always pass or survive to a co-obligee. Now, as to choses in action, as notes, bonds and the like, there never was survivorship, if they were given in any way of trade. And this shows that the survivorship in relation to personal estate, which the legislature abolished, was never intended to include such a case. And the general words of the act must be taken in a qualified sense; for, unless that be done they will defeat the very object and intention of the statute. Instead of remedying the evil, it would produce the very mischief intended to be cured. It would operate to the prejudice of trade and commerce, by encumbering the remedies by which rights would be asserted. Such a construction put upon the act would be in direct derogation of all the principles of commerce, which are now so firmly and beneficially established among all civilized nations. And men, instead of being encouraged to join their means and efforts together, for important objects and ends, for trade and other purposes, would stand aloof from each other, if, upon the decease of one partner, the other had not the sole right to wind up the business. We think this principle, so completely and intimately blended as it is in our commercial relations, too plain to require further illustration or argument."

Under the statutes of Arkansas, devise of lands to executors to sell and divide the proceeds equally among the children of the testator creates a tenancy in common, not a joint tenancy. Lester v. Kirtley, 83 Ark. 554, 104 S. W. 213.

5. CALIFORNIA.

The statutes of California sustain the following provisions: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer, to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees. [Commissioners' Amendment, approved March 16, 1901; took effect July 1, 1901.]” (Civil Code, § 683.) And “every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common, unless acquired by them as executors or trustees or in partnership for partnership purposes, or unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest, as provided in section six hundred and eighty-three, or unless acquired as community property, or unless when conveyed to a husband and wife, the conveyance declares that it is to be held by them as tenants by the entireties. [Commissioners' Amendment, approved March 16, 1901; took effect July 1, 1901.]” (Civil Code, § 686.) And it is further provided that “a devise or legacy given to more than one person vests in them as owners in common.” (Civil Code, § 1350.) Section 683 of Civil Code, supra, was founded on the Act of April 27, 1855, which provided as follows: “Every interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors and trustees as such, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared in the grant or devise to be a joint tenancy.”

Before the enactment of the statute of 1855, a conveyance to two or more, simply, without other qualifying words, created a joint tenancy as at common law. Greer v. Blanchar, 40 Cal. 194, wherein a conveyance “in trust for the use and benefit of Harriet M. Risly and S. Risly” made before the enactment of the statute, was held to be a joint tenancy.

Under that statute, and under the code provisions heretofore quoted a conveyance to two or more creates a tenancy in common unless in the conveyance itself the estate is expressly declared to be a joint tenancy. Bowen v. May, 12 Cal. 348; In re Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 Pac. 53; Conde v. Dreisam-Gold Min. Co. 3 Cal. App. 583, 80 Pac. 825. In Bowen v. May, supra, the court said: “The fact that two persons join in a mortgage of lands does not raise a presumption that the estate conveyed is joint property. Joint tenancies are not favored by our system—the statute having abrogated the common-law rule of conveyances in this respect—so that in order to constitute a joint estate in lands in two or more persons, such estate must be expressly declared in the conveyance itself, otherwise the estate conveyed will be held by the grantees as tenants in common. (Wood's Dig. art. 380.)”

Where the provisions of the statute (Civil Code, § 683) are complied with, a joint tenancy with survivorship may exist in personalty as well as in realty. Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 127 Cal. 142, 149, 50 Pac. 390; In re Harris, 169 Cal. 725, 147 Pac. 967; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 146 Pac. 647.

The Act of 1855 was not retroactive, i. e. it did not affect joint tenancies created previous to its passage, and the court has said that it could not have done so. Dewey v. Lambier, 7 Cal. 347; Greer v. Blanchar, 40 Cal. 194. In Dewey v. Lambier, supra, the court said: “It may be supposed that the first section of the Act of 1855, passed April 27, concerning conveyances, has destroyed the joint tenancy that was created by deed. The statute was only intended to apply to future and not to past conveyances. Indeed, the power of the legislature to affect past contracts, and alter or destroy the nature or tenure of estates, could not be maintained.” And in Greer v. Blanchar, 40 Cal. 194, it was said: “It is also contended that the Act of April 27, 1855, which provides that ‘every interest in real estate, granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors and trustees as such, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared in the grant or devise to be a joint tenancy,’ changed the rule, and converted existing joint tenancies, which were not expressly declared to be such, in the grant or devise by which they were created, into tenancies in common. There is nothing in the statute showing that it was intended that it should have a retrospective operation; and, if such were the intention, the legislature had not competent authority to give such an effect to the statute, as would deprive joint tenants of one of the essential elements of their tenure—the right of survivorship.”

The statute of 1855 has been held not to apply to trustees, and under it there was survivorship between joint trustees. Saunders v. Schmaelzle, 49 Cal. 59, wherein the court said: “The trustees held the title as joint tenants. Whenever, by the terms of gift, it is doubtful whether trustees take as joint tenants, or tenants in common, courts will construe a joint tenancy if possible. (Perry on Trusts, sec. 343, and cases cited.) And the Statute of April 27, 1855, provided: ‘Every interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors and trustees as such, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared in the grant or devise to be a joint tenancy.’ (Acts 1855, 1871.) On the death of Halleck, therefore, the whole estate devolved upon the survivors. The survivorship of the estate carries with it survivorship of such powers as are annexed to the trust. ‘If an estate is vested in three trustees upon a trust to sell, there, as the power is coupled with an interest, and the interest survives, the power also survives. And this is as old as Lord

Coke, who says: "If a man deviseth land to his executors to be sold, and maketh two executors, and one dieth, yet the survivor may sell, because as the estate, so the trust shall survive; and so note the diversity between a bare trust and a trust coupled with an interest." (Perry, sec. 505.)"

Under the Act of 1855, a devise "to my . . . daughter . . . and to her children" has been held to create a tenancy in common. In re Utz, 43 Cal. 201.

It was said in Dewitt v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. 289, 297, that two corporations cannot hold as joint tenants. In that case the court said: "Joint tenancy is a technical feudal estate, founded, like the laws of primogeniture, on the principle of the aggregation of landed estates in the hands of a few, and opposed to their division among many persons. For the creation of a joint tenancy, four unities are required, namely: unity of interest, unity of title, unity of time, unity of possession. . . . Two corporations cannot hold as joint tenants, because two of the essential unities are wanting, namely: of the same capacity and title. . . . Nor can they hold as joint tenants, for another reason: being each perpetual, there can be no survivorship between them; and this, as we have just seen, is the distinguishing incident of this estate. Nor can a corporation hold lands as joint tenant with a natural person, for there is no reciprocity of survivorship between them."

6. COLORADO.

In Colorado survivorship as an incident to cotenancies has been abolished by statute (Act of 1861 Colorado, now Mills Ann. Stats. 1912, § 4152). That section provides as follows: "If partition be not made between joint tenants, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivor or survivors, but descend or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts, dower, charges, etc., or transmissible to executors or administrators, and be considered to every intent and purpose in the same view as if such deceased joint tenants had been tenants in common. [L. '61 p. 113, § 1; R. S. '68, p. 368, § 1; G. L. '77, § 1406; G. S. '83, § 1832; 2 M. A. S. § 2526; R. S. '08, § 3602.]" No case within the scope of this note has been found construing the foregoing statute.

7. CONNECTICUT.

In Connecticut survivorship, as an incident to joint tenancy, has not been recognized, at least since 1769. Phelps v. Jepson, 1 Root 48, 1 Am. Dec. 33 (March 1769); Allen v. Almy, reported in full, post, this volume at page 112; Bill v. Payne, 62 Conn. 140, 142, 25 Atl. 354 (semble). See also Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 217, 219. In Phelps v. Jepson, supra, it appeared that there were joint tenants of land, that one of them died and that the survivor made a deed of the whole premises to the plaintiff. The question in the case was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the whole or to only one moiety of the premises, and the court adjudged the plaintiff to be entitled to only one moiety. In a note to the case, apparently by Judge Root, the reporter, it is said: "By this decision the doctrine of survivorship between joint tenants was exploded, and determined not to be the law in this state, which settled the law as to this point, and has never since, to my knowledge, been contradicted or shaken."

It follows that there is no practical distinction between joint tenancy and tenancy in common in that state. Whittlesey v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 337, 340; Houghton v. Brantingham, 86 Conn. 630, 86 Atl. 664; Allen v. Almy, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 112. In Houghton v. Brantingham, supra, the court said: "The defendants claim that they take the estate jointly under a technical joint tenancy with all of its incidents, including survivorship. If there is survivorship, it is by virtue of the provisions of the will, and not by virtue of the joint tenancy. There may be joint tenancies in this state, but survivorship as an incident thereto has never been recognized here. There is here practically no difference between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common. Each tenant is seized of an undivided share of the whole, proportioned to the number of tenants, as was the case at common law in tenancies in common. But at common law, in the case of a joint tenancy, each tenant is seized of the whole as well as of every part—per my et per tout—and it is to this seizin by each of the entirety that the incident of survivorship is due. Upon the death of one, the other or others remain seized of the whole. In this state, therefore, there can be no joint tenancy with the right of survivorship, unless such right is created by the will or other conveyance creating the tenancy. Whether it can be so created, we need not in this case inquire."

There may, however, be joint tenancies, of a kind, but without the distinguishing incident of the jus accrescendi. Houghton v. Brantingham, 86 Conn. 630, 86 Atl. 664; Allen v. Almy, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 112.

It has been said that the law of Connecticut prefers an estate in common to a joint tenancy, thus showing that some distinction between the two estates is recognized. Bill v. Payne, 62 Conn. 140, 142, 25 Atl. 354;

Allen v. Almy, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 112.

Although the law does not recognize the jus accrescendi as an incident to an ordinary joint tenancy, nevertheless where there is a gift by legacy or devise to a class it has been held that the share of a deceased legatee or devisee goes to the survivor or survivors, and that if the testamentary gift is to the donees as joint tenants they take, prima facie, as a class, otherwise they take as tenants in common. Jacobs v. Bradley, 30 Conn. 365; Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 217. See also Morris v. Bolles, 65 Conn. 45, 31 Atl. 538; Rockwell v. Bradshaw, 67 Conn. 8, 34 Atl. 758; Humason v. Andrews, 72 Conn. 595, 45 Atl. 354. In Bolles v. Smith, supra, it appeared that there was a residuary devise to A, B and C, the nephews of the deceased testator, who were the only sons of the testator's brother, and that they had lived with the testator; that he had no lineal heirs, no brothers and sisters living, and that all his other nephews and nieces had been provided for by legacies. It was held that under the foregoing circumstances it appeared to have been the intention of the testator to give the residuary devise to B, and C as a class and not as tenants in common, so that the share of A, he having predeceased the testator, went to B and C by survivorship. The court said, in that case: "It is true that by the law of Connecticut the survivors, in ordinary cases of joint tenancy, do not take the whole estate. But the argument does not depend upon the jus accrescendi. If they are joint tenants, prima facie they take as a class. If they take as a class the lapsed legacy goes to the survivors."

It has been laid down as a general rule of construction, that where a legacy is given to two or more persons, nominatim, to be divided equally among them, and one of them dies before the testator, his share will become intestate, i. e. such legatees take as tenants in common; but that where the legacy is to two or more as a class, the share of a deceased legatee survives to the others; but that all these rules yield to the manifest intention of the testator. Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 217, 219; Morris v. Bolles, 65 Conn. 45, 52, 31 Atl. 538; Rockwell v. Bradshaw, 67 Conn. 8, 34 Atl. 758; Humason v. Andrews, 72 Conn. 595, 45 Atl. 354. In Bolles v. Smith, supra, it was said: "It is a general rule of construction that where a legacy is given to two or more persons, nominatim, to be equally divided among them, and one of them dies before the testator, his share will become intestate; but where the legacy is to two or more as a class, the share of a deceased legatee goes to the survivor or survivors. Prima facie joint legatees take as a class; otherwise where the legacy is given to them as tenants in common. All these rules however yield to the manifest intention of the testator, as gathered from the whole will, viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances," and these words have been quoted in the other cases cited under the foregoing proposition.

Therefore if there is anything in the will or in the surrounding circumstances which will make manifest the intention of the testator that the legatees or devisees are to take not as a class but severally there will be no survivorship. Morris v. Bolles, 65 Conn. 45, 52, 31 Atl. 538; Rockwell v. Bradshaw, 67 Conn. 8, 16, 17, 34 Atl. 758; Humason v. Andrews, 72 Conn. 595, 45 Atl. 354. See also Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 217.

It has been held that in a devise to the testator's daughters the words "share and share alike" show such an intent to create several interests that they make a tenancy in common not a joint tenancy, and that therefore the devise is not a devise to a class and the share of a deceased devisee does not go to the survivors. Humason v. Andrews, 72 Conn. 595, wherein the court said: "In the case before us the gift was to the testator's daughters, naming them, and the income was to be divided equally between them. The phrase 'share and share alike' occurs both in the second and in the fourth clauses of the will. In the latter it clearly means that the three grandchildren shall take severally one-third of the residue of the estate. We see no reason why the same words in the second clause should not mean that one-half of the income of the estate is given to each of the two daughters. Under the general rules of construction above cited, we think the income was not given to them jointly, but severally as tenants in common, and that each of the daughters took individually and not as a member of a class. We discover nothing in the language of the will or the attendant circumstances to indicate a contrary intention of the testator. The court of common pleas erred in overruling the demurrer and deciding that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover."

8. DELAWARE.

By virtue of a Delaware statute, no estate in joint tenancy may be created, except to executors and trustees, other than by the express use of the particular words "to be held as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common." Davis v. Smith, 4 Harr. 68. The statute is as follows: "No estate in joint tenancy, in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be held or claimed by or under any grant, devise, or conveyance made to any persons, other than to executors or trustees, unless the premises therein mentioned shall be expressly granted, devised, or conveyed to such persons, to be held as joint tenants and not as tenants in common." (Revised Code, chap 86, sec. 1.)

Unless the testator uses the particular words prescribed by the statute, his intent to create a joint tenancy, no matter how clear, will be of no effect. Davis v. Smith, 4 Harr. 68, wherein it was held that a devise to A and B "jointly, their heirs and assigns forever," did not create a joint tenancy but a tenancy in common. The court said: "The court cannot regard the intention of a testator, when such intention is contrary to law. The intention of this testator, even if it appears to have been to devise a joint tenancy, cannot be carried out, unless he uses the words which are necessary to create such an estate."

9. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The courts of the District of Columbia, in accord with the modern tendency of both English and American courts, favor tenancy in common rather than joint tenancy. Seitz v. Seitz, 11 App. Cas. 358.

But since Congress has not seen fit, like the legislatures of practically all the states, to change the rule of construction of cotenancies, the common-law rule still prevails in the district, that a conveyance of land to two or more, without any sufficient expression of intention to sever, will be construed to create a joint tenancy and not a tenancy in common, whatever may have been the true intent of the parties. Seitz v. Seitz, 11 App. Cas. 358, wherein the court said: "We fully recognize the fact that, however the case may have been in the past, neither in our own country nor in England at this day is the construction favored that would make a joint tenancy rather than a tenancy in common. It has been said that courts of equity are even astute to find reasons for the construction that from any given instrument of writing would raise a tenancy in common, rather than a joint tenancy. And it is undoubtedly true, that in the vast majority of cases substantial justice is done and effect given to the true intention of the parties by such construction. At the same time, we are compelled also to recognize the fact that it is an inflexible and inexorable rule of the common law, repeatedly declared to be in force in the District of Columbia, and become an absolute rule of property, which could not be disregarded without disturbing a vast number of titles and unsettling the whole law of real estate, that a conveyance of land to two or more persons, without any sufficient indication of intention in the instrument of conveyance that the grantees are to hold in severalty, is to be construed as joint tenancy, and not as a tenancy in common, whatever may have been the true intention of the parties in that regard. We know that this rule of the common law has been changed almost everywhere else by statute; but the Congress of the United States has not yet thought proper to change it in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding that its attention has been called to the subject; and we are bound by the rule as it stands."

10. FLORIDA.

The doctrine of survivorship as applied to joint tenancies in real and personal property is abolished in Florida by a statute which provides as follows: "The doctrine of the right of survivorship in cases of real estate and personal property held by joint tenants shall not prevail in this state." (Gen. Stats. § 2294; Rev. Stats. of 1892, § 1819.) No Florida case within the scope of this note has been found.

The doctrine of survivorship as applied to joint tenancies was abolished in Georgia by the 51st section of the constitution of 1777, and has not been recognized since. Lowe v. Brooks, 23 Ga. 325; Carswell v. Schley, 56 Ga. 101, 108; Equitable Loan, etc. Co. v. Waring, 117 Ga. 599, 676, 44 S. E. 320, 97 Am. St. Rep. 177, 62 L.R.A. 93. That section provided as follows: "Estates shall not be entailed; and when a person dies intestate, his or her estate shall be divided equally among his or her children; the widow shall have a child's share or her dower at her option."

Not until 1857, however, was it definitely decided (in Lowe v. Brooks, 23 Ga. 325) that the foregoing section of the constitution had the effect of abolishing the jus accrescendi and because of some doubt in this regard the legislature in 1828 passed an act abolishing survivorship in joint tenancy in lands, and in 1854 an act was passed extending the provisions of the Act of 1828 "to personal estate held in joint tenancy." Lowe v. Brooks, 23 Ga. 325, wherein the history of these statutory enactments was outlined as follows: "By a rule of the common law, on the death of one joint tenant, the property held in joint tenancy, whether real or personal, went to the surviving joint tenants. In 1828, the legislature passed an act in these words: 'Whereas, it is doubtful whether the right of survivorship, as under the English Law, does not still exist in this state, in all estates of joint tenancy. Be it enacted, That from, and after, the passage of this act, when two or more persons shall hold and possess any estate of lands in joint tenancy, in this state, and one or more of said joint tenants may depart this life during the existence of said estate, the title or interest of the deceased joint tenant, in said estate shall not go and become the property of the surviving joint tenant or tenants, as under the English law, but that the same shall be distributed as all other estates, under the existing laws of this state.' Cobb's Dig. 545. This act confines itself to estates in 'lands.' In 1854, the legislature extended the act 'to personal estate held in joint tenancy.' Acts of 1853-'4. 70." See also Bryan v. Averett, 21 Ga. 401, 68 Am. Dec. 464.

The effect of the foregoing provisions of the fundamental and statute law of Georgia has been preserved in the even more sweeping provision of the Civil Code: "Joint tenancy does not exist in this state, and all such estates, under the English law, will be held to be tenancies in common under this code." (Civil Code, § 3142.) By virtue of that statute a will granting an estate in such words as at common law would have created a joint tenancy will, in Georgia, create a tenancy in common. Harrison v. Harrison, 105 Ga. 517, 31 S. E. 455, 70 Am. St. Rep. 60.

However, in spite of the sweeping character of the provision of the code abolishing joint tenancies, it has been held that contracts expressly providing for survivorship are not forbidden thereby. Equitable Loan, etc. Co. v. Waring, 117 Ga. 599, 44 S. E. 320, 97 Am. St. Rep. 177, 62 L.R.A. 93, wherein the court said: "While the doctrine of survivorship as applied to joint tenancies has been distinctly abolished and does not exist in this state, there is no law of this state that we are aware of which prevents parties to a contract, or a testator in his will, from expressly providing that an interest in property shall be dependent upon survivorship. Of course all presumptions are against such an intention; but where the contract or will provides, either in express terms or by necessary implication that the doctrine of survivorship shall be recognized, we know of no reason why a provision in the contract or will dependent upon such doctrine may not become operative under the laws of this state."

. . . At common law an estate in joint tenancy, with the incident of survivorship, was created in any case where lands or tenements were granted to two or more persons, to be held in fee simple, fee tail, for life, for years, or at will. The mere creation of the estate in two or more persons, without more, drew to it the incident of survivorship. See 2 Bl. Com. 180. In Georgia the mere creation of the estate in two or more persons never draws to it survivorship as an incident, and the presumption is in all cases that survivorship was not intended. But where by express terms or necessary implication a survivorship is provided for, the law of Georgia allows it to exist."

12. HAWAII.

In Hawaii the courts adopt the modern statutory rule rather than the common-law rule, and hold cotenancies to be in common unless there is expression of an intention to create a joint tenancy. Zupplein v. Austin, 6 Hawaii 8, wherein the court said: "Estates will be taken to be held in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressly said that the grantees, feoffees, or devisees, shall hold the same lands jointly, or as joint tenants, or to them and the survivor, or unless some words are used which show an intention that the same shall be held in joint tenancy."

It has been held in Hawaii that the members of a land hui, or peculiar Hawaiian land partnership, are tenants in common of the land, in proportion to their respective ownership of shares. Pilipo v. Scott, 21 Hawaii 609; In re Assessment of Taxes, 21 Hawaii 676. See also Burrows v. Paaluhii, 4 Hawaii 464; Foster v. Kaneohe Ranck Co. 12 Hawaii 363.

13. IDAHO.

The common law as to joint tenancies has been abrogated in Idaho by a statute which provides as follows: "Every interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors or trustees, as such constitutes a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared in the grant or devise to be otherwise." (Rev. Codes, §§ 3059, 3104.)

Under the foregoing provision it has been held that where the heirs of a deceased entryman are granted a patent for the lands entered by their ancestor, they take as tenants in common and not as joint tenants. Powell v. Powell, 22 Idaho 531, 126 Pac. 1058.

14. ILLINOIS.

a. Statutes Stated and Compared.

In 1821 the General Assembly of Illinois passed an act "concerning partition and joint rights and obligations," section 2 of which has never been expressly repealed but has been continued in all the revisions and now appears verbatim as paragraph 6744 (sec. 1, chap. 76) of Illinois Statutes Annotated (1913) as follows: "That if partition be not made between joint tenants, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivors, but descend or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts, dower, charges, etc., or transmissible to executors or administrators, and be considered, to every intent and purpose, in the same view as if such deceased joint tenants had been tenants in common." Gaunt v. Stevens, 241 Ill. 542, 89 N. E. 812.

But in 1827 another act was passed regarding joint tenancies, which has also been re-enacted to date, and, except for the replacing of the word "whatever" by "whatsoever," and of the last words "a tenancy in common" by the words "in tenancy in common," appears verbatim as paragraph 2236 of Illinois Statutes Annotated, as follows: "No estate in joint tenancy in any lands, tenements [or] hereditaments shall be held or claimed under any grant, devise or conveyance whatsoever, heretofore or hereafter made, other than to executors and trustees, unless the premises therein mentioned shall expressly be thereby declared to pass, not in tenancy in common, but in joint tenancy; and every such estate, other than to executors and trustees (unless otherwise expressly declared as aforesaid), shall be deemed to be in tenancy in common." Gaunt v. Stevens, 241 Ill. 542, 89 N. E. 812.

It will be seen that in spite of the fact that these two statutes have both been re-enacted through all the revisions, they appear on their face inconsistent. The first was a sweeping abolition of the jus accrescendi, abolishing thereby all distinction between joint tenancy and tenancy in common. The second recognizes a distinction, and allows a joint tenancy to be established by an express declaration that the premises are to pass "not in tenancy in common, but in joint tenancy."

Reading the two statutes together, the question would immediately arise whether by "joint tenancy" the Act of 1827 meant to allow the joint tenancy of the common law, with its essential incident of survivorship, or whether it meant joint tenancy as that estate was left by the Act of 1821, i. e. an estate stripped of the incident of survivorship and indistinguishable, practically, from tenancy in common.

That question came directly before the court in the case of Mette v. Feltgen, 148 Ill. 357, 36 N. E. 81, and the court answered it by holding therein that the Act of 1827 worked a repeal of the Act of 1821 to the extent that it allowed joint tenancy to be expressly created; that the joint tenancy thus allowed was the common-law estate, with survivorship; and that the subsequent re-enactment of the contradictory statutes without change had left the law in just the same state that it was in after the original enactment of the second statute and before the first revision.

These statutes were fully discussed and interpreted in the case of Mette v. Feltgen, supra, which settled the law on this point.

The court said therein: "It seems plain that the act of 1821 undertook to deal only with joint tenancies and tenancies in common held by the tenants in their own rights, or in right of their wives. Such is the express limitation contained in the language of section 1, and that limitation undoubtedly was intended to apply to and control the entire act. No other tenancies were within the legislative contemplation. The act therefore had no application to estates held by executors, trustees, or others holding estates in autre droit. But as to estates held by the tenants in their own rights or in right of their wives, whether held as joint tenants or tenants in common, the act gave the right to compel partition, and in cases of joint tenants, if partition was not made, the right of survivorship was taken away, and it was provided that the part of the tenant dying first should pass by descent or devise, and be subject to debts, dower, charges, etc., and be transmissible to executors or administrators, and be considered to every intent and purpose in the same view as if the deceased joint tenant had been a tenant in common. The effect of this statute clearly was, to practically abolish joint tenancies where the estates were held by the tenants in their own rights or in right of their wives, or, that which is the same thing, to convert them into tenancies in common. The right of survivorship, which is and always has been the principal and distinguishing incident of joint tenancies, was taken away, and upon the death of the tenant without having made partition, the estate was to be treated and considered, to every intent and purpose, as a tenancy in common. The Act of 1827 made no reference to that of 1821, but as it was the later expression of the legislative will, it had the effect of repealing or modifying the former act, in so far as it was inconsistent therewith. It becomes important then, in the first place, to determine the proper interpretation to be placed upon that act, standing by itself. In using without explanation or qualification the terms 'joint tenancy' and 'tenancy in common,' terms having at common law a fixed and well understood meaning, it was doubtless intended to use them in their ordinary common-law sense. Its effect was to restore the right to create estates in joint tenancy, as known at common law, in so far as that right was abrogated by the Act of 1821, rather by tacit recognition than by express words, and then undertook to change the rule of presumptions obtaining at common law, where a conveyance of lands was made to two or more persons. Where an estate was conveyed to a plurality of persons without adding any restrictive, exclusive or explanatory words, such conveyance, at common law, was held to constitute the grantees joint tenants and not tenants in common, it being necessary, in order to create a tenancy in common by deed, to add exclusive or explanatory words, so as to expressly limit the estate to the grantees, to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants. 2 Black. Com. 180, 193. By section 5 of the Act of 1827, this rule, except in cases of conveyances to executors or trustees, was precisely reversed. Under that section, a conveyance to two or more persons, without restrictive or explanatory words, created a tenancy in common, and in order to create a joint tenancy, the estate had to be expressly declared to pass, not in tenancy in common but in joint tenancy. If the question had arisen at any time after the passage of the Act of 1827 and prior to the revision of 1845, it would have presented no material difficulty. The rule established by the Act of 1827 would have been held to prevail, that being the latest act, and as that act clearly recognized the existence of estates in joint tenancy, a well-known species of common-law estates, and expressly provided the mode in which they might be created, the result would have logically followed, that joint estates created in the manner prescribed were joint tenancies in the common-law sense, and possessing the qualities and incidents which the common law attaches to them, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act of 1821 to the contrary. The view that the estate in joint tenancy referred to in the Act of 1827 was the common-law estate, with its common-law incidents, is strengthened by reference to the provisions of the act in relation to the tenancy when vested in executors or trustees. As we have already seen, tenancies of that character are not within the purview of the Act of 1821, nor affected by its provisions. They were doubtless excluded from the operation of that act, on account of the manifest impropriety of compelling partition between joint tenants holding in a trust capacity, and the obvious advantages resulting from an application of the rule of survivorship to joint tenants of that character. The Act of 1827 also expressly excepts from its operation executors and trustees, thus keeping in force as to them the common-law rule, but provides that in other cases, to create a joint tenancy, it must be expressly declared in the deed to be such and not a tenancy in common. But there is nothing in the Act of 1827 furnishing the least indication that the legislature intended to attach to joint tenancies where the tenants held in their own right, any other or different incidents, than those which properly belonged to the estate where executors or trustees were the tenants. It is beyond question that in the latter class of joint tenancies, it was the intention of the act that the incident of survivorship should prevail, and as the act furnishes no indication to the contrary, it would seem to be equally clear, that the same rule was intended to apply to those where the tenants were such in their own right. Up to the passage of the Revised Statutes of 1845, the law on the subject, so far as it was declared by statute, was to be found in the Act of 1821, as modified by the Act of 1827, the latter act prevailing and furnishing the rule in all matters where the two were inconsistent with each other. It would seem therefore that the re-enactment of these two statutes, without change of phraseology, in the revision of 1845, and again in the revision of 1874, was intended as a re adoption of the statutory law on the subject in precisely the condition in which it was before any revision was made. It has been held, and we think correctly, that where there are repugnant provisions in a revised code, those portions which are transcribed from later statutes must be deemed to repeal sections adopted earlier, or transcribed from earlier statutes, or to so modify them as to produce agreement between such repugnant provisions. Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, sec. 183. Under these circumstances, we are disposed to hold that the two statutes under consideration still sustain to each other the same relation which existed prior to the revision of 1845, and that they should be construed now the same as they would have been construed prior to that revision. As a consequence, the Act of 1827 must still be regarded as repealing or modifying the Act of 1821, to the extent of permitting parties to create the common-law estate of joint tenancy, with its common-law incidents, by expressly declaring in a deed running to two or more grantees, that the estate conveyed shall pass not in tenancy in common, but in joint tenancy."

In a separate opinion in the same case Mr. Justice Magruder, while arriving at the same effect as that reached by the majority of the court, argued that there was no necessary conflict in the statutes; that the first did not abolish all joint tenancies, but only such as would at common law be created by operation of law, leaving such as might be created by express declaration or contract of the parties; and that the second statute merely recognized this class of joint tenancies and prescribed how they might be expressly created.

b. Effect of Statutes.

Joint tenancies are not favored in Illinois as they were at common law. Slater v. Gruger, 165 Ill. 329, 333, 46 N. E. 235; Mustain v. Gardner, 203 Ill. 284, 67 N. E. 779; Cover v. James, 217 Ill. 309, 75 N. E. 490.

It has been held that the Act of 1821 applied to personal property as well as to realty, and abolished the right of survivorship therein. Hay v. Bennett, 153 Ill. 271, 38 N. E. 645, affirming Bradford v. Bennett, 48 Ill. App. 145.

The intention to create a joint tenancy must be so clear as not to leave a reasonable doubt in the mind of the court of the purpose to create that estate, otherwise it will be a tenancy in common. Gaunt v. Stevens, 241 Ill. 542, 89 N. E. 812, wherein it was said: "While it is settled that the exact words of the statute need not be used in the instrument, yet the unfavorable disposition of the legislature toward joint estates has influenced this court in establishing the rule that the intention to create such estate must be so clearly expressed as to leave no reasonable doubt in the mind of the court of the purpose to create such estate."

A deed granting an estate to two or more "not as tenants in common, but as joint tenants," thus using the words of the statute, creates a common-law or joint tenancy with the right of survivorship. Mette v. Feltgen (Ill.) 27 N. E. 911.

To create an estate in joint tenancy it is not, however, necessary to use the exact words of the Act of 1827, "not in tenancy in common, but in joint tenancy," nor to use the words "joint tenancy." Any words will create a joint tenancy which show: (1) That the testator (or grantor) understood the nature of and distinction between a tenancy in common and a joint tenancy; and (2) that he clearly intended to create a joint tenancy, or to create a survivorship right as an incident to a granted cotenancy. Slater v. Gruger, 165 Ill. 329, 46 N. E. 235; Mustain v. Gardner, 203 Ill. 284, 67 N. E. 779; Cover v. James, 217 Ill. 309, 75 N. E. 490 (semble.) In Slater v. Gruger, supra, it appeared that in the deed in question there was a specific provision for survivorship in the premises in the naming of the grantees, and after the description of the premises the following appeared: "The conveyance herein is made to said grantees in joint tenancy." Holding this to be sufficient to pass a joint tenancy under the Act of 1827, the court said: "But it is argued by appellees that no estate in joint tenancy can be created unless the language of the statute is used in the grant, and the premises are not only declared to pass in joint tenancy, but that they are not to pass in tenancy in common. It is urged that this deed is not sufficiently explicit in that regard. It is plain that joint tenancies are not favored by the legislature, and it was undoubtedly the object of the statute that the deed should clearly and explicitly show that the premises are not to pass in tenancy in common; but where that is the real intention, and it is made clear by the instrument, the particular phraseology used to show it cannot be important. The mere use of different terms, where it is clear that the parties understood the nature and incidents of the different estates, and where the language shows that the estate intended is clearly not a tenancy in common but a joint tenancy, should not defeat their purpose." In Mustain v. Gardner, 203 Ill. 284, 67 N. E. 779, the court said: "The only question presented by this record is whether the devisees took as joint tenants or as tenants in common. Joint tenancies are looked upon with disfavor in this state. For this reason section 5 of the act concerning conveyances (1 Starr & Cur. Stat. 1896, p. 916) was adopted. [Here the court quotes the statute of 1827.] The devise does not expressly declare that the estate thereby created and devised is an estate in joint tenancy and not an estate in common. But such a declaration is not indispensable. It is enough if it shall appear from the phraseology of the devise that the testator understood the nature and incidents of the two estates, and the language employed be such as to clearly and explicitly show that the premises are not to pass in tenancy in common. . . . In the absence of an affirmative declaration that the estate devised is in joint tenancy, an estate in tenancy in common will be devised, unless it clearly and explicitly appears from the language employed that the testator understood the nature and incidents of the different estates and intended to create a joint tenancy. The quality of survivorship is the distinguishing feature of a joint tenancy, and where the grant or devise expressly imparts that quality to the estate, . . . it will be deemed effectual to create a joint tenancy, though the negation indicated by the statute be omitted." In Cover v. James, 217 Ill. 309, 75 N. E. 490, a conveyance to two grantees and "in case of the death of either . . . , the other to have the whole of said property without litigation" was held to be valid to create a survivorship, although the court said that it was unnecessary to decide whether a joint tenancy was created or not.

A devise to A and B, "during their joint lives, and to the survivor of them during her natural life," creates a joint tenancy under the statute. Pritchard v. Walker, 22 Ill. App. 286, affirmed 121 Ill. 221, 12 N. E. 336.

In the absence of any words to show clearly that the grantor understood the natures of the two estates, and that he intended to create a joint tenancy or survivorship, a grant of a cotenancy will create a tenancy in common. Cheney v. Teese, 108 Ill. 473; Mustain v. Gardner, 203 Ill. 284, 67 N. E. 779. In the case last cited, the court held that a tenancy in common was created by a devise to the wife and daughter of the testator, "jointly," and "to them and their heirs and assigns forever." The court said: "The devise under consideration does not, in terms, negative the presumption which arises from the statute that it was the intention of the testator to create an estate in tenancy in common, and does not, in terms, declare it to be the intent to create a joint tenancy; nor do we find anything in the language of the devise to indicate that the testator understood the nature and incidents of the different estates, or either of them, and desired that an estate having the peculiar characteristic of survivorship should pass by the devise. The word 'jointly,' found in the devise, cannot be accepted as sufficient to show, clearly and explicitly, that the testator intended that the estate devised should possess the attribute of survivorship. Tenants in common or coparceners hold the estate 'jointly' until a severance is effected. . . . It is entirely consistent with the use made by the testator of this word 'jointly' to construe it as indicating only an intent to devise the estate to both devisees, and as it cannot be construed to declare, explicitly and clearly, the intent that the estate, as an entirety, should inure to the survivor of the devisees, it cannot avail to take the devise out of the operation of the statute. The statute must be given effect and the estate devised declared to be an estate in tenancy in common."

Even where there are words, such as words of survivorship, which alone might show an intention to create a joint tenancy, the addition of other words which show an intention of, or a contemplation of, a division or distribution will negative and outweigh the expression of intention to create a joint tenancy and will make the estate created a tenancy in common. Gaunt v. Stevens, 241 Ill. 542, 89 N. E. 812, wherein it was held that a devise to "my said wife . . . and my two daughters . . . and to the survivor or survivors of them, share and share alike" created a tenancy in common, not a joint tenancy. The court said: "If the instrument contains language from which it can reasonably be inferred that the maker contemplated a division of the property among the purchasers, or from which it can be seen that a distribution, either in equal or unequal shares, was intended, such language will be held to negative an intention to create an estate in joint tenancy and the purchasers will take as tenants in common. . . . The only language of the fourth clause of the will now under consideration that gives any color of the claim that a joint estate was intended are the words, 'to the survivor or survivors of them.' Whether these words, if unlimited in any way, would be sufficient to create a joint tenancy we are not called upon to decide, since in our opinion the words 'share and share alike,' which immediately follow the words of survivorship, clearly indicate that the testator intended that there should be an equal division between such of the devisees as might be living at his death, which division is inconsistent with the existence of a joint estate."

15. INDIANA.

An Indiana statute provides as follows: "All conveyances and devises of lands, or of any interest therein, made to two or more persons, except as provided in the next following section, shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall hold the same in joint tenancy and to the survivor of them, or it shall manifestly appear, from the tenor of the instrument, that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy." (Burns Ann. Stats. 1908, § 3953; R. S. 1881, § 2922; R. S. 1843, p. 417, sec. 18.) And the next section is as follows: "The preceding section shall not apply to mortgages, nor to conveyances in trust, nor when made to husband and wife; and every estate vested in executors or trustees, as such, shall be held by them in joint tenancy."

The law of Indiana looks with disfavor on joint tenancies and aims to prevent their creation. This has been the attitude toward joint tenancies at least since 1843. Thornburg v. Wiggins, 135 Ind. 178, 34 N. E. 999, 41 Am. St. Rep. 422, 22 L.R.A. 42; Taylor v. Stephens, 165 Ind. 200, 74 N. E. 980.

Under the foregoing statute a conveyance to two or more creates a tenancy in common unless it is expressed in the instrument, or it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that the intention was to create a joint tenancy. Nicholson v. Caress, 45 Ind. 479; McMillan v. Hadley, 78 Ind. 590; Fountain County Coal, etc. Co. v. Beckleheimer, 102 Ind. 76, 1 N. E. 202, 52 Am. Rep. 645; Fowler v. Duhme, 143 Ind. 248, 42 N. E. 623; Stevens v. Reynolds, 143 Ind. 467, 41 N. E. 931, 52 Am. St. Rep. 422.

By the expression of the statute "from the tenor of the instrument" is meant the wording of the instrument. The circumstances surrounding the grantor and attendant on the execution of the instrument cannot be looked to. Nicholson v. Caress, 45 Ind. 479, wherein the court said: "It should be observed that there are two clauses to the latter portion of section 18. [R. S. 1843.] In the first clause, the intention is to be expressed in the instrument, while in the other the intention is to be gathered from the tenor of the instrument. By the word 'tenor' is meant the exact words of the instrument. We think the true construction of the section is, that all conveyances and devises of land or of any interest therein, to two or more persons, with the exception stated, shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall hold the same in joint tenancy, or it shall appear from what is expressed in the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy. The purpose to create a joint tenancy must appear from the instrument in one or the other of the modes above indicated. We cannot look to the circumstances surrounding the grantor and attendant upon the execution of the instrument, to ascertain his intention. The intention must appear from an express declaration in the instrument that the grantees or devisees shall hold as joint tenants, or from the words used in the instrument. In the deed under examination, it is not expressed that the grantees shall hold the land as joint tenants, nor does such intention manifestly appear from the language employed. We think the grantees held the land as tenants in common, and that upon the death of Peter his estate for life terminated, and the estate in fee descended to and vested in the heirs at law of the grantor, Thomas Nicholson."

If there are both words which show an intention to create a joint tenancy and words which show an intention to create a tenancy in common, the estate will be a tenancy in common, for in such case it does not "manifestly appear" as the statute requires that a joint tenancy is intended. Taylor v. Stephens, 165 Ind. 200, 74 N. E. 980, reversing 74 N. E. 12, wherein it appeared that there was a devise to the wife of the testator for life, remainder to his children to be owned "equally and jointly . . . or in case of the decease of any of said children, his or her share to descend to the heirs of their bodies, if any, and if not, to those surviving." It was held that, while "jointly" and the alternative provision for survivorship looked in the direction of a joint tenancy, those expressions were outweighed by the word "equally" and the provision "to descend to the heirs of their bodies," which looked toward tenancy in common. The court said therein: "It does not, however, admit of question that tenants in common have a unity of possession . . . although not of title, and therefore a court, in considering the word 'jointly,' is not necessarily put to the dernier resort of rejecting it, or of holding that a joint tenancy has thereby been created. . . . But granting that the word, without restrictive language, is sufficient, notwithstanding the statute, to create a joint tenancy, we cannot consent that it be given controlling force in cases where it is found associated with other words or provisions which tend to rebut what is perhaps its prima facie meaning. The word 'equally,' at least if it is not found in company with some more controlling word, has always been regarded as implying a tenancy in common . . . and, this being true, we are of opinion that the use of that word is a circumstance to be considered in determining the intent of the testator. It is certain, in view of the statute, that the word 'jointly' will not bear any imposed weight. There remains the further fact that the provision in regard to the share of a deceased child going to the heirs of his body tends to show that a tenancy in common was intended, since, as a joint tenant is, as to his companion, while the tenancy exists, seized of the whole, the recognition of a several interest in one tenant, as where his interest is referred to as a share, tends to show that a joint tenancy was not intended. . . . We are of opinion, in view of the statute, that the will in question did not create a joint tenancy in the remaindermen."

A deed to two or more "jointly" with no further words of qualification makes it "manifestly appear," within the meaning of the statute, that a joint tenancy was intended, and creates a joint tenancy. Case v. Owen, 139 Ind. 22, 38 N. E. 395, 47 Am. St. Rep. 253, in which case the court said: "Our statute, section 3341, Revision of 1894, provides that all conveyances and devises of land, or of any interest therein, made to two or more persons shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall hold the same in joint tenancy and to the survivor of them, or it shall manifestly appear, from the tenor of the instrument, that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy. This statute completely reverses the ancient common-law rule, for joint tenancy was a favorite of the ancient common law, and no special words or limitations were necessary to call it into existence, but, on the other hand, words or circumstances of negation were indispensable to avoid it. Freeman Cotenancy and Partition, section 18. Under this statute, however, it must be created by express words or limitations. The question for our decision, therefore, is, does the use of the word 'jointly' in this deed have the effect of vesting in Lydia Reese and John Reese an estate in joint tenancy? It is a familiar rule that in construing a deed, as in construing any other written instrument, it is to be considered as a whole, and that effect is to be given to each and every clause and word found in it if that is possible. As tenants in common are two or more persons who hold possession of any subject of property by several and distinct titles the word 'jointly' can find no place in describing an estate to be held by them. To hold that this deed created in the grantees a tenancy in common, we would be compelled to strike out and wholly reject the word 'jointly.' This we are not at liberty to do. Under the well known rules of construction we are required to give it effect; and when that is done we are constrained to hold that this deed vested in Lydia Reese and John Reese an estate in joint tenancy."

A deed by a court commissioner to A and B, on petition of the administrator of an intestate estate, to enable them to procure funds to pay the debts of the estate, created a tenancy in common under the Indiana statute. Stevens v. Reynolds, 143 Ind. 467, 41 N. E. 931, 52 Am. St. Rep. 422.

Survivorship is abolished in Indiana as an incident to joint tenancy in personal property, unless expressly stipulated for in the instrument, by the statute providing as follows: "The survivor of persons holding personal property in joint tenancy shall have the same rights only as the survivor of tenants in common, unless otherwise expressed in the instrument." (Burns Ann. Stats. 1908, § 9726; R. S. 1881, § 6060.) Under that statute, where there is a bequest of personal property to two or more, with no expression of an intention that the survivor shall take the whole, there is no survivorship in the cotenancy created, which is, therefore, practically a tenancy in common. Johnson v. Johnson, 128 Ind. 93, 27 N. E. 340; Thieme v. Union Trust Co. 32 Ind. App. 522, 70 N. E. 276. In Johnson v. Johnson, supra, the court said: "Under the rules of the common law it was important to know whether a devise or bequest to two or more persons created a joint estate or an estate in common, for if the estate was joint, the survivor took the whole; but if the estate was one in common, the whole did not go to the survivor. And the decided weight of authority is, that a devise to two or more persons simply makes the devisees joint tenants, and this is true whether the devise be made to a trustee, or otherwise. 3 Jarman Wills, p. 4, and authorities cited. The law of Joint Tenancy, however, is now of little importance in the United States, as it has been abrogated by statute in nearly all states in the Union. . . . Our statute upon the subject now under consideration, section 6060, R. S. 1881, is as follows: 'The survivor of persons holding personal property in joint tenancy shall have the same rights only as the survivor of tenants in common, unless otherwise expressed in the instrument.' Under this statute, property held by two or more persons as joint tenants does not go to the survivor, unless it is so expressly stipulated in the instrument creating the estate. As there is no provision in the will now under investigation which indicates an intention on the part of the testator that the survivor should take the whole estate on the death of one of his granddaughters, we are of the opinion that Ella Dearmond did not take the interest of her sister, upon her death, as the survivor."

The Iowa statute regarding cotenancies is as follows: "Conveyances to two or more in their own right create a tenancy in common, unless a contrary intent is expressed. (Code of 1897, section 2923 [C. '73, § 1939; R. § 2214; C. '51, § 1206].)

Joint tenancy, with its characteristic common-law incident of survivorship, exists in Iowa. Wood v. Logue, 167 Ia. 436, 149 N. W. 613. But it is not favored by the law of that state. Hoffman v. Stigers, 28 Ia. 302, wherein the court said: "It is true that at one time the common law favored, by reason of the right of survivorship, title by joint tenancy. For it thus, as was supposed, tended to combine or unite the feudal services, consolidate tenures and strengthen the feudal connection. And this was its policy. Of course, the reason of this policy would cease with the abolition of tenures; and neither in England nor in this country are these estates now favored. The title is, hence, said to be greatly reduced in extent, and the incident of survivorship still more extensively destroyed. . . . And, therefore, the rule in this country is, that all estates vested in two or more persons are to be deemed tenancies in common, unless a different tenure is clearly expressed or implied in the instrument creating the estate. In most of the states this rule is declared by statute. Or, if not to the full extent stated, at least many and great innovations have been made upon the estate as it stood at common law; very many of them abolishing the jus accrescendi, or right of survivorship. And hence in this state it is declared that conveyances to two or more in their own right create a tenancy in common, unless a contrary intent is expressed. Rev. § 2214. With us, therefore, when the estate is held by two or more, not as trustees, but in their own right, nothing being expressed to the contrary, the tenancy would be in common. And thus most plainly and authoritatively is the estate of joint tenancy disfavored by our law. There is no reason, no necessity, for such an estate, except under the most peculiar circumstances. In the language of the old Massachusetts statute (1785, ch. 62), tenancies in common are 'more beneficial to the commonwealth and consonant with the genius of republics.' And as now we in most of the states condemn entailments, or perpetuities, so we do and should joint tenancies, or at least their common-law incident—the right of survivorship."

By the effect of the foregoing statute the common-law rule that an estate to two or more was a joint tenancy unless there were an express intention to create a tenancy in common, has been exactly reversed in Iowa, and an estate to two or more in their own right will be deemed a tenancy in common unless a contrary intent is expressed. Gilmore v. Jenkins, 129 Ia. 686, 6 Ann. Cas. 1008, 106 N. W. 193.

If from the words of a deed the manifest intent to create a joint tenancy appears, effect will be given to that intent in spite of the fact that the deed was inartificially drawn and the words were inapt in a strict legal sense. Wood v. Logue reported in full, post, this volume at page 116, wherein the court construed a deed in which the grantor conveyed a one-third interest in certain premises to each of his two sisters, providing that he and the two sisters should jointly occupy the premises so long as they all remained unmarried, the deed containing further a clause providing for survivorship in the following words: "In case of the death of the grantor, the grantees are to inherit the undivided one-third interest of the grantor, and in case of one of the grantees dying first, the grantor and the surviving grantee are to inherit that portion of the property that is owned by the grantor and grantee that are deceased. It is understood between the grantor and grantees herein that the one dying last is to be the absolute owner of the property herein described, and he or she may dispose of the entire property by will or in any other way that he or she may desire."

Although a city ordinance providing for the sale of cemetery lots provided also that lots so sold should be indivisible, a conveyance of such a lot to two grantees, no expression of intent to create a joint tenancy being made, was held to have created a tenancy in common, not a joint tenancy. Anderson v. Acheson, 132 Ia. 744, 110 N. W. 335, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 217, wherein it was said: "Nor do we think appellant's contention that Joshua and Mike Whaley acquired the lot as joint tenants, and that, therefore, upon Joshua's death his interest passed to Mike as survivor, is sound. Section 2923 provides that 'conveyances to two or more in their own right create a tenancy in common, unless the contrary intent is expressed.' As said, the interest of Joshua was something more than an ordinary license. The right to the use of the ground as a burial place passed to his heirs, and the conveyance to him and Mike Whaley was within the rule of this statute. See Bolton v. Oberne, 79 Ia. 278. True, the ordinance of the city declared that the lot should be indivisible, but this, like other provisions, was enacted for the regulation and control of the lots, and not to define the nature of the interests which might be acquired therein."

17. KANSAS.

A statute of Kansas, enacted in 1891, provides as follows: "If partition be not made between joint tenants or joint owners of estates in entirety, whether they be such as might have been compelled to make partition or not, or whatever kind the estate of thing holden or possessed be, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivors, but shall descend or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts or charges and be considered to every other intent and purpose as if such joint tenants or tenants of estate in entirety had been or were tenants in common; but nothing in this act shall be taken to affect any trust estate." (General Statutes, § 2552.)

The foregoing act abolished joint tenancy. It had, however, only a prospective effect, and had no effect to abolish estates in joint tenancy which had vested prior to its enactment. Best v. Tatum, 78 Kan. 215, 96 Pac. 140, 130 Am. St. Rep. 365. And its effect was to abolish only joint tenancies created by law. It does not prevent the creation of a right of survivorship in a cotenancy by a proper express contract. See the reported case.

Since the Act of 1891 expressly excepts trust estates, joint tenancy with survivorship still exists in trust estates. Boyer v. Sims, 61 Kan. 593, 60 Pac. 309, wherein the court said: "It was also objected that Sims, the surviving trustee, could not maintain the action in his own name. This objection is likewise untenable. The conveyance was made to the grantees in terms of joint tenancy, and upon the death of Kellam, Sims, the survivor, became invested with the whole of the title. (Baker v. Steward, 40 Kan. 442, 19 Pac. 904, 2 L.R.A. 434; Simons v. McLain, 51 Kan. 153, 32 Pac. 919; Noble v. Teeple, 58 Kan. 398, 49 Pac. 598.) Although the trust conveyance was made in 1896, after the enactment of chapter 203, Laws of 1891 (Gen. Stat. 1897, ch. 109, § 31; Gen. Stat. 1899, § 2472), which abrogated the rule of survivorship in joint tenancy, yet the final clause of that act expressly excepts trust estates from its operation. The law of survivorship in joint tenancy applies in case of trust estates as well as those of other character."

Joint tenancies existed in Kansas before the enactment of the Act of 1891. Simons v. McLain, 51 Kan. 153, 32 Pac. 919; Noble v. Teeple, 58 Kan. 398, 49 Pac. 598. See also Wilson v. Johnson, 4 Kan. 747, 46 Pac. 833. In Simons v. McLain, supra, the court said: "The grand incident of joint tenancy is survivorship, by which the entire tenancy, on the decease of any joint tenant, remains to the survivors, and at length to the last survivor. . . . By the policy of the American Law 'joint tenancy, if not a subject of aversion, is rarely a matter of preference.' (Freeman, Coten. 2d ed. § 35.) In Connecticut the judiciary, at an early day, entirely ignored what they styled 'the odious and unjust doctrine of survivorship.' . . . In Ohio the supreme court held that joint tenancy did not exist, on account of the statute in that state of partition and distribution. . . . But in most of the states the rule of the common law concerning estates in joint tenancy continued until abolished by statute. . . . In this state the legislature, on March 10, 1891, passed an act 'to abolish survivorship in joint tenancy.' (Laws of 1891, ch. 203, p. 349.) A majority of this court, in Baker v. Steward, 40 Kan. 442, and Shinn v. Shinn, 42 Kan. 1, recognized 'estates in entirety,' where the deed is made to the husband and wife, and ruled that in such a case the survivor of the two, at the death of the other, was entitled to the entire estate. This, of course, was a full adoption of the rule of 'estates in entirety,' as recognized by the common law. The writer of this dissented in that case. But following the law thus declared by the majority of the court, and in view of the recognition of joint tenancy by the statutes of the state, and that 'survivorship in joint tenancy' was not expressly abolished by statute until 1891, long after the execution of the deed of the 17th of May, 1872, and long after the death of E. G. Tewksbury, on the 22d of March, 1877, we must hold that estates by joint tenancy existed in Kansas prior to March 10, 1891." In Noble v. Teeple, 58 Kan. 398, 49 Pac. 598, it was said: "To our minds, the will created a joint tenancy in the devisees, and, therefore, upon the death of the mother her interest in the land became vested in her children. The distinguishing feature of joint tenancy is survivorship—the casting of descent upon co-owners, and not upon heirs. Such species of tenancy existed in Kansas until abolished by the statute."

Joint tenancies were not favored in the law even before the passage of the statute but they could be created by words which showed such an intent. Noble v. Teeple, 58 Kan. 398, 49 Pac. 598.

18. KENTUCKY.

As early as 1796 the following statute was enacted in Kentucky: "Joint tenants may be compelled to make partition; and when a joint tenant dies, his part of the joint estate, real or personal, shall descend to his heirs, or pass by devise, or go to his personal representative, subject to debts, curtesy, dower or distribution. (Kentucky Statutes, § 2348.)

By that statute the common-law right of survivorship in joint tenancy has been said to have been abolished. Louisville v. Colburne, 108 Ky. 420, 56 S. W. 681, 22 L. Rep. 64; McCallister v. Folden, 110 Ky. 732, 62 S. W. 538. In the case first cited the court said: "In order to constitute an estate in joint tenancy, the tenants thereof must have one and the same interest, arising by the same conveyance, commencing at the same time, and held by one and the same undivided possession. The chief peculiarity of this estate is the right of survivorship, by which, upon the death of one joint tenant, the entire tenancy remains to the surviving cotenants, not to the heirs or other representatives of the deceased, the last survivor taking the whole estate (see 2 Bl. Com. p. 180); and the common law favored title by joint tenancy by reason of this very right of survivorship, but the policy of the law in this state is against survivorship, and as early as 1796 abolished it by statute, which still survives, in section 2348, Kentucky Statutes."

The Act of 1796, however, has been held to have had no retroactive effect. It did not destroy the jus accrescendi in joint tenancies which vested prior to its enactment. Barclay v. Hendrick, 3 Dana 378; Overton v. Lacy, 6 T. B. Mon. 13, 17 Am. Dec. 111. In Overton v. Lacy, supra, it was said by the court: "If there had been no agreement between Clough and Waller Overton to divide and make partition of the land, we should have no hesitation in saying that Waller Overton ought not to be compelled to surrender the title which he derived by the grant from the commonwealth to any part of the land. Having obtained the title as he did, at a time when the right of survivorship was an incident to estates held in joint tenancy, he must occupy as favorable ground as he would have done, had the grant issued in the lifetime of both him and Clough Overton, and the title which he now holds had afterwards come to him as the survivor, and although the jus accrescendi has never been the favorite of courts of equity, no case is recollected where those courts have assumed the power to dispense with the law and without any agreement between the joint tenants in their lifetime to sever the estate, to compel the survivor to surrender any part of the title to the representatives of the deceased tenant."

In spite of the Statute of 1796, tenants in common may, by deed or contract inter partes, convert their holding into a cotenancy with the right of survivorship, but, by so doing, they cannot so create a technical joint tenancy as to deprive themselves of the right of partition. Truesdell v. White, 13 Bush 616, wherein it appeared that several tenants in common made a deed inter partes specifically providing that they should hold as joint tenants, that there should be survivorship, and that the premises should not "be held subject to any division or distribution." The court said: "The several tenants in common, who held and owned the lands in controversy in this action, could not convert their holding into a technical joint tenancy, and the deed inter partes of the 3d of July, 1840, was ineffectual so far as it attempted to contravene the express provisions of the Act of 1796. But as it rested on a valid and sufficient consideration, it will be upheld and enforced according to the manifest intention of the parties, so far as this can be done without subverting or disregarding the objects intended to be accomplished by the statute. . . . Notwithstanding these covenants, and further limitations set out in the preamble of the deed, to the effect that the parties should hold as joint tenants and not as tenants in common, and should have no power or right to enjoy or hold the property or its profits or issues otherwise than as joint tenants, and that neither of them should have the right or power to sell or dispose of his or her interest, they did hold such estates, as they reserved to themselves, as tenants in common, with the right to have partition and to sell and convey at will. But the material question in this cause is as to the character of estate each of the parties reserved. It is evident that each retained an absolute life estate, and that upon the death of each, his or her interest was to pass to the survivors jointly, and that the last survivor was to take an absolute estate in the whole property, unless some one or more of the life tenants should leave a child or children at the time of his or her death, in which event the entire remainder in fee was to vest in such child or children."

No exception of trust estates is to be found in the statute and it abolishes survivorship in joint trust estates as in all other joint tenancies. Sanders v. Morrison, 7 T. B. Mon. 54, 18 Am. Dec. 161, wherein the court said: "Knowing the inconvenience of spreading a naked trust of this kind into so many hands, by a descent or devise, we have resorted to the act of assembly, 2 Dig. K. L. 686, to discover whether we could not make a trust of this nature an exception to the general rule of destroying survivorship between joint tenants; but in this resort we have been disappointed, and that act is express and decisive in all cases, even in joint trust estates, and is conclusive against the appellee, and precludes his escape. Survivorship is there taken away between all joint tenants, 'whether they be such as might have been compelled to make partition or not, or of whatever kind the estate or things holden may be.' It therefore expressly includes unlimited trusts as this, and leaves the title to pass to the representatives of the one dying, to be held in common with the survivor."

It seems that the Act of 1796 did not abolish survivorship in choses in action; for it has been held that an insurance policy made payable to the wife and children of the insured as beneficiaries, inures to the benefit of the last survivor of the children if the wife and all the other children are dead without issue. Robinson v. Duvall, 79 Ky. 83, 42 Am. Rep. 208.

Joint tenancies as at common law existed prior to the destruction of the jus accrescendi by statute, and although courts of equity gave effect to slight circumstances to show that a tenancy in common was intended instead, they would hold a cotenancy to be a joint tenancy, in the absence of such circumstances. Barclay v. Hendrick, 3 Dana 378.

It has been held that an estate devised to two or more persons "to be equally divided" created a tenancy in common rather than a joint tenancy, before the enactment of the Act of 1796. Briscoe v. McGee, 2 J. J. Marsh. 370. And the same has been held as to a devise to several "and their heirs forever, according to quantity and quality, each taking possession of his part when he comes of age," although there was an added stipulation that if one or more of them should die before he or they came of age, then he devised "his or their part to be equally divided among the survivors." Doe v. Botts, 4 Bibb 420.

19. MAINE.

The Maine Act of 1821 (now R. S. c. 75, § 10) provides: "Conveyances not in mortgage, and devises of land to two or more persons, create estates in common, unless otherwise expressed. Estates vested in survivors upon the principle of joint tenancy shall be so held."

Estates in joint tenancy are not favored in the law of Maine, and the disfavor in which they are held is a very old tendency in New England. Stetson v. Eastman, 84 Me. 366, 24 Atl. 868; Staples v. Berry, 110 Me. 32, 36, 85 Atl. 303. In the case first cited, the court said: "Although it may be that the English courts would regard a clause like this as creating a legacy in joint tenancy, and thus giving the whole of the residue to the surviving tenant, we cannot believe that such would be the construction in many of the states of this country, and we are convinced that such should not be the construction in our own state. We think the presumption here is exactly the reverse of that recognized by the English courts. Whilst in that country a devise or bequest to two or more persons implies a joint tenancy unless the contrary appears, here it implies a tenancy in common unless a different intention is indicated by the will and the attending circumstances. Our institutions and policies are averse to the doctrine of survivorship as applied to tenants holding in their own right, although there may be meritorious exceptions. We have as a people inherited a feeling of opposition to the principle from early legislative manifestations against it. As early as in 1643, the general court of the Plymouth Colony expressed its disfavor of the principle by an act providing as follows: 'That where lands or tenements fall in joint partnership either by gift, grant or purchase or otherwise, that if any of the partners do die before the division thereof shall be made, that the heirs and assigns of such as shall so decease shall not be deprived of the right, title and interest into such said lands and tenements but shall have his or their proportion as duly and equally as any of the survivors or their heirs or assigns, any act, ordinance, custom or provision made to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding, as fully and amply as if division thereof had been formally made.' Plymouth Colony Laws, ed. of 1836, p. 75. By force of the sixth clause of the sixth section of the constitution of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, this enactment continued to be the law of the commonwealth until its scope was enlarged by an act, passed on March 7, 1786, which provided that all grants and devises of real estate to a plurality of persons should be construed as creating tenancies in common, unless a contrary intention be indicated by the terms of the devise or grant. Our own statute is to the same effect, first enacted in 1821, now continued in R. S. c. 73, § 7, and running as follows: 'Conveyances not in mortgage, and devises of land to two or more persons, create estates in common (and not joint estates), unless otherwise expressed. Estates vested in survivors on the principle of joint tenancy shall be so held.'"

In the absence of express words in a will or deed showing an intention to create an estate in joint tenancy, a grant to two or more will create a tenancy in common under the statute. Spencer v. Chick, 76 Me. 347, wherein it was said: "The will of Timothy Wentworth did not create joint estates in the devisees; it created estates in common. 'Conveyances not in mortgage, and devises of land to two or more persons, create estates in common, unless otherwise expressed.' R. S. c. 73, § 7. It is not otherwise expressed in the will of Timothy Wentworth. There is no word or phrase in it which can by any possibility be construed as expressing an intention that devisees should take as joint tenants. Consequently, they take as tenants in common; and upon the death of one of these tenants in common, his estate passes on to his successor."

By virtue of that statute, joint tenancies can only be created by unequivocal and compelling language. Staples v. Berry, 110 Me. 32, 85 Atl. 303.

The statute expressly negatives an intention to apply to conveyances in mortgage and it has been held that two mortgagees of land conveyed to them in mortgage, as security for a debt due them, hold such land as joint tenants, with the right of survivorship. Kinsley v. Abbott, 19 Me. 430.

It will be seen that the terms of the Act of 1821 include only cotenancies in land, but it has been held that the seeming exclusion therein of other kind of property was only because the legislature did not conceive that joint tenancies with survivorship ever existed in personalty, and that the act therefore applies to all kinds of property. Stetson v. Eastman, 84 Me. 366, 24 Atl. 868, wherein a residuary bequest to B. Bachelder and H. Bachelder, simply, was held to create a tenancy in common, and not a joint tenancy in the personalty bequeathed. The court said: "There would be no question in the present case, on this point, if the gifts were of real estate and not of personal property; but the argument for the person claiming as survivor is, that the statute was designed to include realty within its operation and exclude all other property. It seems incredible to us that any such distinction could have been contemplated. There is more reason for rejecting the offensive doctrine in its application to chattels or moneyed securities than in its application to landed estates. And great incongruity and inconvenience must arise if applied to the one class of property and not to the other. The explanation of the apparent omission to embrace all kinds of property within the legislative interdiction is that the lawmakers did not understand that the principle ever applied to any property other than real estate. Nor were they, in our judgment, mistaken in that supposition. The principle of survivorship was not extended to tenancies in chattels by the English courts until after the Massachusetts Act of 1786, an act as binding on us as upon the courts in that commonwealth until we virtually adopted its provisions by an act of our own passed in 1821. Our ancestors little dreamed that any vitality was left in the principle after the colonial law of 1643. The acts of 1643 and 1786 were intended more as declarations of principle, or declarations against a principle, than as undertaking to repeal any acknowledged and binding law. The English cases give no reason for maintaining the doctrine of joint tenancy in chattels, excepting that of the analogy which exists between devises and bequests, and the very reason given for the adoption of the doctrine in that country forbids its adoption here. It exists there because there it is the law as applicable to real estate. It does not exist here because here it is not the law as applicable to real estate. It gained an ascendancy in the English courts in about the beginning of the present century, having before that time been repeatedly doubted or denied. It never had growth or life in most of the American courts."

20. MARYLAND.

The Code of Maryland (Art. 50, sec. 13, which was the Act of 1822) provides: "No deed, devise or other instrument of writing shall be construed to create an estate in joint tenancy, unless in such deed, devise or other instrument of writing it is expressly provided that the property thereby conveyed is to be held in joint tenancy." That statute distinctly recognizes both tenancy in common and joint tenancy as existing estates. Gilpin v. Hollingsworth, 3 Md. 190, 56 Am. Dec. 737.

The law of Maryland views joint tenancies with disfavor, and will give the widest and most liberal construction to testamentary instruments in order to defeat them. Chew v. Chew, 1 Md. 163, 171. See also Mayburry v. Brien, 15 Pet. 37, 10 U. S. (L. ed.) 653. In spite of the Act of 1822, however, a right of survivorship may be created, expressly, as by the use of the word "survivor." Craft v. Wilcox, 4 Gill 506. But a cotenancy will be held to be a tenancy in common in the absence of express words providing that it shall be a joint tenancy. Purdy v. Purdy, 3 Md. Ch. 547.

Survivorship in the case of joint trustees was not affected at all by the Act of 1822, for such survivorship was not one of the evils which that statute intended to remedy. Gray v. Lynch, 8 Gill 403, wherein the court said: "But, it is said, conceding the principle of survivorship in relation to such cases, apart from all legislation upon the subject, yet that the principles of joint tenancy are wholly abrogated by the Act of 1822, ch. 162. All that need be said in answer thereto is, that this act of assembly was not intended to apply to devises or grants made to trustees for the benefit of third persons. Survivorship in such cases formed no part of the evil designed to be remedied, and not being within the intent or spirit of the act, is not embraced by it."

An admission in pleading that two such persons jointly purchased a slave has been held to be no evidence that they were joint tenants of the slave, the presumption being that they were tenants in common thereof. Gibbons v. Riley, 7 Gill 82.

The rights of cocontractors in a contract for the purchase of an option are within the provisions of the statute and are construed to be the rights of tenants in common, not joint tenants and therefore severable. Clark v. Harmer, 9 App. Cas. (D. C.) 1, wherein the court had before it a contract executed in the District of Columbia, but for the purchase of an option on real estate in Maryland. The court said: "The contract, although executed in the District of Columbia, is a contract for the purchase and sale of an interest in real estate in the state of Maryland, and must be construed with reference to the laws of that state regarding real estate. The Code of Maryland (Art. 50, sec. 13) provides that 'no deed, devise or other instrument of writing shall be construed to create an estate in joint tenancy unless in such deed, devise, or other instrument of writing it is expressly provided that the property thereby conveyed is to be held in joint tenancy.' Whatever interest, therefore, Harmer and Lippman acquired under the contract, they acquired as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and the plaintiff must be presumed to have contracted with them as tenants in common, and with each one for his own undivided half of the property. Consequently, it was entirely competent for Harmer and Lippman to act separately and severally with regard to their respective interests."

Before the enactment of the Act of 1882 it was held that a residuary legacy "to be equally divided between my brother J. S. and my brother G. S.'s children" created a tenancy in common, and made J. S. a tenant in common with an equal share with the children of G. S. Maddox v. State, 4 Har. & J. 539. And it was also held that a devise to several children "to be divided equally, share and share alike," created a tenancy in common and not a joint tenancy. Moody v. Elliott, 1 Md. Ch. 290, wherein it was said by the court: "And in opposition to the right of the grandchildren, it was also insisted in the argument that the children of the testator, whether the benefit of the devise was to be confined to the survivors of the widow or not, took as joint tenants, and that consequently, the children of the deceased brothers must be excluded, upon the doctrine of survivorship—the will having been executed prior to the Act of 1822, ch. 162, which abolishes thereafter, estates in joint tenancy, except where the deed, devise, or instrument of writing, expressly declares that the property shall be so held. It appears to me, however, to be very clear upon authority, that this devise does not create an estate in joint tenancy. Perhaps, in the present disposition of the courts in regard to these estates, it would not do so even in a deed and in a court of law; but, unquestionably, in a court of equity, and acting upon a will, it cannot have that effect. 4 Kent 361. The words of the devise are, 'to be divided equally, share and share alike,' which words, even in a deed, have been construed to create a tenancy in common. 1 Thos. Coke 773 note 42. And the cases referred to in the same note show that the words, 'share and share alike,' or 'between,' or any other words indicating an intention that the devisees shall take several and distinct shares, will make them tenants in common."

In 1793 it was held that a devise of several tracks of land to two persons, to be equally divided between them as to quantity, created a tenancy in common. Partridge v. Colegate, 3 Har. & McH. 339.

But in 1807 it was decided that a grant "unto John and Eliza Towers, to have and to hold the premises or dwelling house during the lives of the said John and Eliza Towers" created a joint tenancy with survivorship. Hannan v. Towers, 3 Har. & J. 147, 5 Am. Dec. 427, wherein it was said by Chase, C. J.: "The grant being unto John and Eliza Towers, to have and to hold the premises or dwelling house during the lives of the said John and Eliza Towers, I am of opinion that a joint estate vested in John and Eliza Towers during their lives, and the quality of survivorship being incident to a joint estate, or joint tenancy, without any technical or other words being necessary to confer that quality. I am also of opinion that the whole devolved on the survivor during her life, according to the case as stated by the honorable chancellor."

a. In General.

The Massachusetts Act of 1785 (now R. L. chap. 134, sec. 6) provides as follows: "A conveyance or devise of land to two or more persons or to husband and wife, except a mortgage or a devise or conveyance in trust, shall create an estate in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it is expressed in such conveyance or devise that the grantees or devisees shall take jointly, or as joint tenants, or in joint tenancy, or to them and the survivor of them, or unless it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy."

Joint tenancy and its doctrine of survivorship are not in harmony with the genius of American institutions, and they are not favored by the law of Massachusetts. Burnett v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 556; Park v. Parker, 216 Mass. 405, 103 N. E. 936.

Joint tenancy exists, however, in personal property as well as in real property. Atty.-Gen. v. Clark, 222 Mass. 291, 110 N. E. 299.

The Act of 1785 had a retroactive effect and applied to grants and devises made before its passage, because its effect was beneficial rather than detrimental to the rights of tenants. Annable v. Patch, 3 Pick. 360; Holbrook v. Finney, 4 Mass. 566, 3 Am. Dec. 243; Miller v. Miller, 16 Mass. 59. In Miller v. Miller, supra, the court said: "The statute, in its terms, applies to estates created before as well as after its enactment. The principle is nevertheless correct, that the legislature cannot impair the title to estates, without the consent of the proprietors, unless for public objects, when an adequate consideration shall be provided. But there can be no objection to the operation of any legislative act retrospectively, which shall enlarge or otherwise make more valuable the title to any estate; for the consent of the holder may always be presumed, to such acts." In Annable v. Patch, 3 Pick. 360, the court construed the following words as creating a tenancy in common under the statutes: "I give all the remainder of my estate, both real and personal, to my daughter Sarah Annable, and the children born of her body, including all my wife has the improvement of during her life after her decease." Holding that his devise was affected by the statute though made before its passage, the court said: "But it has been argued, that if Sarah did not take an estate tail, she and her children took as joint tenants. But the St. 1785, c. 62, § 4 (see Rev. Stat. c. 59, § 10) is decisive on this point. It is no valid objection, that the will took effect before the passing of this act. The statute extends to past grants and devises in express terms, and its operation is not to impair any vested right. It serves rather to render the tenure more beneficial. No estate had vested in any survivor previous to the passing of the act, and therefore from and after that time, Sarah and her children held as tenants in common, whatever might have been the construction of the devise before."

A grant or devise to two or more which shows neither from its wording nor from its tenor that it is intended to create a joint tenancy, creates a tenancy in common under the statute. Nash v. Cutler, 16 Pick. 491; Jones v. Crane, 16 Gray 308; Walsh v. Young, 110 Mass. 396.

It is a general rule that a devise or bequest to several persons, expressly providing that the gift is to be divided equally or is to go share and share alike, or showing that there is to be a division, as by specifying the proportions, etc. creates a tenancy in common and not a joint tenancy. Sobier v. Inches, 12 Gray 385; Walker v. Dewing, 8 Pick. 520; Frost v. Courtis, 167 Mass. 251, 45 N. E. 687; Shattuck v. Wall, 174 Mass. 167, 54 N. E. 488; Lymen v. Coolidge, 176 Mass. 7, 56 N. E. 831; Stanwood v. Stanwood, 179 Mass. 223, 226, 60 N. E. 584; Os-good v. Rodgers, 186 Mass. 238, 71 N. E. 306; Loomis v. Gorham, 186 Mass. 444, 71 N. E. 981. See also Holbrook v. Finney, 4 Mass. 566, 3 Am. Dec. 243; Claffin v. Tilton, 141 Mass. 343, 5 N. E. 640 (bequest to A and B "each"). In Holbrook v. Finney, supra, it was said: "It was settled that if an estate be devised to two or more, equally to be divided, they are tenants in common. The same construction is applied to a devise to two or more, share and share alike.

(1) Also the words equally to be divided, in a covenant to stand seized, or in the surrender of a copyhold, or in a deed appointing uses, create a tenancy in common. (2) This construction has been adopted, because the words in equal shares, or equally to be divided, import a division in futuro. The words in this deed are in equal proportion; and it is said that they do not imply a future division, but are applied only to the respective interests in the thing conveyed. On this ground, they must be considered as wholly inoperative; for without them, the grantees would have taken an equal interest in the lands granted. To give them operation, may they not be considered as equivalent to the words in equal purporties or shares, and thus contemplate a future partition?"

Words which will justify the construction of a gift as a joint tenancy under the statute must show that the distinction between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common was in the mind of the donor and that he clearly intended to create a joint estate.

Nash v. Cutler, 16 Pick. 491, wherein the court construed a devise upon the death of the testator's wife "to my children, hereinafter named, to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns." The court said: "To construe a gift as of a joint estate, under this statute, it must appear that the distinction between a joint estate and a tenancy in common was in the mind of the donor, and that he clearly intended to create a joint estate, or that such construction is required in order to carry into effect a declared or manifest intent. The generality of the latter words in the clause is to be restrained by the character of those which precede; it is to be construed by the maxim, noscitur a sociis. Any other construction would in effect repeal the statute. If all words, since the statute, were to be construed as showing a manifest intention to give a joint estate within the meaning of the statute, which would be so construed at common law, the statute would be inoperative. In the will in question, there are no words like those put by way of example in the statute, and no words manifesting a clear intent of the testator to create a joint tenancy, having a distinction between that and a tenancy in common, in his mind, and therefore we are all of opinion, that by force of this statute, this clause in the will gave a vested remainder to the five children as tenants in common."

A conveyance to two or more persons expressed to be in joint tenancy, creates a joint tenancy. Atty.-Gen. v. Clark, reported in full, post, this volume at page 119. And a devise to two or more "and survivor or survivors of them" creates a joint tenancy. Stimpson v. Batterman, 5 Cush. 153. In Atty.-Gen. v. Clark, supra, it appears that two tenants in common of real estate conveyed it to a third person who reconveyed it to them in joint tenancy, and they also had several stocks and bonds issued to them as joint tenants, cash paying half. They were held to be joint tenants of both the realty and the personalty. In Stimpson v. Batterman, 5 Cush. 153, the court said: "But if these children took vested remainders on the death of the testator, as we think they did, then, the question is whether they took as joint tenants or as tenants in common. And we are of opinion that they took as joint tenants. The devise is to the 'children and survivor or survivors of them,' which are apt words to create such an estate; and taking into consideration all the clauses of the will, we cannot doubt that such was the intention of the testator."

But words of severance will outweigh words indicating an intention to create a joint estate. Burghardt v. Turner, 12 Pick. 534; Miller v. Miller, 16 Mass. 59. In Miller v. Miller, supra, the court said: "From the words of the deed in this case, it is not easy to ascertain whether the grantor intended to convey a joint estate or a tenancy in common. The words 'jointly and severally' would seem to import a several interest; so that on the death of either of the grantees, the whole estate should not inure by survivorship to the other; but yet we cannot infer, from these words alone, that a tenancy in common was intended, as they are not inconsistent with a technical joint estate. It cannot, however, be doubted that this deed would, by the operation of the statute of 1785, create a tenancy in common; for it contains none of the expressions, which are to constitute exceptions. For although the words jointly and severally are strangely introduced, they do not import an intention to create a joint, any more than a separate, estate in moieties. The statute, therefore, is decisive, unless for the objection, that it cannot have a retrospective operation, so as to change an estate, which was vested by the deed several years before the statute passed." In Burghardt v. Turner, 12 Pick. 534, the court construed a deed to two persons "jointly and equally to be divided between them" to create a tenancy in common, under the Act of 1785, if not at common law. The court said: "Then the question is, whether this deed created an estate in joint tenancy or a tenancy in common in Peter and Jacob. Viewing it as a question at common law, there does not appear to be any considerable difficulty in it; but it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon that point, because the court are of opinion, that by force of the statute these grantees became tenants in common. St. 1785, c. 62, § 4. This statute went into operation and took effect in June, 1786, and Peter Burghardt died in June, 1787, leaving Jacob surviving him."

A conveyance to a man and woman, in contemplation and in consideration of their impending marriage, no words appearing in the conveyance to indicate a joint tenancy or survivorship, creates a tenancy in common under the statute, and this estate is not affected by the subsequent marriage of the grantees. Walsh v. Young, 110 Mass. 396, wherein the court said: "As the demandant was not married at the time of the conveyance to her and James T. Walsh, she took one undivided half of the estate as tenant in common with him, unless 'it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy.' Gen. Sta. c. 89, §§ 13, 14. There are no words of limitation which indicate joint tenancy or survivorship. The intent can be inferred only from the recital of the consideration. Nothing appears from that except the contemplation of subsequent marriage. The operation of the deed was not to depend upon the consummation of that purpose. It took effect on delivery; and its effect would not have been changed by a failure of the intended intermarriage. We think it does not manifestly appear from the deed that the grantees were intended to take only as husband and wife; and therefore that an undivided estate in common vested in each. The estate having thus vested, the subsequent intermarriage of the grantees would not change the nature of the respective titles."

A deed to A and B, wife of A, "as tenants by the entirety and not as tenants in common," which could not take effect as creating an entirety because A and B were not actually husband and wife, has been held to show a sufficient intention to create a survivorship to make the estate conveyed a joint tenancy rather than a tenancy in common. Morris v. McCarty, 158 Mass. 11, 32 N. E. 938.

It has been held that several grantees in a deed of trusts, who take in trust for specified purposes, take under the statute of 1785 as tenants in common. Robison v. Codman, 1 Sumn. 121, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 11,970.

b. Exceptions.

The exception of mortgages in the statute does not mean that in all cases of conveyance in mortgage to two or more the estate will be a joint tenancy; it merely serves to leave cases of mortgages open to inquiry on their particular facts, and to be construed as before the enactment of the statute. Gilson v. Gilson, 2 Allen 117.

The rule is that if a mortgage is given to secure separate debts or obligations or duties, it will be a tenancy in common; but, if given to secure a joint debt, it will be construed a joint estate. Burnett v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 556; Blake v. Sanborn, 8 Gray 154, distinguishing Burnett v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 556; Gilson v. Gilson, 2 Allen 117; Appleton v. Boyd, 7 Mass. 131; Goodwin v. Richardson, 11 Mass. 469; Park v. Parker, 216 Mass. 405, 103 N. E. 936. See also Webster v. Vandeventer, 6 Gray 428. In Appleton v. Boyd, supra, the court said: "The objection to the demandant's title is founded on the statute of 1785, c. 62, § 4, which provides that all conveyances to two or more grantees shall be adjudged to convey estates in common, unless it appear from the conveyances that the intent of the parties was, that joint estates should pass. The conveyance before us is a mortgage to two persons in fee, to secure the payment of a debt jointly due to the mortgagees. As, upon the death of either mortgagee, the remedy to recover the debt would survive, we are of opinion that it was the intent of the parties that the mortgage, or collateral security, should comport with that remedy; and, for this purpose, that the mortgaged estates should survive. Upon any other construction, but one moiety of the mortgaged tenements would remain a collateral security for the joint debt, which would be clearly repugnant to the intention of the parties to the mortgage. The objection to the demandant's title to the whole cannot prevail; and judgment must be rendered on the verdict for the demandant, as on a mortgage." In Burnett v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 556, holding that the mortgage before it, being given to two persons to secure their several demands, created in them a tenancy in common, the court said: "If a mortgage be given to secure a joint debt, it shall be so construed as to create a joint estate, notwithstanding the provisions of our statute. As the debt would survive, so the lien upon the estate should also survive, otherwise the security might be inadequate, and the object of the parties defeated. . . . But if a mortgage be given to two or more persons to secure their several debts, the obvious purpose of the parties must be, to give to each, security for his particular debt. The mortgage therefore should, according to the meaning of the parties and pursuant to the provisions of our statute, be construed to create a tenancy in common." In Park v. Parker, 216 Mass. 405, 103 N. E. 936, it was held that where several tenants in common conveyed the premises to a purchaser who gave his note secured by mortgage on the land, the mortgagees were tenants in common, not joint tenants, and that, therefore, there was no survivorship. The court said therein: "In the case at bar the original payees of the note and grantees in the mortgage had been tenants in common of the real estate, and their shares were equal. The presumption is strong that they expected the note to stand in the place of the land they had sold, with like proportional interest in each. It is unlikely that as between themselves they intended that a relation so different and so speculatively uncertain in its nature as joint tenancy should be substituted for the plain and definite equal ownership of tenants in common. There is no evidence tending to show that purpose. In equity it is not to be imposed upon the parties in the absence of anything to indicate that they understood that any such situation was being created. When the note, to which the mortgage was security, has been paid in full, and in a sense stands in place of the land of which the payees were tenants in common, there is no rigid rule of law which requires the principle of joint tenancy to apply to the money. The effect of Appleton v. Boyd, 7 Mass. 131, does not go to this extent."

And the assignment of a joint mortgage to two or more persons as trustees makes them joint tenants thereof. Webster v. Vandeverter, 6 Gray 428.

But the exception of mortgages in the statute applies only to mortgages before foreclosure. After foreclosure the mortgagees become purchasers de novo, and two joint creditors to whom a mortgage is made to secure the joint debt become tenants in common by virtue of the statute of 1785 after foreclosure of the mortgage. Goodwin v. Richardson, 11 Mass. 469, wherein the court said: "The debts for which this land was originally mortgaged to the partners were part of their joint stock; and they were accordingly joint tenants of the mortgaged premises; so that, on the death of one partner, by which the debt survived, the remedy on the mortgage survived also. This was decided in the case of Appleton v. Boyd, cited for the plaintiff, and we are perfectly satisfied with that decision. But it does not necessarily follow that the estate continues joint after a foreclosure of the mortgage, when it ceases to be a security for a debt. The same reason no longer exists. The mortgage is not used nor wanted as a remedy, which must follow the nature of the right. The land is no longer a pledge; but the title is vested absolutely in the mortgagees. Whilst it continues a pledge, it is a mere incident to the debt; and either partner, by releasing the debt, would, in effect, release the mortgage, and destroy their joint title and estate in the land. Although, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, the latter is considered as seized of the land, yet, to most purposes, his estate is merely a chattel interest, following the nature of the debt. As to all the world, except the mortgagee, the mortgagor is considered as the owner of the land, until an actual entry under the mortgage; and his right of redemption, for three years after entry for the condition broken is not a mere equitable claim, but is secured to him by statute. The foreclosure operates as a new purchase by the mortgagees. They acquire thereby an absolute title to the land. It is no longer an incident to the debt; nor is it connected with it, any more than if the partners had received payment of the debt, and had laid out the money in the purchase of the land."

The Act of 1785 applies only to estates arising by will or by deed, having the estates of disseizors as at common; therefore joint disseizors are joint tenants. Putney v. Dresser, 2 Metc. 583; Fowler v. Thayer, 4 Cush. 111 (semble). In Putney v. Dresser, supra, it was said by the court: "The defendant contends that the disseizin in 1818, by Moses Dresser and Aaron Dresser, the grantees in the deed from Moses Putney, was not a joint disseizin, or one which would create a joint tenancy in them, but only an estate as tenants in common. It is true that under St. 1785, c. 62, the title in Moses Dresser and Aaron Dresser, if any passed to them under their deed from Moses Putney, would have been an estate in common, and not in joint tenancy. But no title passed to them under that deed, their grantees having no title and no right to convey. As respects the plaintiffs, they were strictly disseizors, and as much so as if they had entered without receiving any deed. The inquiry then arises as to the effect of a disseizin by two or more persons. Littleton, § 278, says, "if two or three disseize another of any lands or tenements to their own use, then the disseizors are joint tenants." There may be, therefore, a joint tenancy created by disseizin, as well as by a deed or devise. The St. of 1785, c. 62, applies only to cases arising under deeds and wills, leaving the cases of disseizin to be regulated by the common law. It seems to us, therefore, that the disseizin in the present case was a joint disseizin; and being such, it was not competent for the disseizors to qualify it, and limit it to a tenancy in common, to the prejudice of the legal owner of the estate. If the estate of the two disseizors might be qualified, as between themselves and their heirs, and if the effect of their deed from Moses Dresser would have been to estop them from setting up, as against each other, an estate in joint tenancy, yet this should not be allowed to affect the disseizee, or be prejudicial to his rights."

22. MICHIGAN.

The statutes of Michigan regarding cotenancies contain the following provisions: "Estates, in respect to the number and connection of their owners, are divided into estates in severalty, in joint tenancy, and in common; the nature and properties of which, respectively, shall continue to be such as are now established by law, except so far as the same may be modified by the provisions of this chapter." (Howell's Mich. Stats. § 10665; 1st ed. § 5559.) "All grants and devises of lands, made to two or more persons, except as provided in the following section, shall be construed to create estates in common, and not joint tenancy, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy." (Howell's Mich. Stats. § 10666; 1st ed. § 5560.) "The preceding section shall not apply to mortgages, nor to devises or grants made in trust, or made to executors, or to husband and wife." (Howell's Mich. Stats. § 10667; 1st ed. § 5561.)

A conveyance to two or more, simply, in a case not such as is excepted in the foregoing statute, creates a tenancy in common in Michigan. Downing v. Birney, 112 Mich. 474, 70 N. W. 1006, 117 Mich. 675, 76 N. W. 125.

A deed to two or more, expressed to be in joint tenancy or to them as joint tenants, creates a joint tenancy with survivorship, under the foregoing statutory provisions. Norris v. Hall, 124 Mich. 170, 82 N. W. 832; Root v. Snyder, 161 Mich. 200, 126 N. W. 206. In the case last cited it was held that a deed to four persons "as joint tenants, and to their heirs and assigns, and to the survivors or survivor of them, and to the heirs and assigns of the survivors or survivor of them, forever" created a joint tenancy and did not constitute a violation of the rule against perpetuities.

And an express provision for survivorship makes the granted estate a joint tenancy. Midgley v. Walker, 101 Mich. 583, 60 N. W. 296, 45 Am. St. Rep. 431.

Survivorship is an essential attribute of a joint tenancy in Michigan as at common law, and where words are used sufficient under the statute to create a joint tenancy, the intent must clearly appear in the instrument itself in order to avoid the rule of survivorship. Norris v. Hall, 124 Mich. 170, 82 N. W. 832.

The exception of mortgages made by the statute (section 10667) does not prevent the creation of a tenancy in common in a mortgage, but has the effect only of leaving mortgages to be interpreted as they would have been at common law. It follows that a mortgage with covenants which are several, not joint, creates a tenancy in common in the mortgagees. Cooley v. Kinney, 109 Mich. 34, 36, 66 N. W. 674, wherein the court said: "The statute (2 How. Stat. § 5560) providing that grants to two or more persons shall be construed to create estates in common is subject to the exception in the next section, which excludes mortgages. The effect of this legislation is not, however, as we think, to prevent the execution of a mortgage with covenants which are several. The sole effect is to leave the rule as at common law, and a mortgage which was not joint at the common law is no more so since this statute."

But it has been held that a debt to two or more jointly passes to the survivor or survivors of them, on the death of one or more of them. Cote v. Dequindre, Walk. Ch. 64. And where a mortgage, securing one debt, is assigned to several assignees, they take as joint tenants with survivorship. Martin v. McReynolds, 6 Mich. 70.

A Mississippi statute (Code of 1906, § 2770 [§ 2441, Code 1892; § 2301, Code 1871]) provides as follows: "All conveyances or devises of land made to two or more persons, or to a husband and wife, shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy or entirety, unless it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy or entirety with the right of survivorship; but this provision shall not apply to mortgages or devises, or conveyances made in trust." This statute is a substantial re-enactment of art. 18, p. 309, Revised Code of 1857, except that the latter did not contain the references to husband and wife and to entireties.

By the Act of March 4, 1803, re-enacted in 1882, survivorship was abolished as an incident to joint tenancies in land, that statute reading as follows: "If partition be not made between joint tenants, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivors, but shall descend or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts, charges, curtesy, or dower, or transmissible to executors and administrators, and be considered, to every other intent and purpose, in the same manner as if such deceased joint tenants had been tenants in common." Day v. Davis, 64 Miss. 253, 8 So. 203. And that statute has been held to have abolished the jus accrescendi in joint tenancies in personality as well as in realty. Nichols v. Denny, 37 Miss. 59. But it has been held that the Act of 1803 did not prevent the express creation of a right of survivorship even in a tenancy in common. Shanks v. Chambless, 1 Miss. (Walk.) 249. However, it seems that that statute was repealed by art. 18, p. 309, R. C. 1857, to the extent that it allowed joint tenancies with the right of survivorship to be expressly created.

In the absence of words showing an intent to create a joint estate or to create a survivorship, an estate to two or more persons creates, by virtue of the statute (Code of 1906, § 2770), an estate in common. Hawkins v. Hawkins, 72 Miss. 749, 18 So. 479, wherein the court held that a tenancy in common was created by a conveyance in the following terms: "We give to them, our said nieces, Lizzie V. Hawkins, Alice V. Herring and Sallie Cowles Herring, said lot as described, with all appurtenances, emoluments and rents arising from the same during their natural lives, and at their death to the descendants of their bodies in fee, if any they may have, but if they have none to survive them, then, in that event, to the heirs of their brothers and sisters in fee." The court said therein: "The chancellor was of opinion that, but for the statute, the conveyance under review would have given a joint estate for their lives to the nieces of the grantor, with remainder at the death of the survivor to the descendants of the life tenants. In this conclusion we entirely concur. . . . We concur also in the conclusion that it does not sufficiently appear by the deed that the grantor intended to preserve the right of survivorship, to withdraw the conveyance from the operation of the statute."

Under the foregoing section of the Code of 1906 a deed to a mother "and her children" vests the estate in the mother and in a child in esse as tenants in common. Brabham v. Day, 75 Miss. 923, 23 So. 578.

The section of the code governing cotenancies has no application to trust estates, which are in fact expressly excepted, so that an estate conveyed to two or more trustees jointly makes them joint tenants with the jus accrescendi. McAllister v. Plant, 54 Miss. 106, wherein it was said: "It is well settled, that, where an estate is conveyed to trustees jointly, the right of survivorship exists; that, upon the death of one, his interest does not descend to his heirs, but vests in the other; and that this rule is not affected by statutes abolishing joint tenancies and converting them into tenancies in common, unless the language of the statute expressly embraces trust estates. The reason for this is obvious. The evil to be remedied by the conversion of joint tenancies in common was the improper accretion to one party of that which properly belonged to two, and the consequent enrichment of one and impoverishment of the other's estate. But inasmuch as trust property, whether held by one or both, would only be held for the benefit of the cestui que trust, whose estate would be in no manner affected by the death of one of the trustees, the reason of the law ceases, and with it the law itself."

24. MISSOURI.

The Missouri statute is as follows: "Every interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors and trustees and husband and wife, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared, in such grant or devise, to be in joint tenancy." (R. S. 1909, § 2878; R. S. 1899, § 4600.)

The foregoing section of the Revised Statutes has been on the statute books of that state in its present form since 1865 (G. S. 1865, p. 443, sec. 12), and, with the exception of the provision as to husband and wife, since 1835. Lemmons v. Reynolds, 170 Mo. 227, 71 S. W. 135.

Under the Act of 1865, unless a grantor in a deed or a maker of a will expresses his intention to create a joint tenancy by a conveyance or testamentary gift to more than one person other than trustees, executors, or spouses, the estate granted will be a tenancy in common, no matter what his intention may have been. Rodney v. Landan, 104 Mo. 251, 15 S. W. 962; Lemmons v. Reynolds, 170 Mo. 227, 71 S. W. 135. See also Johnston v. Johnston, 173 Mo. 91, 73 S. W. 202, 96 Am. St. Rep. 486, 61 L.R.A. 166. See also Nalle v. Parks, 173 Mo. 616, 73 S. W. 596. In Rodney v. Landan, supra, it was said: "The next question is whether these remaindermen were tenants in common or joint tenants. According to the statute an interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, not executors, trustees or husband and wife, is a tenancy in common, 'unless expressly declared, in such grant or devise, to be in joint tenancy.' R. S. 1865, sec. 12, p. 443. Now, while the testator speaks of this property as their 'joint property' transferable by 'joint' deed, still there is no express declaration that it is to be held by them in joint tenancy. It is quite common to speak of property as joint property when nothing more is meant than ownership of the same property by different persons. The policy of the American law is opposed to survivorship, and that policy is clearly indicated in our statutes. While joint tenancies are not abolished in this state, still to create such a tenancy there must be an express declaration to that effect in the deed or will creating the estate, and that is not done by the will of James I. Reily." In Lemmons v. Reynolds, 170 Mo. 227, 71 S. W. 135, the court said: "But both cases failed to note that while such reasons and rules obtained at common law, no such thing is now possible, but that deeds and wills in such matters are placed by the statute of this state upon exactly the same footing, and the common-law rule in reference to the right of survivorship by a member of a class to the whole property granted or devised to individuals as members of a class is expressly abolished, and that under the statute every grant or devise of real estate to two or more persons—executors, trustees and husband and wife excepted—is declared to create a tenancy in common and not a joint tenancy unless expressly declared in such grant or devise to be a joint tenancy. . . . Grantors or testators who do not wish the statute to apply and to create only a tenancy in common are given the right to so arrange it, but they must expressly declare in the grant or devise that a joint tenancy is intended, or else the courts must construe it to be a tenancy in common. There is no distinction under the statute between a deed and a will in this regard."

Under the statute of 1865 it has been held that a devise to the testator's "daughters Julia and Victoria jointly" created a tenancy in common because it was not expressed to be in joint tenancy. Cohen v. Herbert, 205 Mo. 537, 104 S. W. 84, 120 Am. St. Rep. 772.

The following statutory provisions have been enacted in Montana: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." (Rev. Codes, § 4438.) "Every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right, including husband and wife, is an interest in common, unless acquired by them in partnership, for partnership purposes, or unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest, as provided in § 4438 (1105)." (Rev. Codes, § 4441.) "A devise or legacy given to more than one person vests in them as owners in common." (Rev. Codes, § 4796.)

In Butte, etc. Consol. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co. 25 Mont. 41, 63 Pac. 825, it was held that an early territorial act abolishing survivorship in joint tenancies had no retroactive effect to change the nature of joint tenancies which had already vested. The act referred to was replaced by the Code of Civil Procedure of 1895, which enacted the foregoing sections quoted from the present revision of the code.

26. NEBRASKA.

Joint tenancies are not favored in Nebraska, and a cotenancy is presumed to be a tenancy in common, but there has been no statutory abridgment of the right to create a joint tenancy in that state by an express contract. Sanderson v. Everson, 93 Neb. 606, 141 N. W. 1025, wherein the court said: "Joint tenancies are created by contract, and, if not so created, they do not exist. True, they are not favored, and, if not expressly created by contract, the law presumes the tenancy is in common, and that upon the death of one of the holders of the title his or her interest descends to his or her heirs. But this is not true of joint tenancies. It is true that, in order to create a joint tenancy, the purpose must be clearly expressed, otherwise the tenancy will be held to be in common. But no one will contend that it is not competent for the parties to contract in a deed to two or more persons, whether husband and wife or not, that the conveyance is to the one for life and to the others in remainders in fee. Such is the effect of a conveyance to both as joint tenant with the right of survivorship. It is a clear matter of contract, and the intention of the parties must govern."

27. NEVADA.

The common-law rule as to cotenancies was changed in Nevada by a statute of 1861 which provided as follows: "Every interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, other than executors or trustees, as such, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared in the grant or devise to be a joint tenancy."

Under that act cotenants are presumed to hold as tenants in common in the absence of an express declaration that they are to hold as joint tenants. Smith v. Shrieves, 13 Nev. 303.

28. NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The common law as to cotenancies has been changed in New Hampshire by the following statute: "Every conveyance or devise of real estate made to two or more persons shall be construed to create an estate in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that the estate is to be held by the grantees or devisees as joint tenants, or to them and the survivor of them, or unless other words are used clearly expressing an intention to create a joint tenancy." (Pub. Stats. c. 137, § 14.) The foregoing section is a re-enactment of an Act of 1807.

It has been held that the statute had a retroactive effect, converting into tenancies in common joint tenancies created before its enactment, and that the statute as so construed was not invalid as impairing the obligation of contracts. Miller v. Dennett, 6 N. H. 109, wherein the court said: "In changing joint tenancies, created by deeds then existing, into tenancies in common, it furnished no new rule to govern the decision of any action then pending or of any cause of action. The statute, applied to the deed, in this case, would take away no vested right. Neither John nor William had any vested interest in the moiety of the other. The acquisition of the whole estate by survivorship would have been in either nothing more than a hope or expectation, like the expectation of a child to inherit the estate of a parent. The statute, thus applied, operates upon an existing estate, but not retrospectively within the meaning of the constitution. It can no more be considered a retrospective law than a statute altering the descent of intestate estates. It neither gives, nor takes away, any right or interest. The application of the statute to a case where one joint tenant had actually taken the land by survivorship, at the time the statute was passed, and which is a case excepted from the operation of the statute, would be an instance of the very thing, which the constitution intended to prohibit. Thus applied, it would take away a vested right, make a new rule for the decision of existing cases, and would be in its nature an exercise of judicial power. But it is further said, that this statute, applied to the deed in this case, is a law, impairing the obligations of a contract, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States. We do not perceive this. The statute only changes a joint tenancy into a tenancy in common. The contract, which created the estate, is not altered or impaired. The deed conveyed an estate in joint tenancy, and that estate must now be considered as remaining, until the statute of 1809 changed it into a tenancy in common. Such a change did not impair the obligations of any contract in the deed, but merely made the grantees tenants in common from the time the statute took effect."

29. NEW JERSEY.

In 1812 the following statute was enacted in New Jersey: "No estate after the passing of this act shall, in this state, be considered and adjudged to be an estate in joint tenancy, except it be expressly set forth in the grant or devise creating such estate that it is the intention of the parties to create an estate in joint tenancy and not an estate of tenancy in common, any law, usage or decision heretofore made to the contrary notwithstanding." Condert v. Earl, 45 N. J. Eq. 654, 18 Atl. 220.

That statute changed the common-law rule that a cotenancy was a joint tenancy unless expressed to be a tenancy in common. Sentliffe v. Jacobs, 84 N. J. L. 128, 86 Atl. 929, wherein it was said: "Under the original arrangement, and until the January reduction, it seems plain that the parties were tenants in common of an estate for years. At common law it would have been a joint tenancy, whether the estate were for years or of freehold, unless expressly specified as a tenancy in common. 2 Bl. 179. Our statute of 1812 reversed this rule and provided that 'no estate' should be considered an estate in joint tenancy unless it were set forth in the grant or devise creating such estate, that a joint tenancy was intended."

It has been held, however, that the Act of 1812 had no retrospective effect on cotenancies created before its enactment, because to give it such effect would be to make it an impairment of the obligation of contracts and in violation of the federal constitution. Berdan v. Van Riper, 16 N. J. L. 7, wherein the court said: "If the Act of 1812 was intended and must be construed by us to have a retrospective operation, it is one of those statutes which Judge Paterson in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 397 [1 U. S. (L. ed.) 648] emphatically condemns, as contrary to sound legislation and the fundamental principles of the social compact. Nevertheless, if the legislature has spoken in language plainly and unequivocally indicating their intention to convert estates in joint tenancy created prior to 1812 into tenancies in common, we are not at liberty to disregard that intention, unless it manifestly violates the salutary provision in the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the states from passing any law 'impairing the obligation of contracts.' That instrument does not prohibit the states from passing retrospective laws generally, but only ex post facto laws, or such as subject a party to punishment or forfeiture for an act antecedently done, and which when done was not punishable at all, or not in the manner or to the extent prescribed. Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 88 [8 U. S. (L. ed.) 876]; and in the same case, it was decided that the Supreme Court of the United States had no right to pronounce an act of a state legislature, void, as contrary to the Constitution of the United States from the mere fact that it divested antecedent vested rights of property. Nor is there any provision in the constitution of this state, nor any adjudication of this court, denying to our legislature the right to enact retrospective laws of any kind, or laws altering or divesting previously existing and vested rights. See also Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. 380 [7 U. S. (L. ed.) 458]. . . . In Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 84 [5 U. S. (L. ed.) 569], the Supreme Court of the United States say: "The objection to a law on the ground of its impairing the obligation of a contract can never depend upon the extent of the change which the law effects in it. Any deviation from its terms, by postponing or accelerating the period of performance which it prescribes; imposing conditions not expressed in the contract; or dispensing with the performance of those which are, however minute or apparently immaterial in their effect upon the contract of the parties, impairs its obligation.' And I think, it may be safely added, that any law which changes the influence and legal effect of an existing contract, as between the original parties thereto, or as between parties claiming under it, giving to one a greater and to the other a less interest or benefit in the subject-matter of the contract, than by its terms or its legal operation they would be entitled to, is a law 'impairing' its 'obligation' within the meaning of the Constitution. Apply these principles to the case before us, and if the act in question is retrospective, it seems to me to be directly in conflict with that provision in our national charter, which prohibits any legislative violation of contract."

Under that statute it has been held that it is unnecessary to use the negation "not an estate of tenancy in common," it being sufficient to declare the estate to be in joint tenancy. Condert v. Earl, 45 N. J. Eq. 654, 18 Atl. 220, wherein it was said by the court: "The question is, whether, in order to create an estate in joint tenancy under that act, it is necessary to use the negative as well as the affirmative words in it, or, indeed, any particular form of language. I do not think the question is open to the least debate or doubt. The statute, as I interpret it, does not undertake to prescribe any particular mode or language in which the parties shall express their intention. It says the intention to create the estate in question must be expressly set forth in the grant; that is, it must not be left to inference or implication. And here it is to be observed, that the two estates mentioned are entirely inconsistent with each other; they cannot exist and be held at the same time by the same parties in the same property. If an estate is held by several persons as joint tenants, it is not and cannot be held by them at the same time as tenants in common. It follows, that to say of an estate that it is held by several persons as joint tenants, is to say, in effect, that it is not held by them as tenants in common, precisely as when you say a thing is square or white you say, in effect, it is not round or black. And so when a gift to more than one person says that the estate shall be held by them as joint tenants, it is, in effect, expressly, and not by inference or implication merely, set forth that it is the intention of the parties that the estate shall be held in joint tenancy and not in tenancy in common. In such case the result is the effect of direct and express assertion, and not of inference or implication merely. The object of the statute was to prevent joint tenancies being created by mere inference from the context or by doubtful language, and it confined the parties to direct and explicit expression. In my judgment that result is attained when it is declared to be the intention of the parties that the estate shall be held by them as joint tenants. The use of the words 'and not as tenants in common,' adds nothing to the sense of the others, and is mere tautology and surplusage."

It has been held that the Act of 1812, although it used the words "grant or devise," was broad enough to cover leases for years. Sentliffer v. Jacobs, 84 N. J. L. 128, 86 Atl. 929, wherein the court said: "The act of 1812 is as broad as the rule which it was intended to change, and may be considered, notwithstanding the words 'grant or devise' as applicable to estates for years, though each tenant in this case was clearly bound to the landlord for the whole rent."

Estates to two or more trustees were within the effect of the Act of 1812, not having been excluded therefrom. But that will was changed by the Act of April 1, 1868 (Nix.

Dig. 1006), which, however, had no retroactive effect to change into tenancies in common joint trust estates which had vested prior to its enactment. Boston Franklin Co. v. Condit, 19 N. J. Eq. 394, wherein it was said: "The act relative to trustees, passed April 1st, 1868 (Nix. Dig. 1006, Rev. p. 1224) was intended to change this rule in the case of trustees, and had it been passed before 1817, would have made this an estate in joint tenancy. This act was intended to have a retrospective effect, and by its words applies to all estates theretofore granted, and thereafter to be granted. And although an act will not be construed to have a retrospective effect, unless its words expressly require it, yet this act must be so construed. But so far as it affects estates vested before its passage, it must be held to be unconstitutional and inoperative."

It has been held that a bequest to several persons to "be equally divided between them forever" creates a tenancy in common. Mason v. Methodist Episcopal Church, 27 N. J. Eq. 47.

It has been held that a devise by a testator to her niece, her mother, and her brother, and "to the survivor of them, and to the heirs and assigns of such survivor," creates a joint tenancy in the devisees. Apgar v. Christophers, 33 Fed. 201.

30. NEW YORK.

a. In General.

The New York statute is as follows: "Every estate granted or devised to two or more persons in their own right shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy; but every estate, vested in executors or trustees as such, shall be held by them in joint tenancy. This section shall apply as well to estates already created or vested as to estates hereafter granted or devised." (Real Prop. Law, § 66.) This statute expressed what has been the policy of the law of New York since 1786, when the first law of that nature was passed. Gage v. Gage, 43 Hun 501.

Joint tenancies are not favored in the law of New York, as they were at common law. Colson v. Baker, 42 Misc. 407, 87 N. Y. S. 238.

By the foregoing statute the common-law rule that a cotenancy was construed as joint unless expressly declared to be in common has been reversed. Gage v. Gage, 43 Hun 501; Purdy v. Hayt, 92 N. Y. 446; Overheiser v. Lackey, 207 N. Y. 229, Ann. Cas. 1914C 229, 100 N. E. 738; Matter of Lent, 1 Misc. 264, 22 N. Y. S. 917. In Overheiser v. Lackey, supra, it was said: "The rule of the common law that a grant or devise to two or more persons without other words created a joint tenancy was abolished early in the history of this state, and at the time when the will of Hester Marsh, the mother, took effect the rule which replaced it was embodied in the provision of the Revised Statutes which declared that 'every estate granted or devised to two or more persons, in their own right, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy.' (1 Revised Statutes 727, § 44.) This provision has been re-enacted in the existing Real Property Law. (Real Property Law, § 66.) Similar legislation abrogating the common-law doctrine favorable to joint tenancy has been enacted generally throughout the Union where 'the political policy has been to encourage the distribution of land among the people, to advance which all conveyances to more than one person except to husband and wife have been construed to be tenants in common unless another estate is fixed by express and definite words of limitation.' (Simons v. Bollinger, 154 Ind. 83.) Joint tenancy, originally a favorite of the common law, is now made an object of disfavor in most of the states by statutes requiring the grantor or deviser who wishes to create a joint tenancy to insert words in his deed or devise clearly showing his intent so to do."

Unless there are words used which clearly indicate an intention to create a joint tenancy, a grant or devise to two or more persons creates a tenancy in common under the statute. Utica Bank v. Mersereau, 3 Barb. Ch. 529, 49 Am. Dec. 189; Gage v. Gage, 43 Hun 501; Campbell v. Rawdon, 18 N. Y. 412; Everitt v. Everitt, 29 N. Y. 39; Purdy v. Hayt, 92 N. Y. 446; Mott v. Ackerman, 92 N. Y. 539; Van Brunt v. Van Brunt, 111 N. Y. 178, 19 N. E. 60; Dana v. Murray, 122 N. Y. 604, 26 N. E. 21; In re Kimberly, 150 N. Y. 90, 44 N. E. 945; Moffett v. Elmendorf, 152 N. Y. 475, 46 N. E. 845, 57 Am. St. Rep. 529; Steinway v. Steinway, 163 N. Y. 183, 57 N. E. 312; McDonald v. McDonald, 71 App. Div. 116, 75 N. Y. S. 674; McPhillips v. Fitzgerald, 76 App. Div. 15, 78 N. Y. S. 631, affirmed 177 N. Y. 543, 69 N. E. 1126; Jones v. Hand, 78 App. Div. 56, 79 N. Y. S. 556, affirmed 175 N. Y. 519, 67 N. E. 1084; Matter of De Rycke, 90 App. Div. 596, 91 N. Y. S. 159; Schneider v. Heilbron, 115 App. Div. 720, 101 N. Y. S. 152; Wurz v. Wurz, 27 Abb. N. Cas. 58, 15 N. Y. S. 720; Colson v. Baker, 42 Misc. 407, 87 N. Y. S. 238; Matter of Krummenacker, 60 Misc. 55, 112 N. Y. S. 596.

In the case of In re Kimberly, 150 N. Y. 90, 44 N. E. 945, it was held that a devise and bequest of all the testator's estate "unto my three sisters," naming them, simply created in them a tenancy in common. In Steinway v. Steinway, 163 N. Y. 183, 57 N. E. 312, it was held that a testamentary provision that upon the death of the brother of the testator each of his children should take both the income and the principle of certain stocks, in stipulation proportions, created a tenancy in common in those children there being no express provision for survivorship or that the estate be in joint tenancy. The court said: "We have thus far assumed that the contingent estates were given to the children of William Steinway as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. Tenancy in common in such cases is the statutory rule, unless the will expressly declares a joint tenancy. (1 R. S. 727, sec. 44.) Here it does not so declare, but the import of the words employed is that each one of William's children is to take both income and principle in equal proportions, and by that the testator meant that each one should take what he intended to give him, separately and solely for himself or herself. No survivorship or accumulation is mentioned. This court has steadily refused to infer a joint tenancy, in the absence of words expressly intended to declare it."

A fortiori where the instrument shows a clear intent to create a tenancy in common instead of a joint tenancy, that intent well be followed. Westcott v. Cady, 5 Johns. Ch. 334, 9 Am. Dec. 306; Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 366, 80 Am. Dec. 290; Everitt v. Everitt, 29 N. Y. 39; Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512; Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 92; Delafield v. Shipman, 103 N. Y. 463, 9 N. E. 184; Tompkins v. Verplanck, 10 App. Div. 572, 42 N. Y. S. 412; Hornberger v. Miller, 28 App. Div. 199, 50 N. Y. S. 1079. In Everitt v. Everitt, supra, the court said: "If this was less clearly so, upon the terms of the statute, the particular provisions of this will show that the gifts were distributive and several, and not joint. The testator contemplated that, at the time of his death, these three children, or such of them as should survive him, might be of full age, and he accordingly provided, by the second clause of the tenth section, that the residue should be immediately paid to them, in equal proportions, share and share alike. Then, after providing for the case of any of them being minors, at the time of his death, and in that event, confiding the management of the property to his executors, until they should all attain their full age, he directs the executors then to pay over the funds to them, in the same proportions as above provided in the case of his not departing this life, until the youngest one living at the time of his decease should become of age. The third clause of the same section contains further evidence of the several and distributive character of the interests of the children, in the discretionary direction to make advances to Rosine and Margaret, in anticipation of the receipt by them of their respective shares; and the sixth and seventh clauses confirm the same position, by directing marriage-portions, to a limited amount, to be paid to such of the daughters as should be married while under age, with the approbation of the executors, to be paid out of their shares of the residue. And the eighth clause, which provides for the eventual distribution of the whole residue in three shares, each of these daughters being entitled to one share, is further and conclusive evidence that they took as tenants in common. It would be impossible to maintain, in the face of such language, that the residue was given to them jointly, or otherwise than as tenants in common, even if the statute were not imperative to the same purpose." In Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512, it was said by the court: "The intent of the testator in the will in question to devise the residuary estate to his grandchildren in shares, and not as an entirety, thereby creating a tenancy in common, and not a joint tenancy, is denoted by the use of terms appropriate to create a tenancy in common. (2 Jar. on Wills, 142.) The residuary estate is devised to the trustees in trust for the grandchildren 'share and share alike,' and is 'to be paid and conveyed to each of said children respectively, as they each become of age, in equal shares.' This language clearly creates a tenancy in common, without the aid of the statute provision upon the subject. (1 R. S. 727, § 44.)" In Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 92, the court said: "In dealing with this question we must also concede to the appellants the advantage of their contention that the legatees took distributively—as tenants in common and not as joint tenants. (1 R. S. 727, § 44; Everitt v. Everitt, supra; Tucker v. Bishop, 16 N. Y. 402.) The testator's purpose in that respect appears plain from the phrasing of his will. He speaks repeatedly of the 'share' or 'portion' of each. He defines specifically what that share or portion shall be, as regulated and measured in its proportions by the amount of legacies previously bequeathed to the same persons. In case of the death of any one, he gives 'his or her aforesaid legacies and portion to his or her children,' and provides that 'the share and portion of any one under age' shall be kept invested. We are, therefore, to deal with the share of each separately and by itself, and determine simply whether it is proper and lawful to say that such right vested in the legatee upon the death of the testator." In Tompkins v. Verplanck, 10 App. Div. 572, 42 N. Y. S. 412, the court said: "In the sixth clause of the will the testator directs that the fund arising from the sale of the Wall street property shall, at the death of the longest liver of his wife and son, be equally divided between said son and daughter or their lawful descendants. The gift to the son and daughter unquestionably is, both under our statute and at common law, a gift to them as tenants in common; so the survivor could not take the whole."

It has been held that in order to create a joint tenancy under the statute it is not necessary to use the specific words "joint tenancy," but that any words clearly importing an intent to create such an estate will do. Overheiser v. Lackey, 207 N. Y. 229, Ann. Cas. 1914C 229, 100 N. E. 738, reversing judgment, 144 App. Div. 897, 129 N. Y. S. 1138; In re McKelway, 95 Misc. 473, 160 N. Y. S. 783.

It is, of course, sufficient to transfer an estate to several grantees "as joint tenants and not as tenants in common." Colson v. Baker, 42 Misc. 407, 87 N. Y. S. 238; Matter of Heiser, 85 Misc. 271, 147 N. Y. S. 557; Walter v. Ham, 68 App. Div. 381, 75 N. Y. S. 185. In Colson v. Baker, supra, two tenants in common made a deed to two grantees declaring that the grantees should take "as joint tenants and not as tenants in common." It was argued that on technical grounds, since a joint tenancy must have the four unities of possession, interest, time and title, tenants in common could not, by joining in a deed, create a joint tenancy except by the circuitous method of conveying the premises to one grantee, accepting from him a reconveyance in joint tenancy, and then conveying the estate to their grantees. The court held, however, that this was unnecessary and that a direct conveyance by the tenants in common created a joint tenancy. The court said: "In all references to the 'four unities' requisite to create a joint tenancy, I find nothing that prevents their existence or creation by the act of the grantor for himself and another as well as by his act for two other persons. In Thomas, Coke on Littleton (vol. 1, p. 732), it is stated: 'If a man make a feoffment in fee to the use of himself and of such wife as he should afterwards marry for the term of their lives and after he taketh a wife, they are joint tenants and yet they come to their estate at several times.' Citing Brent's Case, 3 Dyer (Eng.) 340. Here the joint tenancy in the use is created by the act of the feoffor for himself and another. If this were an exception to the general rule, or peculiar to husband and wife, or the law of uses some mention would be made of it by Coke or Blackstone, as it is cited in the chapter on joint tenancy. While it is true that joint tenancy is no longer favored as at common law, yet it still exists when by grant it is expressly declared that the estate is to be a joint tenancy. Real Property Law, art. 2, § 56. Murphy v. Whitney, 140 N. Y. 541, recognizes the right of co-owners to agree among themselves to hold the property as joint tenants, or so that the survivor would take the entire fee. If, therefore, a tenant in common may thus agree with his cotenant, why may not the owner of the fee likewise agree with his grantee to whom he has conveyed an undivided half? It being conceded that the intent to create a joint tenancy in Mary Ann Baker and Johanna Baker is clear and distinct, and that it could have been accomplished by a conveyance through a dummy, a third party, I see no reason for insisting upon such circuitousness, but I think it was so created by the deed of Mary and Elizabeth to Mary and Johanna, and that Johanna having died Mary took the entire fee by survivorship."

The use of the word "jointly" is not conclusive that a joint tenancy was intended, but whenever doubt arises on the meaning of that word the court will seek aid in solving the ambiguity by inquiring whether the instrument was prepared by a lawyer familiar with the technical distinctions between the different estates or by a layman not presumed to have such knowledge. Overheiser v. Lackey, 207 N. Y. 229, Ann. Cas. 1914C 229, 100 N. E. 738, wherein the court, from a consideration of the will in question as a whole, decided that it had not been prepared by a lawyer, and that, therefore, the use of the word "jointly" did not show an intent to create a joint tenancy. In that case it was said: "Where a doubt arises, as in the case at bar, as to the intent of a deviser in using the word 'jointly,' the courts have sought aid in solving the ambiguity by inquiring whether the instrument of devise was prepared by a lawyer familiar with the technical distinctions between different kinds of estates or by a layman who cannot be presumed to have had any such knowledge. Thus in the case of Mustain v. Gardner, [203 Ill. 284] the court remarked upon the fact that there was nothing in the language of the devise 'to indicate that the testator understood the nature and incidents of the different estates or either of them and desired that an estate having the peculiar characteristic of survivorship pass by the devise.' We are not informed by any extraneous evidence as to the authorship or identity of the person who prepared the will which is in question here; but the indications to be found in the instrument itself do not point to authorship by a lawyer. In every specific legacy of money or other personal property the words 'give and devise' are used; whereas we could hardly assume that a lawyer would not know that the word 'devise' was inappropriate to a gift of personal property. Then in the ninth paragraph there is an attempt to create a trust for the simple purpose of holding the portion of the estate allotted to the daughter Hester, and the trustees are therein given full authority 'to grant, lien, bargain, sell,' etc., the interest of that daughter. The use of the word lien instead of alien would hardly have been possible to anyone possessing a legal training. It is true there are expressions in the will such as a lawyer might use, as for example, 'convey and assure' and 'counsel learned in the law;' but these indicate that the document was drawn up by a layman who had in some manner acquired a smattering of the law, rather than by a trained professional hand. We are, therefore, entitled to assume, I think, that the form of this will and of the devise in question was not dictated or controlled by any discriminating knowledge concerning the difference between joint tenancy and tenancy in common."

In construing a will drawn by a lawyer of experience, giving a devise to the testator's wife and son "as joint tenants and tenants in common," it has been presumed that this repugnant and self-nugatory expression was a mistake and was amended to read as the usual formula "as joint tenants and not as tenants in common." Walter v. Ham, 68 App. Div. 381, 75 N. Y. S. 185, wherein it was said: "The will in question was drawn by a lawyer of considerable experience. It may be presumed that he knew that, if no words were employed declaring the character of the estate of the devisees, they would take as tenants in common. The fact that it was deemed necessary to use language descriptive of such estate in order to express the testator's intent would indicate that such intent was to give the different estate from that which they would have received had the will been silent on that subject. Again, the expression generally used in wills or other instruments where the desire is to create a joint tenancy is 'as joint tenants and not as tenants in common.' This usage being a matter of common knowledge the courts may take judicial notice of it. . . . If, therefore, the language of this will is amended by inserting after the word 'and' the words 'not as' we have an expression in common use which clearly expresses the intent of the testator to create a joint tenancy. The alternative to this construction is either to disregard the entire clause as meaningless or to say that the testator used language for the purpose of declaring the character of the estate of the devisees when such declaration was entirely unnecessary. . . . If the language of the will had been 'to my said wife Ruthetta and to my said son Madison Ham as joint tenants,' stopping there, no question could be raised that this was a sufficient express declaration. Within the authorities above cited we may expunge all of the words of that clause of the will after the words 'joint tenants,' or may amend the clause following those words by inserting after the word 'and' the words 'not as.' In either case the intent is 'expressly declared' in the will."

Even the expression of an intention to create a right of survivorship among several devisees will not necessarily make a joint tenancy, for effect can be given to this intention by construing the limitation to be of cross remainders. Purdy v. Hayt, 92 N. Y. 446, wherein the court said: "In this case there are no words of survivorship, and no words from which the intention to create a joint tenancy in the estate devised to the two sisters clearly appears, and nothing short of this at least will satisfy the language of the statute. But it was manifestly the intention of the testator that the survivor of the two sisters should succeed for life to the interest of the sister first dying. The testator gives to the two sisters the use and occupation of the farm during their respective lives, and the intent that the surviving sister should have the use of the whole farm after the death of the other is clearly indicated by the restriction of the power vested in the executors to sell the farm, to a sale to be made 'after the decease of my sisters, Jane and Catharine,' and a sale before that time would have been unauthorized. But the purpose of the testator, that his surviving sister should enjoy the whole estate after the death of the other, can be accomplished without construing the original estate in the two as a joint tenancy. There seems to be no objection to a limitation to two as tenants in common for life, and of the share of the one first dying to the survivor for life. . . . The raising of cross remainders by implication is not unusual, and where such an implication is justified by the language of the will, and will accomplish the purpose of the testator, it is the duty of the court so to construe the will as to give effect both to the statute and to his intention."

b. Personal Property.

The statute changing the common-law construction of instruments creating cotenancies applies to estates in personality as well as to estates in realty. Lane v. Brown, 20 Hun 382; In re Lapham, 37 Hun 15; Bliven v. Seymour, 88 N. Y. 469; Mills v. Husson, 140 N. Y. 99, 35 N. E. 422; In re Kimberly, 150 N. Y. 90, 44 N. E. 945; Com- mercial Bank v. Sherwood, 162 N. Y. 310, 56 N. E. 834; Matter of Lent, 1 Misc. 264, 22 N. Y. S. 917; Matter of Munter, 19 Misc. 201, 44 N. Y. S. 605; Baumann v. Guion, 21 Misc. 120, 46 N. Y. S. 715. In Commercial Bank v. Sherwood, supra, the court said: "Any doubt upon the subject, however, would seem to be removed by the nature of the bill of sale, which was to Frederick A. Sherwood, and to Catharine Bolton, in their own right. By such a transfer they must be deemed to take as tenants in common and not by a joint interest. The statutory rule that 'every estate granted or devised, to two or more persons, in their own right, shall be deemed a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy,' (2 R. S. 727, § 44) I think should apply as well to a transfer of personal property as to real estate. It indicates a policy of the state with respect to ownership of property and should be given general application as a rule." In Matter of Munter, 19 Misc. 201, 44 N. Y. S. 605, the court said: "The rule that a legacy to two or more persons named, without further qualifications, constitutes a legacy to them as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants is now well settled in this state, and upon this question the early cases of Putnam v. Putnam, 4 Bradf. 308, and Gardner v. Printup, 2 Barb. 83 must be regarded as overruled as well as the early English rule holding a contrary doctrine."

It has been held that the statute applies to chattel interests in land. Blanchard v. Blanchard, 4 Hun 287 (overruling Putnam v. Putnam, 4 Bradf. 309); McPhillips v. Fitzgerald, 76 App. Div. 15, 78 N. Y. S. 631, affirmed in 177 N. Y. 543, 69 N. E. 1126. In Blanchard v. Blanchard, supra, it was held that the statute applied to a testamentary disposition of a chattel interest in realty. The court said in that case: "Such an estate is treated as personal property in every respect. In case of the death of the owner, it goes to the executor, and not to the heir at law. These devisees, therefore, took the gift to them as tenants in common, notwithstanding it is one of personal property; for it is provided by statute, that every estate devised to one or more persons shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy, and that provision embraces all estates in land, whatever may be the duration of them. The remark of Surrogate Bradford on this subject, in Putnam v. Putnam [4 Bradf. 308] was too broad."

But it has been held that, while the statute applies to personal property, nevertheless, since personal property may be transferred without an instrument in writing, it is competent to prove by parol an intent to create a joint tenancy by a transfer of personalty to several persons. Matter of Kaupper, 141 App. Div. 54, 125 N. Y. S. 878, affirmed 201 N. Y. 534, 94 N. E. 1095, wherein the court said: "The statute by its terms is limited to real property. So far as the nature of the tenure of an estate in personal property is concerned, it may be conceded that the statutory rule here expressed is applicable also to personal property. . . . It may be that in the case of real property the statutory presumption that grantees hold as tenants in common 'is only removed by an express declaration that they take as joint tenants, or by words from which it clearly appears that there is an intention to create a joint tenancy,' and that 'this intention can only be gathered from the expression used in the devise or grant, and must be a necessary implication from it.' . . . But in the case of real property, 'an estate or interest' therein, 'other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, or any trust or power, over or concerning real property, or in any manner relating thereto, cannot be created, granted, assigned, surrendered or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by a deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the person, creating, granting, assigning, surrendering or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent, thereunto authorized by writing.' (Real Prop. Law [Laws of 1896, chap. 547], § 207.) So the Statute of Wills makes necessary (with an exception not here important to be noticed) a written instrument subscribed and attested with certain formalities. (2 R. S. 63, § 40.) But in the case of personal property no instrument in writing is necessary to transfer the title thereto or create an estate therein, and it would seem unreasonable to insist that, although the title might be transferred and the estate created by parol, evidence as to the character of that estate, and that it was a joint tenancy and not a tenancy in common, must be reduced to writing."

c. Executors and Trustees.

Where executors or trustees hold as such, the Act of 1786 does not apply to their estates, and they hold as joint tenants. Lorillard v. Coster, 5 Paige 172, reversing 14 Wend 265; Matter of Steencken, 51 App. Div. 417, 64 N. Y. S. 660. See also Everitt v. Everitt, 29 N. Y. 39; Troy v. Smith, 11 N. Y. 261.

But the nature of the estate of trustees, in reference to the rights of their cestuis que trust, depends upon the nature of the rights or interests of the latter, and the equitable estates of cestuis que trust are within the provisions of the Act of 1786. Lorillard v. Coster, 5 Paige 172, reversing 14 Wend. 265, wherein it was held that a devise to the testator's brother and to his twelve nephews and nieces, in trust to apply the rents and profits to the use of the twelve nephews and nieces during their joint lives, and to the survivor or survivors of them, created, not a joint tenancy, but a tenancy in common with cross remainders, under the statute making a grant to two or more a tenancy in common unless expressed to be in joint tenancy.

It has been held that the mere fact that the grantees in a deed are described as executors, there being nothing else in the deed to show that it is intended that they shall take as trustees, or in trust, does not make the estate a joint tenancy. Utica Bank v. Mersereau, 3 Barb. Ch. 528, 570, wherein it was said: "Although the grantees in the deed of February, 1818, which created the estoppel, are described as executors, there is nothing in that deed to show that the estate was intended to be granted to them as trustees, so as to create a joint tenancy which would belong to the survivors. The estoppel, therefore, vested the legal title to the premises in the three grantees named in that deed, as tenants in common, under the provisions of the Act of February, 1786, directing the mode of conveyances to joint tenants."

31. NORTH CAROLINA.

The Revisal of North Carolina statutes contains the following provisions: "In all estates, real or personal, held in joint tenancy, the part or share of any tenant dying shall not descend or go to the surviving tenant, but shall descend or be vested in the heirs, executors, or administrators, or assigns respectively of the tenant so dying, in the same manner as estates held by tenancy in common: Provided, that estates held in joint tenancy for the purpose of carrying on and promoting trade and commerce, or any useful work or manufacture, established and pursued with a view of profit to the parties therein concerned, shall be vested in the surviving partner, in order to enable him to settle and adjust the partnership business, or pay off the debts which may have been contracted in pursuit of the said joint business; but as soon as the same shall be effected, the survivor shall account with, and pay, and deliver to the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns respectively of such deceased partner, all such part, share, and sums of money as he may be entitled to by virtue of the original agreement, if any, or according to his share or part in the joint concern, in the same manner as partnership stock is usually settled between joint merchants and the representatives of their deceased partners." (Rev. § 1579.) "In all cases where only a naked trust not coupled with a beneficial interest has been created or exists, or shall be created, and the conveyance is to two or more trustees, the right to perform the trust and make estate under the same shall be exercised by any of such trustees, in the event of the death of his cotrustee or cotrustees or the refusal or inability of the cotrustee or cotrustees to perform the trust; and in cases of trusts herein named the trustees shall hold as joint tenants, and in all respects as joint tenants held before the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four." Rev. § 1580.) "Every estate vested in executors, administrators or collectors, as such shall be held by them in joint tenancy." (Rev. § 166.) Section 1579, supra, was enacted in 1784 (Laws of 1784, chap. 204, sec. 6), with the exception of the proviso regarding partnership property which was a later addition.

The Act of 1784 did not abolish estates in joint tenancy. Vass v. Freeman, 56 N. C. 221, 69 Am. Dec. 734; Rowland v. Rowland, 93 N. C. 214.

It had the effect of abolishing survivorship where that incident of a joint tenancy would otherwise have been created by law. Taylor v. Smith, 116 N. C. 531, 21 S. E. 202; and only then in the case of joint tenancies held in fee. Blair v. Osborne, 84 N. C. 417; Powell v. Morisey, 84 N. C. 421; Rowland v. Rowland, 93 N. C. 214.

Joint life estates were not within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Act of 1784, and survivorship in such estates was not abolished thereby. Powell v. Allen, 75 N. C. 450; Blair v. Osborne, 84 N. C. 417; Powell v. Morisey, 84 N. C. 421. In Powell v. Allen, supra, the court said: "It follows that Richard Terrell, the survivor of the three devisees, is entitled to the whole tract of land for his life, unless 'estates for life' come within the operation of the Act of 1784. That is the question. The act is in these words: In all estates, real or personal, the part or share of any tenant dying shall not descend or go to the surviving tenant, but shall descend or be vested in the heirs, executors, or administrators or assigns of the tenant so dying, in the same manner as estates by tenancy in common.' It is obvious that these words cannot be made to apply to joint tenants for life. In regard to real estate, on the death of one of the tenants for life his part cannot descend to his heirs, but must go either to the survivor or some third person entitled to take, not by descent but by purchase, under the limitation law. In regard to personal estate, on the death of one of the tenants for life his part cannot pass to his executors, administrators or assigns, but must go either to the survivor or some third person entitled to take, not under the tenant dying, but by force of the limitation over. The word 'assigns' has no signification, but evidently is a mere expletive thrown in by force of habit to accompany the words 'executors and administrators;' for if the tenant dying had in his lifetime made an assignment of his part, the effect was to sever the joint tenancy, and there was no occasion for a statute to prevent his share from being acquired by the 'jus accrescendi.' It is also obvious that the case of tenants for life does not come within the mischief which called for the enactment of the statute. The evil was that when an estate of inheritance was held in joint tenancy on the death of one, his part passed absolutely to the survivor, and the heirs of the tenant dying were wholly excluded; the object was to legislate in favor of the heirs of the dying tenant, but as far as the statute indicates, the rights of third persons taking by purchase under the limitation, and the rights of the survivor claiming under the common-law rule, were not intended to be interfered with, for as between them the doctrine of survivorship works no crying hardship. The learned and very studious counsel for the plaintiff Mr. Haywood, when asked by the court, stated that he had not been able to find any case in which the Act of 1784 was extended to estates for life, or where the point was presented. This shows that there was no mischief in respect thereto calling for a remedy; besides, if the purpose had been to include all estates in joint tenancy, that purpose would have been better served by abolishing the 'jus accrescendi' in a few direct words to that effect, instead of resorting to words applicable only to estates of inheritance held in joint tenancy in real estate, and absolute estates held in joint tenancy in personal property." In Blair v. Osborne, 84 N. C. 417, the court said: "The deed in the absence of any words of inheritance unquestionably conveys only a life estate to the donees, and whether the children take the estate jointly with their mother, or in remainder after her life, the estate is a joint tenancy, for the Act of 1784 which converted joint tenancies into estates in common, had reference only to estates of inheritance. Such is the reasonable construction of the act and the interpretation which has been given to it by this court in Powell v. Allen, 75 N. C. 450."

In the case of a grant to two or more for life, therefore, the common-law rule maintains, in North Carolina, that an estate to two or more is a joint tenancy, in the absence of words showing an intention to create a tenancy in common. Powell v. Allen, 75 N. C. 450.

The Act of 1784 does not prohibit the creation of a survivorship right by a proper express contract for such a right, by written contracts as to land, or oral contracts as to personalty. Vass v. Freeman, 56 N. C. 221, 69 Am. Dec. 734; Taylor v. Smith, 116 N. C. 531, 21 S. E. 202. In the case last cited it was held that an agreement between two owners of a note, payable to them jointly, that the note should belong to the survivor upon the death of either was valid to create a right of survivorship.

It has been held that the Act of 1784, abolishing survivorship, does not apply to choses in action, since they are not to be deemed within the meaning of the word "estate" as used in that statute. Bond v. Hilton, 51 N. C. 180.

Under the statute trustees are seized as to joint tenants and not as tenants in common. Cameron v. Hicks, 141 N. C. 21, 53 S. E. 728, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 407; Webb v. Borden, 145 N. C. 188, 58 S. E. 1083 (semble).

It was held that a clause in a will made before the enactment of the Act of 1784, whereby the testator devised lands to his three named daughters "to be equally divided between them and their heirs, share and share alike" created a tenancy in common, in the daughters. Den v. Hardison, 7 N. C. 164. In Campbell v. Herron, 1 N. C. 381, it was held that a devise, after a life estate to the testator's wife, to the use of his three daughters, named, and to no other use or uses whatsoever, created in the three daughters a joint tenancy and not a tenancy in common. But the following note appears to the report of the case: "On the second [point] see Act of 1784 (1 Rev. Stat. ch. 43, sec. 1) by which the principle incident of joint tenancy, to wit, survivorship, is abolished."

32. NORTH DAKOTA.

The statute of North Dakota seems to reverse the common-law rule as to cotenancies by an affirmative definition of the estate of joint tenancy. It provides: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." (Comp. Laws, § 5262.)

No cases within the scope of this note have been found which construe the foregoing statute.

33. OHIO.

It has been said that joint tenancy, with its concomitant of the jus accrescendi, is utterly inconsistent with the laws of Ohio. Sergeant v. Steinberger, 2 Ohio 305, 15 Am. Dec. 553; Wilson v. Fleming, 13 Ohio 68.

In Wilson v. Fleming, supra, the court said: "In Miles v. Fisher, 10 Ohio 1, this court held that estates in joint tenancy had no existence here. They are, in fact, no longer favorites of the common law in England; for, although they were, Lord Holt, in 1 Salk. 391, gives us the reason. It was the right of survivorship. Its policy was adverse to the division of tenures, because it tended to multiply feudal services, and weaken the efficacy of that connection. But Lord Hardwick, long after, in 1 Wils. 165, declared the reason had ceased with the abolition of tenures. We entertain no doubt that such estates, and their concomitant incident, the right of survivorship, are utterly inconsistent with the genius and spirit of our laws."

Therefore joint tenancy, the common-law estate with survivorship, has no existence in that state, not because it has been abolished by statute, but because it was never adopted from the common law. Sergeant v. Steinberger, 2 Ohio 305, 15 Am. Dec. 553; Miles v. Fisher, 10 Ohio 1, 36 Am. Dec. 61; Wilson v. Fleming, 13 Ohio 68; Thompson v. Dingman, 2 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 711, 4 West. L. Month. 640. See also Tabler v. Wiseman, 2 Ohio St. 207. In Sergeant v. Steinberger, supra, the court said: "It has more than once been decided, by the supreme court, on the circuit, that estates in joint tenancy do not exist under the laws of Ohio. The reasons which gave rise to this description of estate in England, never existed with us. The jus accrescendi is not founded in principles of natural justice, nor in any reasons of policy applicable to our society or institutions. But, on the contrary, it is adverse to the understandings, habits, and feelings of the people. We have no statute recognizing the existence of any such principle as the right of survivorship. But we have various statutory provisions inconsistent with it. The laws passed, both during the territorial government and since, authorize joint tenants, tenants in common, and coparceners, and in some cases, the executors, administrators, or guardians of such persons, to demand and have partition. It is from this evidence that the legislature have treated a joint tenancy as a tenancy in common." In Thompson v. Dingman, 2 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 711, 4 West. L. Month. 640, the court said: "And because a technical joint tenancy, with the right of survivorship, alike with the jus accrescendi, are not founded in principles of natural justice, nor in any reasons of policy applicable to our society or institutions, a devise to two persons and their heirs, in the absence of language necessarily creating a right of survivorship, or joint tenancy, vests the title in them as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants."

But although joint tenancy as such does not exist in Ohio, nevertheless a joint estate with survivorship may be created by an express provision for survivorship. Miles v. Fisher, 10 Ohio 1, 36 Am. Dec. 61, wherein the court said: "The testator's words are to 'Fisher, Allen, and Shaw,' to the survivors or survivor, to hold as joint tenants, and not as 'tenants in common.' It is urged that where an estate is limited in joint tenancy, by express words, the common-law incident of survivorship attaches, and that in this case, on the death of Shaw, his share is held by his cotenants, as long as they hold their own. But it has long since been adjudicated that the estate of joint tenancy, as distinguished from a tenancy in common, has no existence in Ohio. 2 Ohio 306. Consequently this doctrine of survivorship cannot be used to protect this part of the title. Yet the testator intended to give the land to the survivor of the trustees, and every conveyance should be construed to carry the intention of the maker into effect, if made consonant with the principles and form of law. Laying out of view the doctrine of survivorship, resulting from joint tenancy, an incident of the estate depending upon the law, and not the act of the party, we find the testator, by express words, limiting the estate to the three trustees and the survivor. The estate well passes, by these words, to the survivor, for life."

34. OREGON.

Joint tenancy is abolished in Oregon by an Act of 1862, which provides: "A tenant in common may maintain any proper action, suit, or proceeding against his cotenant for receiving more than his just proportion of the rents or profits of the estate owned by them in common; and joint tenancy is abolished, and all persons having an undivided interest in real property are to be deemed and considered tenants in common." (Laws, § 7175) But although that statute specifically abolishes joint tenancies, such estates where expressly limited are recognized and provided for by another statute, the Act of 1854, as follows: "Every conveyance or devise of lands, or interest therein, made to two or more persons, other than to executors and trustees, as such, shall be construed to create a tenancy in common in such estate, unless it be expressly declared in such conveyance or devise that the grantees or devisees shall take the lands as joint tenants." (Laws, § 7108.) "And joint tenancy is specifically provided for in the case of trustees and executors." (Laws, §§ 7177, 7178.)

Under the provisions of the sections last cited it has been held that joint trustees hold in joint tenancy and that on the death of one the trust estate survives to the other. Mattison v. Mattison, 53 Ore. 254, 18 Ann. Cas. 218, 100 Pac. 4, 133 Am. St. Rep. 829, wherein it was said: "The point further raised by plaintiff, that the power being conferred upon two, and one of the donees of the power has died, it cannot be exercised by the survivor, is not involved here as the terms of the will create a trust—not a mere power—and by the legislative act of 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 253) it is declared that trustees holding a trust in real estate hold as joint tenants, unless otherwise provided in the devise or deed, and therefore upon the death of one, the trust survives in the other."

35. PENNSYLVANIA.

a. In General.

By the Act of March 31, 1812, survivorship was expressly abolished as an incident of joint tenancy in Pennsylvania. Kennedy's Appeal 60 Pa. St. 311; Yard's Appeal, 86 Pa. St. 125; Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, 205 Pa. St. 24, 54 Atl. 487; In re McCallum, 211 Pa. St. 205, 60 Atl. 903; Kollock's Estate, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 348. In Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, supra, it was stated: "The Act of March 31, 1812, 5 Sm. L. 395, expressly abolished the right of survivorship as an incident of joint tenancy, and provided that 'whatever kind the estate or thing holden, be, the parts of those who die first . . . shall be considered . . . in the same manner as if such deceased joint tenants had been tenants in common.' But it is not forbidden by this act, nor made illegal in any way, to create by grant or devise an estate with the same attribute of survivorship as joint tenancy at common law. Thus a grant to three for their joint lives with remainders to the survivors and survivor, and to the heirs of the survivor in fee would be unquestionably good and yet it would be practically a grant to the three in joint tenancy with survivorship as at common law."

The provisions of the statute heretofore referred to are as follows: "If partition be not made between joint tenants, whether they be such as might have been compelled to make partition or not, or whatever kind the estate or thing holden or possessed be, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivors, but shall descend or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts, charges, curtesy or dower, or transmissible to executors or administrators, and be considered to every other intent and purpose, in the same manner as if such deceased joint tenants had been tenants in common: Provided always, that nothing in this act shall be taken to affect any trust estate." (Brightby Purd. Dig. p. 1089.)

The Act of 1812 has been held to be constitutional and to have a retroactive effect, being applicable to estates existing at the time of its enactment. Bambaugh v. Bambaugh, 11 Serg. & R. 191.

Previous to the enactment of the Act of 1812, instruments creating cotenancies were construed as at common law. Davidson v. Heydom, 2 Yeates 459 (1799). See also Duncan v. Forrer, 6 Bin. 193, which was a case decided in October, 1813, wherein the court applied the common law without referring to the Act of 1812.

But the Act of 1812 did not make it unlawful to create a joint estate with the same attribute of survivorship as joint tenancies had at common law. Such an estate may still be created in Pennsylvania by grant or devise, by the express language of the instrument or by necessary implication. Everitt v. Duss, 197 Fed. 401; Arnold v. Jack, 24 Pa. St. 57; Kerr v. Verner, 66 Pa. St. 326; Jones v. Cable, 114 Pa. St. 586, 7 Atl. 791; Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, 205 Pa. St. 24, 54 Atl. 487; Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 38 W. N. C. 536; McVey v. Latta, 4 W. N. C. 524; Lentz v. Lentz, 2 Phila. 117, 13 Leg. Int. 148. See also Harts' Estate, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 369. In Arnold v. Jack, supra, it was said: "The estate in controversy was devised by Henry Jack to his three brothers, Matthew, William and Wilson Jack, in the following words: 'As joint tenants and to the survivors and survivor of them, and the heir of said survivor, to be assignable by my said brothers or their survivors at any time or in any manner they may think proper, provided the said brothers or their survivors shall all, or both, if one be dead, assent to such assignment, but the survivor of them may assign, convey, or devise at his pleasure.' . . . There is but little if any difficulty in ascertaining how Henry Jack intended his estate to pass to and be enjoyed by his three brothers. He devises it to them first as joint tenants, and then expressly provides for what at common law was an incident of the tenancy, viz. the right of survivorship; making the right of disposition to depend upon the assent of all three whilst in full life; of two after the death of one; but the survivor to 'assign, convey, or devise at his pleasure.' And besides, the word of inheritance is only connected with the devise to the survivor. Is it not clear then that Henry Jack intended that his three brothers should take an estate for life with cross remainder in fee to the survivor, or in other words that the estate should be held and enjoyed by all during the life of all, by two after the death of one, and by the survivor in fee simple, subject to be disposed of at any time by the consent of the parties in interest? If such was the intention of Henry Jack, can it be carried into effect without violating any rule of law?

Was it a legal intention? It is not pretended that there is any prohibition either in the statute or common law against devising an estate for life to two or more, with remainder in fee to the survivor; but it is alleged that the devise here was to the three brothers as joint tenants, and that by the Act of 31st March, 1812, the 'jus accrescendi' or right of survivorship in joint tenancy is abolished; and that the limitation in the will to the survivors referred to those who survived the testator, and not to an indefinite survivorship. It is a question worthy of consideration whether the provisions of the Act of 1812 apply to a joint tenancy created by express words in a devise, or whether the operation of the act should not be confined to those technical joint tenancies arising from the unities of 'time, title, interest, and possession;' but conceding that the right of survivorship, as an incident of a joint tenancy, no matter how created, is gone, it by no means follows that this right may not be expressly given either by a devise in a will or by grant in a deed of conveyance. It may cease to exist as an incident, and yet be legally created as a principle. That it was created in the will under consideration is apparent when we consider the whole of the devise. Had the testator merely given the estate to his brothers as joint tenants, it may be that the Act of 1812 would have excluded the right of survivorship. Had it been devised simply to the three, the survivors or the survivor of them, it is probable that its true construction would have referred the time of survivorship to the death of the testator; but when we find that the devise is to the three brothers expressly as 'joint tenants, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of said survivor,' and that the right to transfer depends upon the assent of all, we cannot doubt but that the ultimate survivor was finally to be the recipient of the entire estate."

The result of the ruling in the case last quoted is that, practically, the Act of 1812 simply establishes a presumption in favor of tenancies in common, reversing the common-law presumption in favor of joint tenancy; and it becomes merely a question of whether in a particular case there has been a sufficient expression of an intent to create a joint tenancy to rebut the statutory presumption, this intent to be gathered from the whole will or deed. Arnold v. Jack, 24 Pa. St. 57; Kerr v. Verner, 66 Pa. St. 326; Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, 205 Pa. St. 24, 54 Atl. 487; Lentz v. Lentz, 2 Phila. 117, 13 Leg. Int. 148. See also McKeever v. Patteson, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 304; In re McCallum, 211 Pa. St. 205, 60 Atl. 903; McVey v. Latta, 4 W. N. C. 524. In Kerr v. Verner, supra, the court said: "The whole tenor and scope of this will shows in the clearest manner it was the express intent of the testator to confer an estate upon Christiana and Phoebe for their joint lives in such wise that the share of the one first deceased should inure on her death for the benefit of the survivor. I have quoted nearly the whole will, as this construction necessarily results from an implication pervading the whole will and clearly deducible from the spirit of its provisions." In Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, 205 Pa. St. 24, 54 Atl. 487, it was held that the words "as joint tenants and not as tenants in common" were sufficient to rebut the statutory presumption. The court said therein: "Survivorship as an incident of an estate granted being still lawful, its creation becomes a question of intent. No particular form of words is required further than that they shall be sufficient to clearly express an intent in order to overcome the presumption arising from the statute. In the present case the grant was to four, to hold 'as joint tenants and not as tenants in common.' The only practical difference between the two estates was the right of survivorship in joint tenancy. The statute had abolished this and provided that the estate holden should be considered 'in the same manner as if . . . they had been tenants in common.' When therefore the grantor declared in his deed that his grantees should hold 'as joint tenants and not as tenants in common,' he made clear his intent not to follow the statute but to convey an estate subject to the right of survivorship, the distinguishing incident of joint tenancy at common law." In Lentz v. Lentz, 2 Phila. 117, 13 Leg. Int. 148, the court said: "Be this as it may, there is no doubt that the express intent of the testator may still confer an estate upon two for their joint lives, in such wise, that the share of the person first deceased shall inure on his death for the benefit of the survivor. And it is equally plain, that if this can be done by express words, it may equally result from an implication pervading the whole will, and clearly deducible from the spirit of its provisions. The object of the act was to cut off survivorship by operation of law, aside from or contrary to the meaning of the donor, and not to restrain or preclude any direction, which he may think fit to impress on the transmission of his property, within the limits prescribed by the law of perpetuities. Here the testatrix, after giving the house in which she resided to her daughters, Ann and Louisa, so long as they should remain single, goes on to provide that the same should be sold immediately upon their death or marriage, and the proceeds divided among her children, as afterwards designated; in which designation she includes Ann, Louisa, and four other children, all then surviving, and the grandchildren of her son Jacob, who had died before the execution of the will. The meaning of the testatrix is not free from obscurity, especially on the point of what was to be done with the property in the event of the marriage of either Ann or Louisa, the other still continuing sole and unmarried. But looking at what she has said, we have no doubt, that her purpose was to provide a home or support her two unmarried daughters, so long as they continued in a condition to need it, nor that this would be frustrated by holding, that a sale should take place, and the proceeds be distributed among the whole, immediately upon the death of either, thus turning the other out of doors, and leaving her with what might be insufficient means of procuring another residence. And it would be no less contrary to the spirit of the will, than to a well-established rule of construction, to interpret it as leaving the share given to Ann undisposed of, during the interval between her death and that of Louisa, which would not only produce a partial intestacy, but defeat the object of making those who were evidently the primary objects of the testatrix's bounty, as comfortable as her somewhat limited means would permit. On the whole, we are of opinion, though not without difficulty, that the interest given to Ann vested on her death in Louisa, and consequently enter judgment on the case stated for the defendant."

It has been held that the mere words "joint tenancy" are not a sufficient expression of intent to make an estate a joint tenancy under the statute. McKeever v. Patteson, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 304. But the words "as joint tenants and not as tenants in common" have been held to be sufficient. Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, 205 Pa. St. 24, 54 Atl. 487.

Where, however, there is a grant by will or deed of an estate to two or more persons, and there is no expression of intention to create a joint tenancy or a right of survivorship, and where such an intention does not appear by necessary implication, the estate is a tenancy in common by virtue of the statute. Seely v. Seely, 44 Pa. St. 434; Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 38 W. N. C. 536; McVey v. Latta, 4 W. N. C. 524; Allison v. Kurtz, 2 Watts 185; Galbraith v. Galbraith, 3 Serg. & R. 392; Irwin v. Dunwoody, 17 Serg. & R. 61; Martin v. Smith, 5 Bin. 16, 6 Am. Dec. 395; McPherson v. McPherson, Add. 327. In Seely v. Seely, supra, it was said: "The Act of Assembly of 31st March 1812, abolished joint tenancies in Pennsylvania, excepting only perhaps in cases expressly created by deed or will, as held in Arnold v. Jack, 24 Pa. St. 57, where a distinction is taken between the creation of such an estate by express terms, and its existence as an incident of title. It was there held that it might be expressly created, but where it resulted as an incident from the form of the grant or devise, it was taken away by the act. We make no quarrel with this distinction now, for in this case a joint tenancy is not couched in express terms, so that the case cited, as well as the statute, is against its supposed existence. The court should not therefore have held that Chloe Seely was entitled by survivorship to her deceased sister's undivided moiety in the premises. What estate then did the will give to these two daughters? The Act of 1812 turns estates otherwise joint tenancies into tenancies in common, and this sufficiently answers the inquiry without more." In McVey v. Latta, 4 W. N. C. 524, the court held that an expression of survivorship used in the instant devise did not mean the survivorship of one of the devisees by the other, but had reference to their surviving the testatrix and that, consequently, this expression was not sufficient to show an intent to create a joint tenancy. It was said therein by the court: "It may be conceded, that, notwithstanding the Act of 31st March, 1812, an estate in joint tenancy may still be given either by a devise in a will, or by grant in a deed of conveyance. . . . Such an intent, however, is not to be inferred in the absence of apt words creating it; nor where the main intent of the testator is to make division. . . . Joint tenancies are not favored at law nor in equity. A construction ought to be favored that makes the estate vest absolutely at the earliest period possible. The intention of the testator, gathered from the whole will, is the great leading rule in the construction of a will. Except where the law overrules the intention it must control the construction. The testatrix gave to her two daughters 'jointly and equally' all her residuary estate. The will evinces no intention to give it to any other persons on any contingency. If, however, one should die, the survivor was to take the whole. Die when? We think the manifest meaning is, die during the life of the testatrix. This view appears to be sustained by Fulton v. Fulton, 2 Grant Cas. 28; Johnson v. Morton, 10 Pa. St. 245; Caldwell v. Skilton, 13 Pa. St. 152; Cresson's Appeal, 76 Pac. St. 19. No rule of law prevents giving full effect to this intention of the testatrix. As both daughters were living at the death of the testatrix, they took as tenants in common, and the heirs of the daughter who first died are entitled to recover."

It has been held that where there is a devise to two or more, nominatim, without the expression of a plain intent of the testator to vest the estate in the survivor, the incident of survivorship is abolished, by a proper interpretation of the Act of 1812, from and after the date of the will, and not merely from the death of the testator. Kennedy's Appeal, 60 Pa. St. 511.

Before as well as after the enactment of the Act of 1812, a devise to several named children "to be divided in equal portions," created a tenancy in common. Kollock's Estate, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 348.

In June, 1812, it was held that where several persons take out a warrant for land they take as tenants in common in the absence of an expression of a contrary intent. Caines v. Grant, 5 Bin. 119.

b. Personality and Trust Estates.

The Act of 1812 quoted in the preceding subdivision applies to personal property as well as to real property. Yard's Appeal, 86 Pa. St. 125, wherein the court said: "This question is really settled by the decision in Kennedy's Appeal, 60 Pa. St. 511. It is true the subject of discussion in that case was a devise of real estate, while that before us is a bequest of personality. But Kennedy's case was not rested on any difference between realty and personality, or a difference between the effect of a devise and a testament. The case was ruled upon the effect of the Act of 31st March 1812, abolishing the right of survivorship as an effect of joint tenancy. This act relates to personal as well as to real estate, and the policy which dictated its enactment seems to be equally applicable to each. The reasons, therefore, given in the opinion in Kennedy's Appeal apply with equal force to the bequest in this case. The Act of 1812 has become a rule of property, and as such it is better that its interpretation should be uniform, thereby producing certainty in the interpretation of wills, instead of giving a diversity of effect to the law, and thereby uncertainty and confusion in interpreting wills. Referring, therefore, to Kennedy's Appeal for the reasons there given, further discussion is unnecessary."

The Act of 1812 expressly excepts trust estates and, as regards such estates, the rule of the common law remains in force in Pennsylvania, that an estate to two or more, in the absence of an expression of a contrary intention, is a joint tenancy with survivorship. And any doubt which might have existed on that point has been allayed by the Act of May 3, 1855, which specifically provides for survivorship in trust estates. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. v. Lehigh Coal, etc. Co. 36 Pa. St. 204, wherein the court said: "The Act of the 31st March 1812, excepted trust estates in its enactments against joint tenancy. The right of survivorship, therefore, continued as to them as it had done at common law. It seems to me that the grant to the trustees in this case was as joint tenants; and being so, the title at once vested in the survivors on the death of Mr. White, and they could convey. But be this as it may, the Act of 3d May, 1855 comes in to relieve the subject of difficulty. It provides 'that whensoever any trust, power or authority shall be, in the manner provided for in the act to which this is a supplement (the act relating to assignees for the benefit of creditors and other trustees, P. L. 1836, p. 628), conferred on two or more persons by name, and one or more of them shall die, or renounce, or be legally discharged from fulfilling such trust, or exercising such power, the survivors or survivor, or remaining trustees, shall have and exercise all the title and authority which the whole might have done, unless the trust or power conferred shall require the whole number to act, in which case the vacancies shall be filled in the manner provided by the act to which this is a supplement.'"

36. RHODE ISLAND.

The following statute has been enacted in Rhode Island: "All gifts, feoffments, grants, conveyances, devises, or legacies, of real or personal estates, which shall be made to two or more persons, whether they be husband and wife or otherwise, shall be deemed to create a tenancy in common and not a joint tenancy, unless it be declared that the tenancy is to be joint, or that the same is to such persons and the survivors or survivor of them, or to them as trustees or executors, or unless the intention manifestly appears that such persons shall take as joint tenants and not as tenants in common." (Gen. Laws, c. 252, § 1) "Joint heirs shall be deemed tenants in common." (Gen. Laws, c. 252, § 2.) The foregoing provisions were contained in chapter 201 of the General Laws of 1896, which was itself a revision of chapter 172 of the Public Statutes of 1882. That chapter in terms applied only to estates in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and was changed by the chapter of General Laws of 1896 so as expressly to include personality. The earlier statute was as follows: "All gifts, grants, feoffments, devises, and other conveyances of any lands, tenements, and hereditaments which shall be made to two or more persons, whether they be husband and wife or otherwise, and whether for years, for life, in tail or in fee, shall be taken, deemed, and adjudged to be estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it is or shall be therein expressly said that the grantees, feoffees, or devisees shall have or hold the same lands, tenements, or hereditaments as joint tenants or in joint tenancy, or to them and the survivors or survivor of them, or unless other words be therein used manifestly showing it to be the intention of the parties to such gifts, grants, feoffments, devises, or other conveyances that such lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall vest and be holden as joint estates and not as estates in common." That statute was a re-enactment of an Act of 1798. See Randall v. Phillips, 3 Mason 378, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,555.

The statute prior to 1896 applied only to real estate, having no application to personalty. Clarke v. Robinson, 16 R. I. 180, 13 Atl. 124; Gallagher v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. 22 R. I. 141, 46 Atl. 451. Therefore cotenancies in personalty were, under the statute, still governed by the common-law rules of construction; and a gift of personalty, by deed or will, to two or more persons, simply, without any expression showing an intention to create a tenancy in common, created a joint tenancy with survivorship. Gallagher v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. 22 R. I. 141, 46 Atl. 451.

Before the revision of the statute there was no specific reference to trust estates, and in at least two cases the court, construing limitations to trustees, refused to decide whether that statute applied to trust estates or not, making the decision turn on other grounds. Franklin Sav. Inst. v. People's Sav. Bank, 14 R. I. 632; Petitioner Bailey, 15 R. I. 60, 1 Atl. 131. The Act of 1896 in terms, however, excludes trust estates.

Under the early statute it was held that a devise or deed to two or more created an estate in common, unless there were words manifestly showing an intent to have them take as joint tenants. Randall v. Phillips, 3 Mason 378, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,555; In re Heath, 12 R. I. 479; Church v. Church, 15 R. I. 138, 23 Atl. 302.

Under the present statute, if there is an expression, in a gift to two or more persons, of an intention that they shall take as joint tenants, the estate granted will be a joint tenancy and not a tenancy in common. Industrial Trust Co. v. Scanlon, 26 R. I. 228, 3 Ann. Cas. 863, 58 Atl. 786.

37. SOUTH CAROLINA.

The South Carolina statute abolishes survivorship in joint tenancies in the following terms: "Where any person shall be, at the time of his or her death, seized or possessed of any estate in joint tenancy, the same shall be adjudged to be severed by the death of the joint tenant, and shall be distributable as if the same were a tenancy in common." (Civil Code, § 2473.) Haughabaugh v. Hon-

Dec. 548; McMeekin v. Brummet, 2 Hill Eq. 639. The foregoing statute is a re-enactment of an Act of 1791, known as the Primogeniture Act. See Haughabaugh v. Honald, 3 Brev. 97.

The death of one joint tenant severs the joint tenancy, under the statute, and there is no jus accrescendi in favor of the surviving joint tenant or tenants. McMeekin v. Brummet, 2 Hill Eq. 638, wherein it was said: "As I have said the limitation is to the sons jointly, there is nothing to make a tenancy in common, and there is no doubt but in England, if one had died before the determination of the contingency, the other would have taken the whole by survivorship, as indeed if one had died after the determination and when the property had vested in possession. But under our statute of 1791, providing 'that where any persons shall be, at the time of his or her death, seized or possessed of any estate in joint tenancy, the same shall be adjudged to be severed by the death of the joint tenant, and shall be distributed as if the same was a tenancy in common; and that in cases of intestacy, the personal estate of the intestate shall be distributed in the same manner as real estates are disposed of by this act,' I believe the construction of our courts has uniformly been, that any interest, of any sort, in which there may be a joint tenancy, shall be severed by the death of one joint tenant, and the share of the deceased to go to his legal representative."

Since the Act of 1781 relates to the case "where any person shall be, at the time of his or her death, seized or possessed of any estate in joint tenancy," it has no application to an interest which had not vested, and hence had not been "seized or possessed," by the owner or beneficiary of that interest before his death, and such a right will survive if it is such as, when vested, would have been the interest of a joint tenant at common law. Herbement v. Thomas, Cheves Eq. 21; Bunch v. Hurst, 3 Desaus. 273, 5 Am. Dec. 551; Ball v. Deas, 2 Strob. Eq. 24, 49 Am. Dec. 651; Telfair v. Howe, 3 Rich. Eq. 235, 55 Am. Dec. 637. In Ball v. Deas, supra, there was involved the construction of the following devise: "I give and bequeath all my estate, real and personal, to my sister Lydia Jane Waring, and her three children, John Ball Waring, Ann Simons Waring and Francis M. Waring, to their heirs and assigns," it appearing that Lydia Jane Waring, one of the devisees, died before the death of the testator. It was held that her share in the devise survived to the other named devisees. The court said: "The court of appeals held that the words above recited were such as would have created a joint tenancy at common law, one of the acknowledged incidents of which was that upon the death of any of the tenants, either before or after the vesting of the right, the survivors would take the whole. Our statutes have not altered the principle as acknowledged at the common law, where the interest has not vested. And therefore, as Mrs. Waring died before the testator, and consequently before the interest could have vested, the principle of the common law must apply, and the right of survivorship take effect." In Telfair v. Howe, 3 Rich. Eq. 235, 55 Am. Dec. 637, the court said: "The common-law institutions of property have undergone many mutations in the progress of ages. Some of its harsher and most inconvenient rules have been abolished by the legislative power: and others have been gradually and insensibly modified by the course of judicial decisions, and moulded so as better to conform to the convenience and sentiments of modern society. The most prominent and I may say the most odious feature or incident of this estate (the right of survivorship) which in almost every instance defeats the intention of the testator, was abolished by our Act of Assembly of 1791. The act did not abolish joint tenancy itself, but only this feature of the estate. It provided, in substance, that where two or more persons are seized or possessed of real or personal estate in joint tenancy, and one of them dies, the right of survivorship should not be allowed, but the share or interest of the deceased joint tenant should go to his heirs at law or legal representatives. This left the rules of the common law in force where the deceased tenant for life had not been seized or possessed in his lifetime. In Herbement v. Thomas, Cheves Eq. 21, the question turned upon the construction of the words 'seized or possessed,' which occur in the act. The testatrix had given a legacy to six persons (her nieces) in words which, at common law, would have constituted them joint tenants. It happened that some of the legatees had died in the lifetime of the testatrix: and the question was, whether the survivors took the whole legacy by virtue of the jus accrescendi, or whether the shares of the deceased joint legatees lapsed under the provisions of the Act of 1791 into the residuary estate. It was clear, that at common law, where a devise or bequest is given to two in joint tenancy, and the devise or bequest fail as to one, from its being originally void, or from its being revoked by the testator, or from the death of one of the devisees or legatees in the testator's life, the right of survivorship exists, and the survivor takes the whole as joint tenant. The decision of the court was that, as the will was ambulatory until the testatrix's death, and no right or title could vest in the legatees until that event had occurred, they could not be considered as having been 'possessed' of any estate under the will, and the case by a fair interpretation of the act could not be regarded as embraced within its provisions. This decision has recently been followed by that in Ball v. Deas, 2 Strob. Eq. 24, 49 Am. Dec. 651, where the same construction prevailed. The act may, therefore, be considered as having received a settled interpretation in this particular. The Act of 1791, therefore, does not conflict with the claims advanced by the appellants."

It has been held that a corporation cannot hold as a joint tenant. Telfair v. Howe, 3 Rich. Eq. 235, 55 Am. Dec. 637, wherein it was said: "But there is another insuperable impediment in the way of law and authority to the success of this appeal. The Bible Society of New York is a corporate body. It is clear that, by the principles of the common law, none but natural persons can take in joint tenancy. A corporation cannot take this estate, either jointly with another corporation, or with a natural person. The reason assigned in the early writers is, that they hold in different capacities and in different rights. Lord Coke, in his commentary upon the passage quoted in the circuit decree from Littleton, gives, very clearly, his views as to the reasons which gave rise to the distinction between natural persons and corporate bodies in this particular. He says: 'The etc. in the end of this section implieth, that so it is, if any body politic or corporate, be they regular as dead persons in law (whereof our author here speaketh) or secular: as if lands be given to two bishops, to have and to hold to them two and their successors: albeit the bishops were never any dead persons in law, but always of capacity to take, yet seeing that they take this purchase in their politic capacity, as bishops, they are presently tenants in common, because they are seized in several rights: for the one bishop is seized in the right of his bishoprick of the one moiety, and the other is seized in the right of his bishoprick of the other moiety, and so by several titles and in several capacities: whereas joint tenants ought to have it in one and the same right and capacity, and by one and the same joint title.' (Co. Litt. Lib. 3, cap. 4, § 296.) . . . A modern writer (2 Crabb on Real Prop. § 2311, m. p. 945) says, the Queen cannot hold an estate in joint tenancy. She is not seized in her natural capacity, but in her royal and politic capacity, in jure coronae, which cannot stand in jointure with the seizin of the subject in his natural capacity. He asserts the same doctrine in regard to all corporate bodies. I doubt very much, if a single case, either English or American, can be adduced, where a corporation or body politic has been held to be seized or possessed of an estate in joint tenancy."

38. SOUTH DAKOTA.

A South Dakota statute provides: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." (Statutes, § 3604.)

No decisions have been found interpreting this statute.

39. TENNESSEE.

A statute of Tennessee which was enacted in 1784 provides as follows: "In all estates, real and personal, held in joint tenancy, the part or share of any tenant dying shall not descend or go to the surviving tenant or tenants, but shall descend or be vested in the heirs, executors, or administrators, respectively, of the tenant so dying, in the same manner as estates held by tenancy in common." (Code, § 3677.)

The foregoing act has been held to be applicable to cases in which the interest of a joint tenant has not become vested as well as to cases in which he has actual possession. Strong v. Ready, 9 Humph. 168, where in the court considered the effect of the death of a joint devisee before the death of the testator, and held that the interest of such devisee went to his heirs and did not survive to the other joint devisees, survivorship having been abolished by the Act of 1784. In that case it was said: "The true principle, as we think, is, that the act is general, extending to all cases, as well by devise as by deed, and cuts down and destroys the common-law doctrine of survivorship. So that, upon the death of Claiborne, nothing survived to Rush, save the one-half, to which the devise in joint tenancy entitled him. This being the case, the legacy to Claiborne lapsed and remained undisposed of by the will, he having no issue, and, therefore, our Act of 1842, ch. 177, sec. 3, having no application to the case, the heirs of Claiborne cannot take the estate, because the survivorship being cut down at his death, it remained undevise, and as such descended to the heirs of the testator at his death."

40. TEXAS.

The Act of March 18, 1848 of Texas, provides as follows: "Where two or more persons hold an estate, real, personal or mixed, jointly, and one joint owner dies before severance, his interest in said joint estate shall not survive to the remaining joint owner or joint owners, but shall descend to, and be vested in, the heirs or legal representatives of such deceased joint owner in the same manner as if his interest had been severed and ascertained." (Sayles' Tex. Civ. Stats. art. 2471.)

The practical effect of that act has been to abolish the distinctions between joint tenancy and tenancy in common and to reduce all cotenancies to tenancies in common. Ross v. Armstrong, 25 Tex. Supp. 354, 78 Am. Dec. 574; Pilcher v. Kirk, 55 Tex. 208. In the case first cited, the court said: "By our law, the leading distinctive characteristics of those several kinds of estates have been abolished. By the Act of the 28th January, 1840, the right of survivorship between joint tenants was abolished, and it was provided that coparceners might maintain waste against each other. (Hart Dig. arts. 588, 589.) And, although the latter provision was omitted in the Act of the 18th March, 1848 (O. & W. Dig. art. 344, et seq.), which was intended as a substitute for the former law and repealed it, I apprehend the legislation upon the subject would not warrant the supposition that it was intended to preserve the common-law distinctions between an estate in coparcenary and other estates in joint ownership. . . . The effect of these provisions seems to be to destroy the numerous and important distinctions which existed between these several kinds of estates at the common law, and for all practical purposes to reduce them to one estate, namely, an estate in common, with, however, the rights and remedies that appertained to tenants in coparcenary at the common law. This is in harmony with the comparative simplicity of our law of realty in other respects, and is a great improvement upon the former state of the law. The refined and artificial distinctions which existed at the common law were calculated only to perplex and embarrass, without producing any corresponding benefits." In Pilcher v. Kirk, 55 Tex. 208, it was said: "All distinctions between the several tenancies known at common law have been destroyed by statute, and, for all practical purposes, are now in this state reduced to the same estate, namely, an estate in common, or part owners, unaffected by the technical rules of the common law."

41. UTAH.

The following statutory provisions are in effect in Utah. "Every interest in real estate granted or devised to two or more persons, in their own right, shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared in the grant or devise to be otherwise." (Comp. Laws, § 1973.) "A devise or legacy given to more than one person vests in them as owners in common." (Comp. Laws, § 2800.)

No judicial construction of these sections has been found.

42. VERMONT.

The provisions of the Vermont statute of 1797 are: "Conveyances and devises of lands, whether for years, for life or in fee, made to two or more persons, shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it is expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall take the lands jointly, or as joint tenants, or in joint tenancy, or to them and the survivors of them; but this provision shall not apply to devises or conveyances made in trust, or made to husband and wife, nor to a conveyance in which it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy." (Pub. Stats. § 2566.)

The foregoing statute was passed as an expression of the modern tendency in favor of tenancy in common, and in order to protect the individual interests of cotenants. Spencer v. Austin, 38 Vt. 258; wherein it was said by the court: "And among the incidents attending a joint tenancy is the doctrine or right of survivorship which does not exist in tenancy in common. The ancient English law was apt in its constructions of conveyances to favor joint tenancy rather than tenancy in common; but joint tenancies, for a long period of time, have been and still are regarded with so little favor in England and in this country, both in courts of law and equity, that whenever the expressions will import an intention in favor of a tenancy in common, such effect will be given to them. Our legislature, for the purpose of protecting the several interests of persons in the same land, and guarding them against the incidents attending a joint tenancy and the injustice which might result therefrom, has declared that all conveyances and devises of lands made to two or more persons (except conveyances and devises made in trust, or made to husband and wife) shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall take the lands jointly, or as joint tenants, or in joint tenancy, or to them and the survivors of them, or unless it shall manifestly appear from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy. G. S. ch. 64, §§ 2 and 3."

In the absence of an expressed intention to create a joint tenancy, a grant of an estate in land to two or more persons creates a tenancy in common by virtue of the statute. Gilman v. Morrill, 8 Vt. 74; Lamb v. Clark,

29 Vt. 273. In the case last cited the court construed a deed whereby the grantor conveyed lands to his two sisters. It was said: "It is insisted that under that conveyance, the grantees took an estate in joint tenancy, and that upon the decease of Priscilla Lamb, which took place in March, 1851, the title to the whole premises vested in the plaintiff in severalty, by right of survivorship. Such would be the effect at common law, if a joint tenancy was created by that deed. The Comp. Stat. p. 382, secs. 2, 3, however, provides that all conveyances made to two or more persons shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy unless it be expressed therein that the grantees shall take the land as joint tenants. It is also provided that the act shall not extend to conveyances where from the instrument a trust estate is created. There is certainly in this case no expressed intention to create a joint tenancy, and in no sense can this deed be regarded as a conveyance of these premises in trust. The premises were not conveyed to the grantees to hold in trust for the use and benefit of the grantor or of any other parties, but the use is expressly declared to be for the benefit of the grantees forever. The provision that the grantees shall pay the just debts of their grantor may operate as a defeasance or as a condition subsequent and their title to the land may be defeated, possibly, by a refusal to pay the debts; but the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is not created by that deed. It is a matter, therefore, of express provision in the statute, that the grantees in that deed take an estate as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants."

The statute has no application to estates in personal property, however, and instruments creating cotenancies in such property are construed as at common law. Gilbert v. Richards, 7 Vt. 203, wherein the court said: "The inquiry in the present case is, whether the testatrix intended to constitute the three sisters joint tenants, or tenants in common. If they were joint tenants, the jus accrescendi attaches by the operation of the law; and we are not at liberty to disregard the intention ascertained by the rules of law applicable to the case, for fear of consequences. If they were joint tenants, it is immaterial whether one or more of the legatees died before or after the death of the testatrix, the survivor at the death of the testatrix takes the whole. Among the rules laid down, we find none better established or more fully recognized than this, that when a legacy is given to two or more, and there are no words of severance, it is held to be a joint tenancy, subject, however, to certain exceptions; and although it is true, that courts will lay hold of almost any words to make a tenancy in common where it is manifestly for the interest of the legatees, yet if there are no such expressions they must consider that a joint tenancy was intended. Now I do not know that we are at liberty to disregard the rules of common law on this subject upon principles of policy, or to say that they are contrary to the genius of our government; nor do I know that they are contrary either to policy or the genius of our government. If our legislature has altered the doctrine of the common law upon this subject in relation to real estate, a court may not go further, and alter it also in relation to any other estate. The legitimate rule upon this subject would be, that if the legislature has altered the common law in relation to real estate, and not as to personal, they were satisfied with the law as it was, in regard to personal estate. Words, by the common law, are construed to create an estate in joint tenancy, rather than in common; because it is considered as most beneficial to the tenants, and therefore they shall take a joint estate rather than an estate in common, unless words are introduced to manifest an intention to the contrary. And here, for the same reason, it is enacted that the same words shall constitute a tenancy in common. But the statute has gone no further, and has adopted no such principles for the construction of wills or other conveyances of personal estate."

By reason of the rule announced in the preceding paragraph, a bequest of personalty to two or more persons creates in them a joint tenancy with a right of survivorship, unless there is an expression of an intention to create a tenancy in common. Gilbert v. Richards, 7 Vt. 203; Decamp v. Hall, 42 Vt. 483.

43. VIRGINIA.

Survivorship between joint tenants was abolished in Virginia by the Act of 1787, which appears in substance in the present code as follows: "When any joint tenant shall die, whether the estate be real or personal, or whether partition could have been compelled or not, his part shall descend to his heirs, or pass by devise, or go to his personal representative, subject to debts, curtesy, dower, or distribution, as if he had been a tenant in common. And if hereafter any estate, real or personal, be conveyed or devised to a husband and his wife, they shall take and hold the same by moieties in like manner as if a distinct moiety had been given to each by a separate conveyance." (Code 1849, p. 502, c. 116, § 18, now Code, § 2430.)

That statute has no application to cases in which the estate in joint tenancy has not vested, and therefore where one of two or more joint devisees dies before the death of the testator, the share of the deceased passes to the survivor or survivors. Lockhart v. Vandyke, 97 Va. 356, 33 S. E. 613.

It appears that the estate of joint tenancy still exists in Virginia, though in spite of the fact that it has been stripped of its distinguishing characteristic, the jus accrescendi, for in Lockhart v. Vandyke, 97 Va. 356, 33 S. E. 613, the court said: "The law of the subject under consideration is discussed with a great wealth of learning by Mr. William Green in an appendix to the volume just cited [Pendleton v. Hoopes, Wythe 94] which is quoted in terms of high and deserved approbation in Freeman on Co-Tenancy and Partition, secs. 28 and 40. He reaches the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Minor, and shows that the common-law doctrine is still the law, notwithstanding our statute which abolishes the survivorship among joint tenants. With respect to that statute, he observes that, while it does away with the right of survivorship, it does not destroy joint tenancy. To use his own language: 'It does not annihilate the legal entity called a joint estate, so as to prevent any such estate from vesting, nor does it destroy the joint estate forthwith after it has vested. On the contrary, it permits the estate to subsist as joint, with all its former incidents, during the joint lives of all its owners; and if, in that time, partition be made, or a severance effected without partition, it is quiescent as a dead letter. It begins to operate at all, only when one of the joint tenants has died before partition or severance. And on the happening of that event, and from thenceforth, it directs that the part of the deceased shall be considered as if he had been a tenant in common, not from the beginning, but only when the event to which it refers happened. Where it applies, and to the extent of its application, it operates, in articulo mortis, a statutory severance; and that is all. It does not extirpate the quality of a joint estate, which make it produce, among other fruits, the jus accrescendi, but only destroys in the moment of production, or blights by anticipation in the bloom, that particular fruit. In this manner it modifies the nature of a joint tenancy by the common law, so far as to take away one of the incidents which the law has annexed to it, but leaves it in all other respects as it was. In short, since the statute, joint tenants seem to have an estate that is to all purposes joint, both in its inception and also in its continuance, until a destruction or severance thereof takes place; which latter, where an interest has become vested, is effectuated by the statute at the moment any of them dies, to the extent of his part; and henceforth that part is to be regarded as it would have been (though the statute had never been enacted) if the joint estate had been to the same extent dissevered by any of the means which theretofore existed. And, if this be the sum of its efficacy, the consequence seems to be, that in regard to the lapsing of devises and legacies, and also in regard to the vesting of estates created or transferred by conveyances inter vivos, it has been productive of no change whatever."

In a case decided in 1798, it was held, without any reference to the statute, that an inclusive patent of lands to a father and his three sons created a joint tenancy therein. Jones v. Jones, 1 Call. (Va.) 458.

44. WASHINGTON.

The Washington statute provides as follows: "If partition be not made between joint tenants, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivors, but descend, or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts and other legal charges, or transmissible to executors or administrators, and be considered, to every intent and purpose, in the same view as if such deceased joint tenants had been tenants in common: Provided, that community property shall not be affected by this section." (L. '86, P. 165, § 1; 1 H. C. § 1483.)"

It has been held that where two married men take out a patent for lands from the United States, they hold the lands as tenants in common and not as joint tenants with the right of survivorship. Stone v. Marshall, 52 Wash. 375, 100 Pac. 858.

45. WEST VIRGINIA.

The West Virginia statute is as follows: "When any joint tenant shall die, whether the estate be real or personal, or whether partition could have been compelled or not, his part shall descend to his heirs or pass by devise, or go to his personal representative, subject to debts, curtesy, dower or distribution, as if he had been a tenant in common. And if hereafter an estate of inheritance be conveyed or devised to a husband and his wife, one moiety of such estate shall, on the death of either, descend to his or her heirs, subject to debts, curtesy or dower, as the case may be." (Code, § 3037.)

That statute abolished survivorship in joint tenancies. McNeeley v. South Penn Oil Co. 52 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L.R.A. 562.

An expression of a manifest intention to create a joint tenancy with survivorship will, however, be given effect under the statute. Greenbrier Bank v. Effingham, 51 W. Va. 267, 41 S. E. 143, wherein it was held that where two persons in a joint deed gave to a third person all the personal property that they should have at the time of their death and reserved to themselves the use and control thereof "so long as they both shall live," the reservation created in them a joint tenancy with survivorship. The court said: "The common-law rule of joint tenancy has been changed by section 18, chapter 71, Code, but it is expressly provided in section 19 that such change should not apply 'when it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended that the part of the one dying should then belong to the survivor.' Had the grantors intended otherwise, it was easy to have so provided. The instrument speaks so plainly when it says: 'The party of the first part (being both the grantors) to have full use and control of all their personal property so long as they both shall live,' it is hard to see how it is possible to claim it is so ambiguous as to justify extraneous evidence in explanation thereof. The language used admits and creates a joint tenancy pure and simple not only at common law, but under the provisions of the statute referred to above."

It has been held that if there is a devise to two or more persons jointly and one of them dies before the testator, leaving issue who survive the testator, his share will not in that event go to the surviving joint tenant, but will go to such issue of the deceased joint tenant as survive the testator; but that if the predeceased devisee dies without issue living at the death of the testator then the devise inures to the surviving devisee or devisees. Hoke v. Hoke, 12 W. Va. 427.

46. WISCONSIN.

The Wisconsin statute provides as follows: "All grants and devises of lands made to two or more persons, except as provided in the following section, shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy." And section 2069 provides that "the preceding section shall not apply to mortgages, nor to devises, or grants made in trust, or made to executors, or to husband and wife." (Stats. 1898, § 2068; which was R. S. 1849, c. 56, § 43.)

That statute abolishes joint tenancies except where the tenancy is expressly declared to be in joint tenancy. Bassler v. Rewodlinski, 130 Wis. 26, 109 N. W. 1032, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 701.

The statute has no application to conveyances by way of mortgage, since they are expressly excepted, and a mortgage to two or more makes them joint tenants as at common law, unless there is something in the instrument to show an intent to make a tenancy in common. Fiedler v. Howard, 99 Wis. 388, 75 N. W. 163, 67 Am. St. Rep. 865.

The statute does not apply to personality, so where a man makes his wife and daughter beneficiaries in a policy of insurance, they take as joint tenants and on the death of one her interest survives to the other. Farr v. Grand Lodge, etc. 83 Wis. 446, 53 N. W. 738, 35 Am. St. Rep. 73, 18 L.R.A. 249, wherein the court said: "This leads us to the consideration of our own statute on the subject of joint tenants. Our statute (sec. 2068, R. S.) provides that 'all grants and devises of lands made to two or more persons, except as provided in the following section, shall be construed to create estates in common and not in joint tenancy, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy.' The following section is that 'the preceding section shall not apply to mortgages, nor to devises or grants made in trust, or made to executors or to husband and wife.' It will be seen that our statute makes many important exceptions, which save the doctrine of the common law in respect to the subjects named. This shows at least that there is nothing in our principles of government or policies of law opposed to the principle or doctrine of survivorship in joint tenancy in such cases. We are more immediately concerned with joint tenancy in devises. On the principle of analogy, if devises to joint tenants with the jus accrescendi are lawful, so are legacies of personalties. They are substantially alike, and within the same reason, and they have been decided to be within the doctrine of the common law. . . . We may say, therefore, that legacies come within the exceptions of our statute, and that, when made to two joint legatees, without any words to indicate a severance of their interests, if one die, the survivor takes the whole legacy. The analogy between legacies and the benefits secured by a certificate or policy of a benefit insurance company or of a common life insurance company when the insurance is payable to two or more persons jointly on the death of the assured, is still closer. The assured, like a testator, makes provision in writing for his wife and children, to be enjoyed on his death. He can change the direction of his bounty during his life. So far as the doctrine of joint tenancy and survivorship are concerned, they are strictly within the same reason. . . . And so we conclude that this insurance in joint tenancy with the right of survivorship is within the exception of our own statute, in analogy to devises, and that the doctrine of the common law governs it."

ALLEN ET AL.

ALMY ET AL.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—
December 20, 1913.

87 Conn. 517; 89 Atl. 205.

Wills — Construction in Favor of Vesting of Estate.

The law favors a testamentary construction which vests the estate.

Construction in Favor of Validity.

If one construction of a will will make a bequest illegal as a perpetuity, while another will render it valid, the latter will be accepted, if both constructions are permissible.

Construction of Term "Heirs."

In the absence of a contrary meaning shown by a will, the word "heirs" will be taken to be used in its primary meaning as designating those who, in the absence of a will, are entitled by law to inherit a decedent's realty.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1914B 70; Ann. Cas. 1915D 1178.]

Time as of Which Heirship is Determined.

Where a testamentary limitation over is to the heirs of testator, that class is determined as of testator's death, in the absence of an intention to the contrary shown by the will.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1917A 859.]

Same.

A will, after devising the property in trust for the life use of testator's widow in a third thereof, directed that the property be divided into certain equal parts, and gave three of such parts to trustees to hold the same and pay the income to testator's daughter during her life, "and at her decease to pay over and deliver the same to her issue; but in case of her death leaving no issue surviving her, then to my heirs at law, exclusive of my said daughter." Held, that the words "heirs at law" in the quoted part referred to those who were testator's heirs at his death, viz., his five children.

Language Importing Gift — "Pay Over and Deliver."

A provision of a will, that the testamentary trustees should "pay over and deliver" the property to a daughter's issue at her death, imports a gift.

Estate Created — Executory Devise.

Under a will giving a sum in trust to pay the income to testator's daughter, and at her death to pay over and deliver the same to her issue, but, if she died without surviving issue, then to testator's "heirs at law exclusive of my said daughter," the heirs take a vested interest by way of executory devise defeasible in the contingency of issue named; the limitation over having a double aspect, and vesting alternative remainders with conditions subsequent.

Perpetuities — Defeasible Remainder.

A provision giving property in trust for a daughter for life, and at her death to pay over the same to her issue, but, if she left none surviving, then to testator's heirs at law, does not violate the statute against perpetuities; the remainders over vesting at testator's death, though defeasible in the contingency named.

Estates — Joint Tenancy or Tenancy in Common.

The law prefers to construe a gift to several as creating a tenancy in common instead of a joint tenancy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

At common law the doctrine of survivorship as between joint tenants is repudiated in Connecticut.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

While a testamentary gift will be construed as creating a tenancy in common rather than a joint tenancy, unless a different intention appears in the will, the intention disclosed by the instrument will govern, whichever it creates.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A will devising certain shares of the estate to trustees to pay the income to testator's daughter for life, and at her death to pay over and deliver the same to her issue, but, if she should die without surviving issue, then to testator's heirs at law, does not, by the intention disclosed, rebut the presumption that the heirs at law took as tenants in common rather than as joint tenants.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Even at common law provisions of an instrument which contemplated a division of property were construed to create a tenancy in common rather than a joint tenancy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Case reserved from Superior Court, New London county: SHUMWAY, Judge.

Action by Wm. H. Allen et al., plaintiffs, against John T. Almy, executor, et al., defendants. Case reserved by Superior Court for decision of Supreme Court of Errors. DECREE CONSTRUING WILL.

[519] Lorenzo Blackstone, late of Norwich, died in 1888, leaving a widow and five children, to wit, J. DeTrafford, William N., Louis L., Frances E., married to Frederick J. Huntington, and Harriet, married to Frederick S. Camp.

By his will he disposed of all the residue and remainder of his estate, after the satisfaction of certain bequests and legacies, and subject to a trust for the life use of his widow in one third thereof, by directing its division into eighteen equal parts or shares, and disposing of those parts. Four of them he gave absolutely to his son William, one to DeTrafford, two to Louis, and one and one half parts to Mrs. Camp. The remaining parts were given to trustees to hold, three of them for the life use of DeTrafford, two of them for the life use of Louis, one and one half of them for the life use of Mrs. Camp, and three of them for the life use of Mrs. Huntington, with a limitation over in each case. The testator dealt with the one third in which his widow was given a life interest in a different paragraph of the will from that in which he disposed of the two thirds in which such life use was not reserved; but the practical effect was as stated.

The language defining the trust and the limitation over was in each instance the same. That which related to the share left for the life benefit of Mrs. Huntington reads as follows: "To said Edward N. Gibbs and George D. Coit, three of said shares, in trust, to receive and hold the same, and to pay over the net income arising therefrom, after deducting legal costs and charges from time to time, to my daughter Frances E. Blackstone, during her life, and at her decease to pay over and deliver the same to her issue; but in case of her death leaving no issue surviving her, then to my heirs at law exclusive of my said daughter."

The widow died in 1896. DeTrafford died in 1898, [520] leaving a widow, now deceased, and one son, who died in 1905, without issue. William died in 1907, leaving a widow, now living, but no issue. Louis died in 1892, leaving two children, now living. Mrs. Huntington died January 13th, 1912, leaving a husband, but no issue. Executors of the wills or administrators upon the estates of all of these deceased children of the testator and of the testator himself are parties to this action. Mrs. Camp survives, as do her three children.

The estate in the hands of the trustees forming the trust fund created by the will for the benefit of Mrs. Huntington consists of about $200,000 in money and securities. It is this fund which is the subject-matter of this action. The Superior Court is asked to give its advice in answer to the following questions relating to its disposition: "1. To whom and in what amounts shall the present trustees pay over said trust funds? 2. What is the meaning of the expression 'heirs at law' in the provision relating to the final disposition of said trust funds after the death of said Frances E. Blackstone without issue, and are the persons thus described the heirs at law of the testator at his decease or at the decease of the cestui que trust? 3. Can this expression 'heirs at law' in this connection be construed as meaning children and if so is the reference to children living at the time of the testator's death or at the decease of the cestui que trust? 4. In the attempted final disposition of the principal of the several trust funds left for the benefit, during life, of the children of the testator, to wit: J. DeTrafford Blackstone, Louis L. Blackstone, Hattie B. Camp and Frances E. Blackstone, upon their decease, without issue, is there a violation of the statute against perpetuities existing at the time of the testator's death and if so to whom are said funds of the trust created for the benefit of the said Frances E. Blackstone now payable?"

[521] Certain of the parties contend that the gift over "to my heirs at law" exclusive of "my said daughter" is void as contravening the statute against perpetuities, and that the remainder thus attempted to be disposed of is intestate estate of the testator.

The children of Louis contend that the limitation over is to the heirs at law of the testator to be determined as of the time of Mrs. Huntington's death, and that such disposition was not repugnant to the statute against perpetuities properly construed. The claim in their behalf is that they are, between them, entitled to one half of the fund, and Mrs. Camp to the other half.

The representatives of Mrs. Huntington's deceased brothers claim that the gift over is a valid one to the heirs at law of the testator to be determined as of the time of his death, and that the estate of each of the deceased brothers is entitled to one fourth of the fund, Mrs. Camp being entitled to the remaining one fourth.

Mrs. Camp concurs with the representatives of her deceased brothers in claiming that the limitation over was not in contravention of the statute for the reasons urged by them, but says that it was a gift to a class with the incident of survivorship, so that she, as the sole survivor of the class, is entitled to receive the whole fund.

[522] PRENTICE, C. J.—"The law favors vested estates." Connecticut Trust, etc. Co. v. Hollister, 74 Conn. 228, 231, 50 Atl. 750; Carpenter v. Perkins, 83 Conn. 11, 17, 74 Atl. 1062. "If two modes of construction are fairly open, one of which will turn a bequest into an illegal perpetuity, while by following the other it will be valid and operative, the latter mode must be preferred." Wolfe v. Hatheway, 81 Conn. 181, 185, 70 Atl. 645; Nicoll v. Irby, 83 Conn. 530, 534, 77 Atl. 957. "The word 'heirs,' in its primary meaning, designates those who in the absence of a will are by law entitled to inherit the real estate of a deceased." Nicoll v. Irby, 83 Conn. 530, 534, 77 Atl. 957; Perry v. Bulkley, 82 Conn. 158, 168, 72 Atl. 1014. "This is the meaning which is to be given to it in the construction and interpretation of wills, unless, when read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the testator, it clearly appears from the will itself that he used the words in a different meaning." Hartford Trust Co. v. Purdue, 84 Conn. 256, 258, 79 Atl. 581; Wilde v. Bell, 86 Conn. 610, 614, 87 Atl. 8. This is the rule of general recognition. Gardner, in his work on Wills, p. 447, states the pertinent phase of it as follows: "Where the limitation over is to the heirs of the testator, this class is determined as of the death of the testator, in the absence of a testamentary intent to the contrary." To the same effect, see Page on Wills, § 547. We adopted and applied this principle in Johnson v. Webber, 65 Conn. 501, 512, 33 Atl. 506.

This will furnishes no indication that the testator used the words "my heirs at law" in any other than their usual and normal signification. The only side light thrown upon the subject is that drawn from the [523] provision in connection with each of the limitations over, which excludes from the class entitled to share in the remainder the child who had enjoyed the life use. Evidently those whom he had described as his heirs at law in this connection were represented in his mind by the group as it should be when he should die—children presumably—and not by some group of uncertain size and membership which might be formed in the years during which some one of his children might be expected to live.

These recognized principles and conditions lead inevitably to the conclusion that the heirs at law designated by the testator as the recipients of the gift over in the event that Mrs. Huntington should die without issue were those who stood in that relation to him at his death, to wit, his five children. The language of the will, that the property should be paid over and delivered, imports a gift. Angus v. Noble, 73 Conn. 56, 64, 46 Atl. 278; Johnson v. Webber, 65 Conn. 501, 513, 33 Atl. 506.

The limitation over to them and each of them created a vested interest in the sense that each took an estate which was alienable and transmissible by inheritance. It does not militate against this result that the vesting in enjoyment was postponed to some uncertain and future time, or that such vesting might be entirely defeated by the happening of the event that Mrs. Huntington should die leaving issue. The limitation over was one with a double aspect. Thomas v. Castle, 76 Conn. 447, 451, 56 Atl. 854; Sumner v. Westcott, 86 Conn. 217, 220, 84 Atl. 921. The donees of the remainder, in the event of the life tenant's death without issue, took a vested interest, defeasible in the contingency named. Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 77 Conn. 408, 410, 59 Atl. 413; Perry v. Bulkley, 82 Conn. 158, 169, 72 Atl. 1014; Carpenter v. Perkins, 83 Conn. 11, 17, 74 [524] Atl. 1062; Sumner v. Westcott, 86 Conn. 217, 220, 84 Atl. 921.

Testamentary provisions creating such limitations over vesting in interest immediately upon the death of the testator are not in contravention of the statute against perpetuities. See cases last cited.

The gift over to the heirs at law was one to a class in the sense that it was one to a group of persons designated, not by name, but by some general descriptive term. Mrs. Camp reasons from this that the members of the group or class took as joint tenants, and therefore with the incident of survivorship attached to their estates. This contention assumes two aspects, one as to the nature of the estate which vested in the heirs, and the other as to the incidents of that estate if found to be that of a joint tenancy.

Our law prefers a tenancy in common to a joint tenancy. Bill v. Payne, 62 Conn. 140, 142, 25 Atl. 354. In this respect we differ from the common law which favored joint tenancies. 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 193. "There may be joint tenancies in this State, but survivorship as an incident thereto has never been recognized here. There is here practically no difference between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common. Each tenant is seized of an undivided share of the whole, proportioned to the number of tenants, as was the case at common law in tenancies in common. But at the common law, in the case of a joint tenancy, each tenant is seized of the whole as well as of every part—per my et per tout—and it is to this seizin by each of the entirety that the incident of survivorship is due. Upon the death of one, the other or others remain seized of the whole. In this State, therefore, there can be no joint tenancy with the right of survivorship, unless such right is created by the will or other conveyance creating the tenancy. Whether it can be so created, we need not [525] in this case inquire." Houghton v. Brantingham, 86 Conn. 630, 636, 86 Atl. 664. As far back as 1769 the common-law doctrine of survivorship as between joint tenants was repudiated in this State. Phelps v. Jepson, 1 Root (Conn.) 48, 1 Am. Dec. 33.

The difference in the degree of favor with which joint tenancies and tenancies in common were recognized at common law, and are recognized with us, is one which carries with it important consequences in the determination of the character of the estate created where grants or gifts are made to several persons or to a class without other indication, or with only doubtful indication of the nature of the estate intended to be created. In the one case the presumption, in the absence of explanatory language manifesting the intent, would be naturally and logically in favor of joint tenancies, and in the other in favor of tenancies in common. And so we find that, while the rule of the common law was that a grant or gift to a class imported prima facie that it was to the members of the class as joint tenants, that principle, in those jurisdictions where, as with us, tenancies in common are favored, is reversed, and the presumption is one in favor of tenancies in common. The gift or grant will, in other words, be construed as creating a tenancy in common, unless a different intention on the part of the grantor or testator appears by the instrument of conveyance or will. 2 Underhill on Wills, § 539. The intention, however, if discoverable, will, of course, govern.

In the present instance there is nothing, either in the context, the nature of the gift, or the circumstances, to overcome the presumption that the heirs at law took as tenants in common. On the contrary, it is scarcely conceivable that the testator intended any other result from his gift than that his heirs at law, exclusive of the child benefited by the life use, should take the estate to [526] be at once divided between them. It is plain that the testator had no thought of providing for anything save an ownership in severalty through a distribution made immediately upon the vesting in possession and enjoyment of the remainder over to the heirs at law. Provisions looking to a division have always, even under the common-law rule, been regarded as sufficient to create a tenancy in common. Perkins v. Baynton, 1 Bro. C. C. (Eng.) 118; Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. (Eng.) 165, 166; Delafield v. Shipman, 103 N. Y. 463, 9 N. E. 184; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. 363, 366.

As there is nothing in the will to create a joint tenancy in the heirs of the testator, we have no occasion to consider, further than we have already incidentally done, the claimed incident of survivorship.

The Superior Court is advised that by the expression "heirs at law," as used in the provision relating to the final disposition, upon the death of Frances E. Blackstone without issue, of the trust estate held for her benefit during her life, contained in paragraphs fourth and fifth of the will, is meant the heirs at law of the testator determined as of the time of his decease; that Wallace S. Allis, as administrator d. b. n. of the estate of J. DeTrafford Blackstone, John T. Almy, as executor of the will of William N. Blackstone, William H. Allen, as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. of the estate of Louis L. Blackstone, and Mrs. Harriet B. Camp, are each entitled to receive from the trustees of said trust estate a one-fourth part thereof; and that the third and fourth questions upon which advice is asked are to be answered in the negative.

No costs in this court will be taxed in favor of any of the parties.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that by a gift to several persons designated as members of a class and not by name, they take as tenants in common and not as joint tenants. The nature of the estate resulting from the creation of a cotenancy is treated in the note to Withers v. Barnes, reported ante, this volume, at page 55.

WOOD

v.

LOGUE ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—November 25, 1914.

167 Iowa 436; 149 N. W. 613.

Deeds — Interpretation — Inconsistency of Granting and Habendum Clauses.

While, if a deed clearly and by apt terms grants a title in fee simple, any limitation thereof in the habendum clause repugnant to or inconsistent with the estate so created is void, yet, in determining the intent the whole deed is to be looked to, and the granting clause, being merely "sell and convey . . . undivided one-third interest," and intention to create a joint tenancy with right of survivorship clearly appearing from the deed in its entirety, it is to be given that effect.

[See 8 Ann. Cas. 444; 111 Am. St. Rep. 772.]

Estates — Creation — Joint Tenancy or Tenancy in Common.

An estate of joint tenancy may be created by apt words; Code, § 2923, merely providing that a conveyance to several persons creates a tenancy in common, "unless a contrary intent is expressed."

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A deed clearly showing intent to create a joint tenancy between the grantor and grantees, and by the last clause providing that the one of them last dying is to be the absolute owner of the property, the use of the word "inherit," with reference to acquirement by survivors of the title of one dying, will be considered merely an inaccurate application of it to acquirement of title by survivorship.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A provision in a deed by which the owner of land conveys to each of two sisters a third interest in it that, while all three may occupy it as a home so long as they remain unmarried, one of them marrying, may not longer so occupy it, is not inconsistent with a joint tenancy so as to prevent the deed creating one. It does no more than provide a contingency on which such tenancy shall cease.

[See note at end of this case.]

Joint Tenancy — Survivorship — Rights of Creditors of Deceased.

On the death of the first of joint tenants, her creditors have no rights in the property as against the survivors, who take not from her, but directly from the grantor in the deed creating the tenancy.

Appeal from District Court, Mahaska county: WILLCOCKSON, Judge.

Action by Jerome Wood, administrator, plaintiff, against Alice Logue et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Irving C. Johnson for appellants.

Reynolds & David for appellee.

[437] WEAVER, J.—On December 3, 1908, Daniel Logue, being the owner of a certain forty acres of land in Mahaska county, executed and delivered to his two sisters, Sarah Logue and Alice Logue, a deed, the material part of which reads as follows:

Know all men by these presents: That I, Daniel H. Logue (single), of the county of Mahaska and state of Iowa, in consideration of the sum of one dollar in hand paid, do hereby sell and convey unto Sarah Logue the undivided one-third interest in the property hereinafter described. I do hereby sell and convey unto Alice Logue the undivided one-third interest in the following described premises, situated and lying in the state of Iowa, Mahaska county, to wit: The northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 22, township 75, range 16 west of the fifth P. M. It is agreed between the grantor and the grantees named in the deed that they all have the right to occupy the property so long as they remain single. If the grantor or either one of the grantees get married, the ones that are married cannot occupy the property, without the consent of those that are not married, so long as the grantor and grantees remain single, they can occupy the property as a house free of rent. In case of the death of the grantor, the grantees are to inherit the undivided one-third interest of the grantor, and in case of one of the grantees dying first, the grantor and the surviving grantee are to inherit that portion of the property that is owned by the grantor and grantee that are deceased. It is understood between the grantor and grantees herein that the one dying last is to be the absolute owner of the property herein described, and he or she may dispose of the entire property by will or in any other way that he or she may desire.

[438] In June, 1911, Sarah Logue died intestate, survived by both Daniel and Alice. The plaintiff is the duly appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased, and, acting upon the theory that his intestate died seised of an undivided one-third of the land, he petitioned the court for an order authorizing him to sell the same for the payment of debts and charges allowed against the estate. The petition sets out the deed by which it is alleged that such title was acquired, and avers that the conditions and stipulations following the granting clause are void and of no effect upon the character or quality of the title conveyed. Daniel Logue and Alice Logue, being made defendants, appeared, and demurred to the petition on the ground variously stated that the deed shows upon its face that the interest, right, and title acquired thereunder by Sarah Logue were that of a joint tenant, and that upon her death the whole estate immediately vested in the defendants by right of survivorship. The court, holding with the plaintiff upon the question thus raised, overruled the demurrer, and, defendants electing to stand thereon, the order prayed for was granted, and the defendants appeal.

In support of the ruling below appellee invokes the rule that, where a deed clearly and by apt terms grants or conveys a title in fee simple, any limitations thereof in the habendum clause repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the estate so created is void and of no effect. Case v. Dwire, 60 Ia. 442, 15 N. W. 265; Teany v. Mains, 113 Ia. 53, 84 N. W. 953. Of the soundness of the rule thus stated there can be no doubt, but the more serious question is whether the deed before us presents a case for its application. If we were to look alone to the words "I hereby sell and convey unto Sarah Logue the undivided one-third interest in the property hereinafter described" as determinative of the nature and quality of the estate intended to be conveyed, the conclusion argued for by the appellee and reached by the trial court is inevitable. But such narrowness of construction is hardly consonant with that other well-settled principle [439] that, in construing a written instrument, the intention of the parties is to be looked for, and, when ascertained, is to be given effect, unless forbidden by some established rule of law. This rule of construction is no less applicable to deeds than to other instruments by which contract and property rights are created, limited, and defined. There is no rule which requires a court in construing a deed to read simply the technical words of grant, and shut its eyes to the meaning and effect of the habendum. Speaking upon this subject, we have said:

The repugnancy, to defeat the habendum, must be such that the intention of the parties cannot be ascertained from the whole instrument, or, if ascertained, cannot be carried into effect. If, from the entire instrument and attending circumstances, it appears that the grantor intended to enlarge, restrict, or even repugn the conveyancing clause, the habendum will control.

See Beedy v. Finney, 118 Ia. 278, 91 N. W. 1069, and cases there cited.

Referring to the same subject, the compiler of the article on "Deeds" in 13 Cyc. 618, after citing numerous authorities justifying his conclusion, says:

The strictness of the ancient rule as to repugnancy in deeds is much relaxed, so that in this, as in other, cases of construction, if clauses or parts are repugnant, the intention is to be gathered from the whole instrument, instead of from particular clauses.

This rule is too manifestly just to leave room for discussion, and we can conceive of no good reason for departing from it. If, then, upon examination of this deed in its entirety, both granting clause and subsequent clauses, it clearly appears that the parties intended to create a joint tenancy with right of survivorship, then there is no fatal repugnance in the terms of the instrument, and if such estate is not [440] forbidden by, or inconsistent with, the law of the state, it is the duty of the court to so declare and give it effect.

That an estate of joint tenancy may exist in this jurisdiction does not appear to be denied by counsel, and, indeed, could not well be. Estates of joint tenancy were well known at common law, and, though they have fallen into quite general disuse, are not entirely obsolete. Our Code, section 2923, which provides that conveyances to two or more persons in their own right create a tenancy in common, unless a contrary intent is expressed, is a reversal of the effect of such conveyances at common law; the rule there being that under a deed to two or more, no other intent being indicated, the grantees take as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common. The qualifying words in the statute cited, "unless a contrary intent is expressed," would seem therefore to leave place in the law of the state for a joint tenancy, with its characteristic incident of survivorship, if the intent of the parties to the instrument to create it is clearly indicated by the language employed.

The deed now before us is not drawn with the technical nicety and exactness which might have been used by a learned professional conveyancer, but it has the virtue not always present in even more formal instruments of so expressing the purpose of the parties thereto as to leave its intended effect too clear for doubt. It is very manifest that the paramount or general intent of the transaction which is thus evidenced is to make the grantees joint owners of the land with the grantor, and to provide for the right of survivorship between them, or, to use the language of the deed, "the one dying last is to be the absolute owner of the property, and he or she may dispose of the entire property by will or in any way he or she may desire." It is true the word "inherit" employed in the deed is not technically correct as applied to the acquirement of title by survivorship, but, when read in connection with the entire instrument, it is clear that it was so employed by these parties. To hold [441] otherwise is to give no force or effect whatever to the last and, in some respects, most significant provision of the deed.

If it be said the limitation upon the right of occupancy by either tenant who should thereafter marry is inconsistent with a joint tenancy at common law, the objection is sufficiently answered by the suggestion that this provision does no more than provide for a contingency upon the happening of which the joint tenancy should cease. What their respective rights in the premises might have been had one of them married, whether upon such happening they would all become tenants in common, or the interest of the marrying tenant in the property become entirely extinct, we need not here consider or decide. Even at common law it is within the power of either tenant to sever the joint character of the title by conveying or otherwise disposing of his right or share to a third person. 2 Blackstone's Com. 192; Robinson v. Codman, 1 Sumn. 121, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,970; Simpson v. Ammons, 1 Bin. (Pa.) 175, 2 Am. Dec. 425. It can also be severed by agreement. Williams v. Hensman, 7 Jur. N. S. 771, 5 L. T. N. S. 203.

The provision referred to in the deed before us may well be treated as an agreement between the parties by which, under certain circumstances, the unity of the tenancy should be considered severed. In this case no such severance occurred. Sarah Logue was the first of the tenants to die, and if the terms of the deed by which she acquired right in the property are valid, as we are disposed to hold, the brother and sister surviving may assert their title to the property as against her creditors. The survivors do not acquire title through the deceased, but by virtue of the deed. Before her death there was an equality and unity of right and title in the three tenants. Her death extinguished her right of survivorship, but left the unity of right and title unchanged in the other two tenants, and when one of them shall die, all rights of survivorship [442] provided for by the deed having become effective and having accomplished the intent of their creation, the joint tenancy will cease to exist, and the last survivor will be the sole and unqualified owner. As we have already suggested, neither of the successive survivors takes or receives anything from or through the deceased tenant for the title is derived directly from the grantor through the deed which created the tenancy. But, laying aside the question as to what name or designation we shall apply to the transaction between the grantor and grantees, what good reason can be assigned in law or equity for the courts refusing to give it effect according to its clear intent? This grantor, as the owner of the land, had a right to devote it by appropriate action on his part to the purpose of making a home for himself and his two sisters. He might very reasonably believe that such end could be more nearly attained, and the comfort and support of the successive survivors be better assured, by creating a unity of title with right of survivorship than by a tenancy in common with the ordinary incidents to such an estate. And this is what he appears to have done in the deed in controversy. Such a disposition of property is not obnoxious to any statute of this state or to any recognized principle of common law, nor can we conceive of a good reason for holding it to be against any accepted rule of public policy. The creation of such an estate being lawful, and the doctrine of Beedy v. Finney, above quoted, being adhered to, there is no fatal repugnancy in this deed. All parts of it must be given effect according to its plain intent. It follows that Sarah Logue, being first of the grantees to die, did not die seised of any heritable interest in the land or of any right or interest therein which could be properly subjected to sale by the administrator of her estate. None of the cases decided by this court and cited by appellee are inconsistent with this conclusion.

The court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the petition and in ordering a sale of the land, and said [443] order and judgment are therefore reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to dismiss the petition.

Reversed.

Ladd, C. J., and Evans and Preston, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that despite a statute providing that a conveyance to two or more shall create a tenancy in common "unless a contrary intent is expressed," a deed providing plainly though not in technical language for a right of survivorship creates a joint tenancy. The cases dealing with the nature of the estate resulting from the creation of a cotenancy are reviewed in the note to Withers v. Barnes, reported ante, this volume, at page 55.

ATTORNEY GENERAL EX REL. TREASURER AND RECEIVER GENERAL

v.

CLARK.

Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court—
November 29, 1915.

222 Mass. 291; 110 N. E. 299.

Estates — Creation of Joint Tenancy.

Where two sisters receive property by conveyance as joint tenants, and also make deposits in a savings bank for their joint use and benefit, and purchase certain securities which are issued to them as joint tenants, their estate includes the right of survivorship, and the estate in all the properties is a joint tenancy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Joint Tenancy — Termination.

A joint tenant may always terminate the joint tenancy by transfer or conveyance of his interest.

Joint Tenancy in Personality.

A joint tenancy is not confined to real estate, but may also exist in personal property.

Fraud — Creation of Joint Tenancy.

Where a joint tenancy is created by contract, it is prima facie for valuable consideration, and in the absence of fraud or showing of bad faith such an agreement is valid.

Same.

Evidence held to show that the creation of a joint tenancy in two sisters was in good faith and without fraud.

Taxation — Inheritance Tax — Property Subject — Estate Passing by Survivorship.

The share which a joint tenant takes in the property on the death of the other joint tenant does not pass by the laws regulating intestate succession, so as to be subject to an inheritance tax, since taxation laws must be strictly construed, and the statute does not in express terms authorize the taxation of the interest accruing to a surviving tenant upon termination of the joint tenancy.

Joint Tenancy — Survivorship — Nature of Devolution of Title.

Upon the death of one joint tenant, the other takes the whole estate, not by descent as the heir at law of the other, nor under the laws regulating intestate succession, but as the sole surviving tenant.

Case reserved from Supreme Judicial Court, Suffolk county.

Action by Attorney General on relation of Treasurer and Receiver General, plaintiff, against Mary M. Clark, executrix, defendant. Case reserved for decision by full court. The facts are stated in the opinion. DISMISSED.

Henry C. Attwill and Wm. Harold Hitchcock for plaintiff.

Geo. P. Drury for defendant.

[292] CROSEY, J.—This is an information in equity brought in the Supreme Judicial Court at the relation of the Treasurer and Receiver General under St. 1909, c. 490, Part, Part IV. as amended by St. 1912, c. 678, § 1, to recover a succession tax. The case comes before us on a reservation made by a single justice,* which contains the agreed facts and certain stipulations made by the parties.

The record shows the following facts: That Elizabeth M. Clark, the deceased, and Mary M. Clark, the defendant, were sisters living together in Waltham in this Commonwealth on the real estate hereinafter referred to; that these sisters, being tenants in common of the real estate so occupied by them, obtained title thereto by inheritance, and also by deed from a third heir; that on November 11, 1907, they conveyed the real estate to a third person, and on the same day their grantee reconveyed the estate to them as joint tenants; that at different times since November 11, 1907, these sisters purchased with funds, of which each of them contributed one half, certain securities consisting of stocks and bonds which were all issued to them as joint tenants. These securities were kept in their joint possession until the death of Elizabeth, since which time such possession has continued in Mary, the survivor. It is also agreed that on or about January 2, 1908, these sisters opened two accounts in the Springfield Institution for Savings, one in the name of "Either Elizabeth M. Clark or Mary M. Clark, or the survivor of either," and the other [293] in the name of "Either Mary M. Clark or Elizabeth M. Clark or the survivor of either." Each of them contributed one half of the total amounts so deposited, and there were no withdrawals "unless for their joint benefit." The total balance of these two deposits on September 10, 1912, the date of the death of Elizabeth M. Clark, was $1,623.56. The value of the real estate, securities and deposits having been agreed upon by the parties, it is the contention of the Attorney General that one half of the total amount of such value became taxable upon the decease of Elizabeth M. Clark, one of the joint owners.

1. There can be no doubt that, after the transfer of the real estate and the issuance of the securities to these sisters in the manner above described, they thereafter held and owned such real and personal estate as joint tenants with all the incidents which govern such a tenure, including that of survivorship; and we think that the same is true as to the deposits in the savings bank. The words of survivorship, employed when the deposits were made and thereafter were held by the bank, were apt and sufficient to create a joint tenancy, and such obviously was the intention of the parties, especially when considered in connection with the estate in joint tenancy created by them in the real estate and the securities. The record shows that no withdrawals were made unless for their joint benefit, and it fairly may be inferred from all the facts and attendant circumstances that it was agreed between the sisters that neither of them should withdraw any of the deposits except upon their joint account and for their mutual use and benefit. Nor is this conclusion affected by the fact that either might have withdrawn the deposits contrary to such an agreement and thereby have destroyed the joint tenancy. A joint tenant, as an incident of his tenure, always may terminate the joint tenancy by transfer or conveyance of his interest. A joint tenancy is not confined to real estate, but may exist also in personal property. Phelps v. Simons, 159 Mass. 415, 34 N. E. 657, 38 Am. St. Rep. 430; Boland v. McKowen, 189 Mass. 563, 76 N. E. 206, 109 Am. St. Rep. 663.

2. The record shows that these two sisters intended to create an estate in joint tenancy both as to the real and the personal estate. They were equal owners in the real estate when their holdings therein were changed from that of tenants in common to joint tenants; so, too, each contributed one half of the purchase [294] price of the securities and one half of the amounts deposited in the savings bank. When they created an estate in joint tenancy in the real estate and personal property above referred to, a contract was made between them for a valuable consideration, and in the absence of fraud or anything to indicate that it was not entered into in good faith, it constituted a valid agreement and must be recognized as such. There is no evidence of fraud or bad faith in creating the joint tenancy. It cannot be found that there was a gift of one half of the property to take effect in possession and enjoyment after the decease of the testatrix so as to be taxable under the statute because the joint tenancy was not severed during the lifetime of the tenants. Each sister contributed an equal amount for her interest in the real and personal property when the joint tenancy was created, and there is nothing to show that the right of survivorship was not as valuable to one as to the other. Each held subject to the limitations which such a tenure imposed upon them, and thereafter they held by but one title.

We are of opinion that the contract between the parties creating a joint tenancy in the property in question cannot be held under the circumstances to be a voluntary gift without consideration and so liable to a succession tax.

3. The only question remaining is whether an interest in property which, upon the death of one joint tenant passes by right of survivorship to his cotenant, so passes "by the laws regulating intestate succession" within the meaning of the statute. St. 1909, c. 490, Part IV. § 1. In ascertaining the intent of the Legislature in construing this statute, the established rules of construction are to be applied.

In Martin L. Hall Co. v. Com. 215 Mass. 326, 329, 102 N. E. 364, it was said: "Tax laws are strictly construed. If the right to tax is not plainly conferred by the statute it is not to be extended by implication." The statute under consideration authorizes the imposition of an excise tax. It is so imposed not only upon the right of the owner of property to transmit it after his death, but also upon the privilege of the beneficiary to receive such property. Atty.-Gen. v. Stone, 209 Mass. 186, 190, 95 N. E. 395; Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 122, 124, 38 N. E. 512, 26 L.R.A. 259. The statute does not in express terms authorize the taxation of the interest accruing to a surviving tenant upon the termination of a joint tenancy by the death of [295] his cotenant. In England such interests are expressly made taxable by statute. St. 57 & 58 Vict. c. 30, § 2 (d). The words "intestate succession" are to be construed in accordance with their ordinary legal interpretation. We are of opinion that, as used in this statute, these words have the ordinary significance as applied to the subject matter, and mean succession by the laws regulating the descent and distribution of intestate property. Intestate succession, we think, applies to cases where persons die intestate or leave no valid will, thereby requiring the descent and distribution of their estates in accordance with laws providing therefor. The word "succession" in its ordinary legal use has been described as "the devolution of title to property under the laws of descent and distribution." State v. Payne, 129 Mo. 468, 31 S. W. 797, 33 L.R.A. 576.

The descent and distribution of estates is regulated by statutes enacted from time to time and amended whenever deemed expedient. We think that the "laws" regulating intestate succession mean the statute laws relating to the descent and distribution of intestate estates, and do not include the succession of property which passes under the rules of the common law. Joint tenancy arises under the common law, and the doctrine of survivorship thereunder grows out of the application of common law principles wholly independent of statute. Joint tenants hold under the conveyance or instrument by which the tenancy is created. See In re Headen, 52 Cal. 294; Adams v. Akerlund, 168 Ill. 632, 48 N. E. 454; In re Klatzl, 216 N. Y. 83, 110 N. E. 181. See also Palmer v. Treasurer, 222 Mass. 263, 110 N. E. 283.

Mary M. Clark and her sister Elizabeth as joint tenants held under a tenure which would give the survivor the whole if there was no alienation thereof by either party. Upon the death of Elizabeth, Mary, as her survivor, took the whole estate, not by descent as the heir at law of her sister or under the laws regulating intestate succession, but as the sole surviving joint tenant.

NOTE.

In the reported case a transaction whereby two tenants in common convey to a third person who immediately reconveys to them is held to make them joint tenants. A like estate is also held to result from a joint purchase of securities and from a joint deposit of money in bank. The nature of the estate resulting from the creation of a cotenancy is discussed at length in the note to Withers v. Barnes, reported ante, this volume, at page 55.

Injunctions — Distinction between Restraining Order and Temporary Injunction.

Under the Texas practice, injunctions are classified: First, as a "restraining order," which is an interlocutory order made upon application for an injunction as a part of a motion for the preliminary injunction, by which a party is restrained pending the hearing of the motion; second, an order which operates, unless dissolved by an interlocutory order, until the final hearing; and, third, a perpetual injunction, which can only be ordered upon final decree.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

On January 27th an injunction suit was instituted by the county attorney praying for a temporary restraining order enjoining defendants from permitting moving picture shows being opened on Sunday, and that the cause be set for hearing, and that upon final hearing the temporary restraining order be made permanent, and the petition was presented on the same day to the judge of the district court, who indorsed thereon the following fiat: "Petition granted and clerk of district court directed to issue and direct to each and every defendant . . . an order enjoining, restraining, and prohibiting them and each of them from opening or permitting to be opened their theaters and moving picture shows on Sunday . . . until further orders of this court; this cause set down for hearing Saturday, February 3d." Held, that the order was only a temporary restraining order and expired on the date of the hearing, unless extended, and hence a judgment of contempt for its alleged violation after such date was void.

[See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Setting Case for Hearing.

Where a petition for an injunction was presented to the circuit court on January 27, 1912, the cause could not have come on for final hearing until the succeeding term unless an appearance was entered, so that where none was entered, it could not be set for final hearing on February 3, 1912, so that an order setting it for hearing on that date must be interpreted as having been intended to determine only whether a temporary injunction should be issued operative until final hearing.

Original habeas corpus proceeding. Andrew Zuccaro, relator, and W. M. Rea, defendant. The facts are stated in the opinion. RELATOR DISCHARGED.

Wray & Mayer and Baskin, Dodge & Eastus for relator.

[198] PHILLIPS, J.—The writ of habeas corpus was issued in this proceeding upon the application of the relator complaining that he was restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Tarrant County in virtue of a commitment issued out of the District Court of that county upon a judgment convicting him of contempt of court in disobeying an injunction previously issued.

On January 27, 1912, the county attorney of Tarrant County instituted in the Sixty-seventh District Court of that county an injunction suit in behalf of the State of Texas against the relator and others, praying for the issuance of a temporary restraining order, enjoining the defendants from opening or permitting to be opened for amusement their theaters and moving picture shows on Sunday; that the cause be set down for hearing, and that upon final hearing the temporary restraining order be made permanent. The petition was presented on the same day to the Hon. W. T. Simmons, judge of the court, who thereupon indorsed thereon the following fiat:

"Petition granted and clerk of the District Court of Tarrant County, Texas, directed to issue and direct to each and every defendant named in this petition an order enjoining, restraining and prohibiting them and each of them from opening or permitting to be open their theaters and moving picture shows, respectively, on Sunday, for public amusement, from giving therein any performances for public amusement, and from charging a fee for admission thereto or from doing any of said acts until further orders of this court. This cause set down for hearing Saturday, February 3, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m. and clerk directed to issue notice hereof to defendants and each of them."

A notice as provided in the fiat was issued and served upon the relator, but it appears that no other process has ever been issued in the cause.

On November 24, 1913, the Hon. Marvin H. Brown, judge of the court referred to, without any motion or complaint charging the relator with a violation of the alleged injunction, issued an order to the clerk of the court to cite the relator, among others, for contempt of court for violation of this injunction. Upon hearing, the relator was adjudged in contempt, a fine assessed against him, together with imprisonment in the county jail for three days and until the fine should be paid.

The relator has previously presented his petition for the writ to the Honorable Court of Criminal Appeals, which declined to entertain it upon jurisdictional grounds, whereupon on application to this court our jurisdiction being undoubted, it was ordered that the writ issue.

It appears from the record submitted to us that no other order in respect to the injunction has ever been made in the cause referred to than that embodied in the fiat of the judge above quoted; that no hearing was had on February 3, 1912, the date fixed in the fiat therefor; that the case has never been tried, and no other orders have ever been made therein. The fiat constitutes the sole basis for the injunction claimed to have been violated, and must alone be looked to for the purpose [199] of determining whether any injunction was in force, for the violation of which the contempt proceeding would properly lie.

If the order embodied in the fiat amounted only to a temporary restraining order, provisional in its nature and limited in its duration to the date appointed for a hearing, it is manifest that the relator could not be competently held in contempt for acts committed after such date. If the order, on the other hand, possessed the force of a continuing injunction, effective until final hearing of the cause unless dissolved in an appropriate proceeding, he, of course, remained subject to the restraints it imposed.

In the opinion of this court delivered by Chief Justice Gaines, in Riggins v. Thompson, 96 Tex. 154, 71 S. W. 14, the classification of injunctions under our practice is thus stated:

"1. A restraining order, which is defined to be: 'A restraining order is an interlocutory order made by a court of equity upon an application for an injunction and as part of the motion for a preliminary injunction by which the party is restrained pending the hearing of the motion.' 2. One which is intended to operate, and which does operate unless dissolved by an interlocutory order, until the final hearing; and, 3. A perpetual injunction which can be properly ordered only upon a final decree." In that case the district judge had ordered by fiat indorsed upon the plaintiff's petition that the defendants appear upon a date named to show cause why permanent injunction should not issue, and that a restraining order issue to the defendants as prayed for, pending such hearing. It was held that the order issued upon the authority of the fiat was only temporary in its character and expired upon the date appointed for the hearing. The fiat here involved is not in the same terms as the one considered in that case, but there can be no doubt under this authority that the only effect of the order was to temporarily enjoin the defendants, and, there having been no continuance of the injunction, it expired on the date appointed for the hearing.

The court appears to have been in session on January 27, 1912, the date the petition was presented and the order made. The cause could not, of course, have come on for final hearing until the succeeding term, unless an appearance was entered, which was not done. Accordingly it was not subject to be finally heard on February 3, 1912; and in ordering that "this cause (is) set down for hearing" for that date, the judge could not have intended that any other hearing be had than one for the purpose of determining whether an injunction should issue, operative until the final hearing. This must be true since he was without authority to try the cause on that date, which was only seven days subsequent to the date of his order; and unless the hearing thus appointed was for the purpose stated, his ordering a hearing for such date was a vain act. If the hearing was fixed for the purpose of determining whether an injunction should issue, and such it seems to us is the obvious effect of the order, it is clear that the injunction originally ordered was provisional in its nature, and was intended to be operative [200] only until the date named for the hearing. Otherwise, there was no occasion for the hearing.

It is manifest under the record presented to us that the injunction expired on February 3, 1912. The judgment of contempt, based upon such injunction, for an alleged violation long subsequent to the date of its expiration, was therefore void and of no effect; and the relator should be discharged. It is unnecessary to consider the other questions presented under the application.

Relator discharged.

Distinction between Temporary Restraining Order and Temporary Injunction.

Generally, 123.

Duration of Order, 124.

Necessity of Notice, 126.

Necessity of Bond, 126.

Necessity of Subpoena, 126.

Generally.

There is a well-recognized distinction between a temporary restraining order and a temporary or preliminary injunction which may be stated as follows: A temporary restraining order is generally granted without notice to the opposite parties and is intended only as a restraint on the defendant until the propriety of granting a temporary injunction can be determined and it goes no further than to preserve the status quo until that determination. It is limited in its operation and continues only for such a reasonable time as may be necessary to have a hearing on an order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue. On the other hand a temporary or preliminary injunction is rarely granted without notice, but when granted it is effective until the trial of the cause in which it is issued. Houghton v. Meyer, 208 U. S. 149, 28 S. Ct. 234, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 432; Moulton v. Cornish, 33 App. Cas. (D. C.) 228; Strickland v. Griffin, 70 Ga. 542; Purcell v. Hosey, 44 Ind. App. 448, 89 N. E. 520; Thompson Scenic R. Co. v. Young, 90 Md. 278, 44 Atl. 1024; Wetzstein v. Boston, etc. Consol. Copper, etc. Min. Co. 25 Mont. 135, 63 Pac. 1043; State v. Graves, 82 Neb. 282, 117 N. W. 717; Vornholt v. Gordon, 4 Ohio Dec. 498; Caswell v. Fundenberger, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 456, 105 S. W. 1017; State v. Lichtenberg, 4 Wash. 407, 30 Pac. 716. And see the reported case, and the cases cited throughout this note. "The former [a temporary injunction] embodies a restraint which continues, unless modified by the court, until the hearing of the cause, and then it is made either permanent or discharged altogether; while the latter [a temporary restraining order] strictly speaking is not an injunction at all, but a writ of the court to compel parties to maintain the matters in controversy in status quo until the question of whether or not a temporary injunction ought to issue may be determined." Ex p. Grimes, 20 Okla. 446, 94 Pac. 668.

In Houghton v. Meyer, 208 U. S. 149, 28 S. Ct. 234, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 432, the court stated the distinction between a temporary restraining order and a temporary injunction as follows: "The restraining order issued in the case was authorized by § 718 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which is as follows: 'Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion; and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge.' Rev. Stat. § 718. Under this section, originally passed June 1, 1872 (§ 7, c. 255, 17 Stat. 196, 197), a restraining order with features distinguishing it from an interlocutory injunction was introduced into the statutory law. In the prior act of Congress of March 3, 1793 (c. 22, 1 Stat. 334, 335), it was provided in § 5: 'Nor shall a writ of injunction be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same.' By force of § 718 a judge may grant a restraining order in case it appears to him there is danger of irreparable injury, to be in force 'until the decision upon the motion' for temporary injunction. Thus by its very terms the section (718) does not deal with temporary injunctions, concerning which power is given in other sections of the statutes, but is intended to give power to preserve the status quo when there is danger of irreparable injury from delay in giving the notice required by equity rule 55, governing the issue of injunctions. While the statutory restraining order is a species of temporary injunction, it is only authorized, as § 718 imports by its terms, until the pending motion for a temporary injunction can be heard and decided." And in U. S. v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 225 U. S. 306, 32 S. Ct. 817, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1100, in answer to the contention that a certain order was improperly granted in that it was a temporary restraining order and the statutory requirements as to such order in that particular instance had not been complied with, the court, holding the order to be a temporary injunction, pointed out the distinguishing characteristics between the two as follows: "The statute contemplates three classes of orders: First, a temporary restraining order staying in whole or in part the operation of the order of the interstate commerce commission for not more than sixty days from the date of the suspensive order, to be allowed by the court or a judge thereof; second, a preliminary injunction, that is, an injunction pendente lite, which, to quote the words of the statute, may be granted by the court, to 'restrain or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the commission's order pending the final hearing and determination of the suit;' third, in the nature of things a perpetual injunction upon the entry of the final decree. The order in this case, made after notice and hearing, suspending the force and effect of the order of the commission until the further order of the court, was obviously an exercise of the power conferred to grant a preliminary injunction or injunction pendente lite and not of the power to allow a temporary restraining order embraced in the first of the classes stated."

Construing a statute relative to injunctions (Georgia Code, § 3211) providing for the issuance of a temporary restraining order without notice in certain cases, the court, in Strickland v. Griffin, 70 Ga. 542, said: "It is apparent from the words of this section of the code that the judge cannot issue an injunction at all. He may, when the application is made, if it appear from the sworn allegations in the bill, or the affidavit of a competent person, that the injury apprehended will be done if an immediate remedy is not afforded—then, i. e., upon that condition and upon that alone, he may grant, instantan, a restraining order (not an injunction) against the party complained of, until the hearing or the further order of the court, and this restraining order shall have the force of an injunction, until rescinded or modified. Upon the hearing, which must take place under existing rules of law, the injunction may be granted or refused, on the terms required by law."

It has been held that if the effect that should be given to an order is doubtful, or if the language of the court will admit of such a construction, it should be considered as a temporary restraining order only. State v. Graves, 82 Neb. 282, 117 N. W. 717.

However, while a temporary restraining order is more temporary in its character than a temporary injunction, it is equally as binding while it is in effect. State v. Werner, 80 Kan. 222, 101 Pac. 1004, wherein it was said: "The temporary restraining order allowed by the probate judge is more temporary in character than a temporary injunction, but it is as imperative and binding while it is in force as any other injunction, and a violation of the order is as marked a case of contempt as would be the violation of a perpetual injunction."

In Hurt v. Ches, etc. Co. (Ky.) 111 S. W. 285, it was held that where the court continued in force until the final hearing of the case a temporary restraining order granted by the clerk, it thereby in effect granted a temporary injunction.

Duration of Order.

It may be said that the chief distinguishing characteristic between a temporary restraining order and a temporary or preliminary injunction consists in the duration or extent of its effectiveness, the former continuing in force only until such a fixed time as is ordered for the hearing as to whether a preliminary injunction shall be granted, when its force automatically ceases.

"It simply suspends proceedings until an opportunity can be given for the parties to be heard, and upon that hearing having been had, and a decision rendered upon the application, the whole force of the restraining order ceases by its own limitation." State v. Wakeley, 28 Neb. 421, 44 N. W. 488.

In State v. Johnston, 78 Kan. 616, 97 Pac. 790, the court said: "Temporary injunction" and "restraining order" are often used synonymously. Our statute and the better usage limits the meaning of 'restraining order' to such an order as is operative only until a hearing can be had upon an application for an injunction, and of 'temporary injunction' to an order operative usually until the final hearing of the case in which it is used. . . . The restraint which the order purports to impose, and not the name given to it, determines its true name and character. The order of the probate court enjoined the appellant until the further order of the district court or the judge thereof in the premises. It required no revocation, but expired upon the making of an order by the district court or judge. It was simply a restraining order, and within the jurisdiction of the probate judge." And in Wallace v. McVey, 6 Ind. 300, it was said: "The restraining order contemplated by this section is limited in its operation, and extends only to such reasonable time as may be necessary to notify the adverse party. Temporary injunctions are usually granted in vacation, and in terms they continue in force until the further order of the court, which is frequently several months."

It is generally held that the words "until the further order of this court," contained in an order restraining the defendants until a hearing can be had and requiring the parties to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue, do not have the effect of changing the order into a temporary injunction. Curtiss v. Bachman, 110 Cal. 433, 42 Pac. 910, 52 Am. St. Rep. 111; Ex p. Grimes, 20 Okla. 446, 94 Pac. 668. In the case last cited the court said: "It is the fundamental inherent difference in the character of relief granted in a restraining order from that granted in a temporary injunction which causes the courts, notwithstanding the fact that the other contains provisions similar to 'until the further orders of this court,' and like clauses, to adhere to the restraining character of the order and deny it the force and vigor of an injunction." In Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 107, discussing an order restraining the commission of certain acts "until the hearing of the whole matter" it was said: "The restraining order expired by its own limitation. It was issued under the provisions of the one hundred and sixteenth section of the practice act, and was intended only as a restraint upon the defendants, until the propriety of granting the provisional remedy of a temporary injunction could be determined, after hearing the parties. The concluding words of the order do not operate to change it into an injunction pending the suit. They only refer to the whole matter on the motion, and not to the whole matter in controversy."

An injunctive order which does not contemplate a hearing as to whether a temporary injunction shall be allowed is of itself a temporary injunction. State v. Baker, 62 Neb. 840, 88 N. W. 124; State v. Graves, 82 Neb. 282, 117 N. W. 717; State v. Dungan, 89 Neb. 738, 132 N. W. 305. In State v. Baker, supra, it was said: "The order does not by its terms indicate or contemplate that a further hearing on the application was to be had before the application was finally acted upon; and herein, in our judgment, lies the chief distinguishing characteristics between a 'temporary order of injunction' and a mere 'restraining order' until the application is fully heard. There is nothing to indicate that he deemed it proper that the defendants should be heard before granting the injunction; no order or direction that any notice be given to such party to attend for the purpose of hearing the application; no time or place mentioned for such hearing; nor does the wording of the order itself indicate that it was to operate as a restraint on the defendants 'in the meantime,' and only until such hearing should be had."

An order restraining and enjoining the defendant "until the final determination of this action" has been held to be a temporary injunction rather than a mere restraining order. In re Sharp, 87 Kan. 504, Ann. Cas. 1913E 460, 124 Pac. 532. And it has been held that where an order restrained the parties "pending the further order of this court" and set no time for a hearing or at which the restraining order should expire it was to all intents and purposes a temporary injunction. Houston Ice, etc. Co. v. Clint (Tex.) 159 S. W. 409.

Necessity of Notice.

A temporary restraining order is generally granted without notice to the defendant and in this it differs materially from a temporary injunction which the courts seldom allow without notice and hearing. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Burlington, etc. R. Co. 34 Fed. 491; Pressed Steel Car Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 192 Fed. 517, 113 C. C. A. 73; Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Huncheon, 16 Ind. 436; Pleasants v. Vevay, etc. Turnpike Co. 42 Ind. 391; Terre Haute, etc. R. Co. v. St. Joseph, etc. R. Co. 155 Ind. 27, 57 N. E. 530; Mason v. Milligan, 114 N. E. 3. In Terre Haute, etc. R. Co. v. St. Joseph, etc. R. Co. supra, the rule was stated as follows: "The infallible distinction between a temporary restraining order and a temporary injunction is that the former issues without notice on a showing of emergency and the latter issues only after notice and hearing."

An ex parte injunctive order is called a restraining order to distinguish it from a preliminary injunction, which is the order made after hearing. Whitmer v. Whitmer (Del.) 98 Atl. 940. But after a hearing on a motion to dissolve a restraining order and an order refusing to dissolve and continuing the order, it becomes in effect a temporary injunction. Western Union Tel. Co. v. U. S. etc. Trust Co. 221 Fed. 545, 137 C. C. A. 113. In that case the question arose as to the appealability of an order continuing a restraining order after hearing, and in answer to the contention that the order was merely a restraining order and therefore not appealable, the court said: "Conceding that a restraining order granted without a hearing is not ordinarily appealable, yet a restraining order which is granted, or sustained, or denied after a hearing of the parties, and which in effect and in everything but name, is a temporary injunction, falls within the evident meaning of the statute, and is reviewable by appeal, and the orders in question were of that character. The order refusing to dissolve and modifying the restraining order was made upon a hearing upon an application of the telegraph company to dissolve it, and in the later order the former was by the court itself called 'a restraining order and injunction,' so that the second order falls, not only within the true interpretation, but within the terms of the statute, and the appeal from it invokes a review of the order of the day before which conditioned its issue."

Necessity of Bond.

As a rule the courts are prohibited by statute from issuing a temporary injunction unless a bond is given, but it is generally left to the discretion of the court whether it shall require a bond on the issuance of a temporary restraining order. San Diego Water Co. v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co. 101 Cal. 218, 35 Pac. 651; In re Mitchell, 1 Kan. (Dass. Ed.) 643; In re Luttgerding, 83 Kan. 205, 110 Pac. 95; State v. McQuillin, 260 Mo. 164, 168 S. W. 924. Compare Akin v. Rice, 137 Mo. App. 147, 117 S. W. 655.

In San Diego Water Co. v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co. supra, it was said: "The restraining order is a restraint of the same nature as an injunction, but the statute not only does not designate it as an injunction but discriminates between it and an injunction. It is a restraint pending the consideration of the court as to whether the party is entitled to a preliminary injunction. The statute does not expressly require an undertaking as a condition for a restraining order, although this court has said one ought to be required. Such undertaking is expressly required as a condition for a preliminary injunction which does not become operative until the bond is given."

It has been held that the fact that a bond was required and was given did not in itself change the character of a restraining order to that of a temporary injunction. Ex p. Grimes, 20 Okla. 446, 94 Pac. 668. In that case it was said: "The court may direct a reasonable notice to be given to the party against whom an injunction is sought, and may in the meantime restrain him; and this either with or without a bond in its discretion, and in either event the character of the order remains the same."

Necessity of Subpoena.

The fact that no subpoena is required to be issued on the granting of a restraining order was pointed out in Allman v. United Brotherhood, etc. 79 N. J. Eq. 150, 81 Atl. 116, affirmed in 79 N. J. Eq. 641, 83 Atl. 1118, as a further distinction between such an order and a preliminary injunction. In that case it was said: "Upon the authorities, therefore, my conclusion is, that a subpoena is not required to be taken out with a restraining order which commands the defendant to appear on the return day and show cause why an injunction should not issue, but that when a preliminary injunction issues ex parte upon the filing of a bill without any order to show cause being made, as it sometimes does, it runs—to use its language—until the defendant 'shall have fully answered the bill of complaint, and our said court shall make other order to the contrary;' and if the defendant would seek to have the restraint removed, he must answer (unless the chancellor shall allow the motion to be heard on affidavits under rule 123), and he can be compelled to answer only by the service of subpoena for that purpose."

STATE
v.
CHAVEZ ET AL.

New Mexico Supreme Court—August 17, 1914.

19 N. Mex. 325; 142 Pac. 922.

Trial — Continuance — Denial Held Harmless — Facts Proved without Absent Witness.

Sections 2986 and 2987, Comp. Laws 1897, require a continuance of a cause for absence of a witness only in case the applicant has "no other witness by whom such facts can be fully proved." Where, after the overruling of a motion for continuance, the desired fact is fully proved by other witnesses, the ruling of the court in denying the continuance, even if technically erroneous when made, is rendered harmless.

Appeal — Assignments of Error Insufficient.

Assignments of error held not available upon well-established rules of practice.

Instructions — Statement that There Has Been Perjury at Trial.

An instruction that "there has been manifest perjury by witnesses who have testified in this case, as counsel for both sides have claimed in their argument. They, of course, differ as to which witnesses have testified falsely. It is for you to determine from all of the evidence, which includes the appearance of the witnesses when testifying as well as what they said, what evidence you credit"—held erroneous, as violative of section 2994, Comp. Laws 1897, which forbids comment by the court upon the weight of the evidence.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Sierra county: MEONEM, Judge.

Criminal action. Eduardo Chavez et al., convicted of assault with deadly weapon and appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Isaac Barth for appellants.

Ira L. Grimshaw for appellee.

[327] PARKER, J.—Appellants were convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon.

They assign error upon the refusal of the court to grant a continuance. The same was sought on the ground of the absence of three witnesses. As to the testimony of one of them, the court required the State to admit that the absent witness, if present, would testify as outlined in the affidavit in support of the motion, but as to the other two witnesses, he did not so require. Three other witnesses were produced by defendants, who testified to the identical facts in substance which it was alleged the absent witnesses would testify to. The sole defense of defendants was that of alibi, and all of the witnesses, both those who testified and those who were absent, were relatives of the defendants and who were absent, were relatives of the defendants and lived at the same place, and some of them in the same houses, with the two absent witnesses. The witnesses who testified fully covered the whereabouts of the defendants during the whole of the time of the occurrence of the alleged crime, and some of them covered all or nearly all of the identical facts set up in the affidavit for continuance as the proposed evidence of the two absent witness. Our statute requires an affidavit in support of a motion for continuance that the defendant "knows of no other witness by whom such facts can be fully proved." Section 2986 C. L. 1897. This was done in this case. But the essential fact to be proved was the absence of defendants from the scene of the alleged crime at the time it was committed. This was fully shown by the evidence of the defendants' witnesses and the admission by the State as to the evidence of the one witness. Under such circumstances it is clear that the affidavit of defendants was not true in substance, although it may have been technically so, owing to allegations of some more minute details therein as to the proposed testimony of the absent witnesses, and which details may [328] not all have been shown by the other evidence. Under such circumstances, the overruling of the motion for continuance, even if technically erroneous at the time it was done, becomes harmless at the later stage of the trial.

Counsel for defendants assign error because the court did not compel the State to admit the truth of the proposed testimony of the one absent witness as outlined in the affidavit for continuance, but instead only required it to admit that the witness would testify if present. In other words, counsel attacks the constitutionality of our statute, which was literally followed by the court. Sec. 2987, C. L. 1897. The answer to this assignment is twofold. First, no such question was presented to the trial court at the time the requirement was made. Second, counsel argues an entirely different question in the brief, viz.: that it is a violation of defendants' rights to compel them to go to trial without a witness, notwithstanding the admission by the State that the witness, if present, would testify as outlined in the affidavit. Both the assignment and the argument, therefore, must fail.

Counsel for defendants assign error upon the failure of the court to submit to the jury the question of the guilt of defendants of simple assault. This assignment is likewise not available to raise the question. The exceptions to the instructions in the lower court raised no such question, but went simply to the proper definition of assault. No request for the submission of simple assault to the jury was made by counsel for the defendants.

Counsel urges that there is a fatal variance between the allegations and the proof in this, that the charge is assault with a deadly weapon and the proof shows an ordinary assault and battery and nothing more. At the close of the case for the State, defendants' counsel moved the court to direct a verdict for defendants as to the second count of the indictment, (assault with deadly weapon) on the ground "that the proof of a completed assault—that is—the completed act of beating or striking—does not support an allegation of an assault, and is an entirely separate and [329] distinct offense." This motion in no way called to the attention of the court the alleged error set out in the assignment. Nor was it called to the attention of the court in the motion for a new trial. The objection, therefore, is not available in this court.

We may say, however, in passing, that the proof amply supports the charge of assault with a deadly weapon.

A question is raised, however, by the fourth assignment of error. It is this: the court in its sixteenth instruction used the following language, "There has been manifest perjury by witnesses who have testified in this case, as counsel for both sides have claimed in their argument. They, of course, differ as to which witnesses have testified falsely. It is for you to determine from all of the evidence, which includes the appearance of the witness when testifying as well as what they said, what evidence you credit."

Counsel for appellants raise a question which seems to be properly saved below, as to whether this instruction is not a comment on the weight of the evidence within the prohibition of Section 2994, C. L. 1897. It appears from the recital in the instruction that counsel for the State charged the defendants' witnesses with perjury, and that counsel for defendants charged the witnesses for the State with the same offense. Without intimating to the jury with which statement by counsel the court agreed, he did state in effect that he agreed with one of them, and asserted that perjury had been committed. It is true that he left it entirely to the jury to determine which set of witnesses was guilty of the offense. But he found as a fact, and so stated to the jury, that one set of witnesses had committed perjury. He thus took from the jury one phase of their province, viz., to determine the weight and credibility of the evidence of each and every witness. Just what effect this may have had on the minds of the jury it is impossible to say. Of course, the issue was very narrow, it was as to where the defendants were at the time of the occurrence. But the jury were, by the instruction, debarred [330] from giving to the testimony of each witness such weight as, under all the circumstances, it was entitled to. The possibilities of honest error or mistake on the part of the witnesses were eliminated, and the jury were told in effect that if a witness testified one way it was perjury, and if he testified the other way, it was the truth. This was error.

The Attorney General attempts to justify the instructions under the doctrine that where a fact is admitted by both parties, it is not error for the court to assume the fact in an instruction. The doctrine has no application. If counsel for plaintiff asserts that A, a witness for defendant, has committed perjury, and counsel for the defendant asserts that B, a witness for the plaintiff, has committed perjury, there is no admitted fact. Besides, the doctrine relied upon is applicable, so far as we are advised, only when the admitted fact is one involved in the controversy under investigation, and which relates to the merits of the controversy. It is not applicable to a question of the credibility of witnesses.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the lower court will be reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to award a new trial, and, it is so ordered.

NOTE.

Propriety of Instruction or Comment by Court to Effect that Perjury Has Been Committed at Trial.

Perjury Not Expressly Imputed to Either Side.

The court in the reported case holds that it is error for a trial judge to instruct the jury to the effect that perjury has been committed at the trial, although the testimony is in sharp conflict and no designation is made of the side considered guilty, for the reason that it is within the province of the jury to determine the weight of the evidence, which involves the power of attributing error to honest mistake instead of to perjury. A like decision was rendered in People v. Brow, 90 Hun 509, 35 N. Y. S. 1009. An additional ground for such a holding would appear in the possibility that the remarks of the trial judge, while ostensibly impartial, may be understood by the jury as referring to the witnesses of a particular party. Thus in

Hunt v. Baker, 173 App. Div. 9, 160 N. Y. S. 45, the court said: "We think that there is a substantial basis for the defendant's complaint in this respect, and that the learned trial judge, by inadvertence, gave expression to views outside the latitude of judicial discretion. We realize that judges are human, and not infallible, and we realize the possibility that the learned trial judge may have suffered annoyance in the course of the trial of this case. At the same time we cannot overlook the difficulty referred to. Although there are other portions of the charge which are not free from criticism, we base our disapproval upon this language: 'But, gentlemen, men cannot differ as to whether a conversation occurred of this kind (referring to the alleged talk over the telephone) and what the subject of that conversation was and be honest. There cannot be any doubt about that. One side or the other—and I do not attempt to say where the truth lies at all—one side or the other is coming into court and telling something and telling it deliberately which is not true. One side or the other in this case, the people on one side or the other of this case, are absolutely unfit to associate with decent, honest, reputable people. You have got to go out and determine who it is, because one side or the other are not fit to do business with business men and do business on a level and be honest about it. And it is a disheartening thing, gentlemen, to think that anybody is coming into a court of justice and have a difference of opinion over their legal rights, not differing as to the law that governs them, but coming here and deliberately falsifying, that may seek something or defend something which is wrong.' What preceded and followed these remarks might well have led the jury to believe that the criticism was directed against the witnesses for the defense. . . . We do not think the record justified the learned judge in his characterization of those witnesses regarded by him as the offending witnesses. We think the court might have said that a verdict could be rendered either for the plaintiff or defendant without a finding on the part of the jury that any witness was 'unfit to associate with decent, honest, reputable people.'"

But where a judge gives no intimation as to the side on which he considers perjury to have been committed, it has been held that an expression of the opinion that one side or the other has committed perjury, while improper, is not ground for a new trial. Horn v. State, 102 Ala. 144, 15 So. 278; Featherstone v. People, 194 Ill. 325, 62 N. E. 684; Schafer v. Gilmer, 13 Nev. 330. Thus in Horn v. State, supra, the court said: "While delivering the general charge ex mero motu to the jury, the presiding judge made certain statements of fact to them to which the defendant reserved exceptions. Among other things, he said this: 'Gentlemen of the jury there is great conflict in the testimony in this case, and in fact downright contradiction; and in my own opinion there has been a great deal sworn on the stand in this case that is untrue.' This statement is borne out by the transcript. There was much of conflict and 'down right contradiction' in the evidence, and there can be no doubt that 'a great deal sworn to on the stand' in the case was untrue. The conflict and contradiction were such as to admit of no reconciliation. There was no room for the jury to reconcile all the evidence and to believe it all. The only thing open to the jury was to determine what was true and what was false in the mass of evidence, a great part of which was, in the nature of things, untrue. On this state of case, the statement of fact by the judge being unquestionably correct, and his conclusion therefrom being inevitable, it is not conceivable how the expression of his opinion as to the untruth of a great deal of the testimony could have prejudiced the defendant, since there is nothing whatever in this part of the charge which indicates in the remotest degree what part of the evidence the judge thought to be untrue, or whether he had indeed any opinion that any particular part was untrue, or which tends to at all infringe upon the jury's undoubted right to find the truth upon either side of the conflict in respect of any point. While, therefore, this part of the court's remarks to the jury is out of the common and is not to be commended, since the general charge as well as special instructions should be strictly confined to statements of propositions of law arising upon or applicable to the evidence adduced in the case, no error of law or fact is involved in what was said, we do not think the jury could have been misled thereby to the defendant's prejudice, and we will not disturb the judgment on account of it." And in Schafer v. Gilmer, 13 Nev. 330, it was said: "In this case there is plain perjury on one side or the other. Either the plaintiff Henry Schafer, committed perjury or the witness Wadleigh, and one or the other of them ought to be in the penitentiary instead of being in this court room.' This charge was given to the jury before any of the written instructions were read. The objections urged by appellants' counsel are to that portion charging perjury. It will be observed that there is no intimation from the court as to which party it deemed guilty of the offense. It was left to the jury to determine the truth or falsity of the respective statements sworn to by the witnesses, Schafer and Wadleigh. There witnesses had solemnly testified diametrically opposite. In reply to the question asked by the court, 'Did the stage tip over that day, between Robinson and Cherry Creek?' Wadleigh answered: 'I swear positively that it did not;' Schafer answered: 'Yes, sir; I am positive it did.' The court, in charging the jurors that there was false swearing 'on one side or the other,' only told them what they already knew, or ought to have known. Such remarks do not entitle a party to a new trial. (State v. Glover, 10 Nev. 24.) Perhaps it would have been better for the court to have withheld its opinion that either Schafer or Wadleigh ought to be in the penitentiary. But it is apparent that the remarks of the court were only intended, and could only have been understood by the jury, as placing the seal of its condemnation upon the crime of false swearing, and to impress upon the minds of the jurors that it was their duty to determine which one of the witnesses had sworn falsely." In Featherstone v. People, 194 Ill. 325, 62 N. E. 684, the court said: "The only remark that we feel especially called upon to criticize is that made during the examination of Mrs. Taylor, the second witness for the defendant. The defendant was attempting to prove an alibi. The evidence for the People tended to show that the alleged offense was committed between seven and eight o'clock. This witness stated that she was at the house of defendant's mother and saw him eating breakfast as late as eight o'clock, and that he was about the house a short time after that. At the close of her evidence the court remarked, 'Somebody is lying about this.' We are not unmindful of the fact that this evidence discloses a very sharp conflict, and that it was apparent to any listener, and no less to the court, that it was not possible to reconcile this testimony with that given by the witnesses for the People; yet, however much the court may have felt the force of such situation, he was certainly not warranted in making such a declaration. We are not, however, able to say the conclusion necessarily or reasonably follows that the jury did or could infer from this remark that the expression of the court indicated his belief that the witness just leaving the stand was the one to whom that charge could be laid. If, upon the whole record, we entertained any doubt of the guilt of the plaintiff in error, arising from the closeness of the facts, we would deem it incumbent upon us to reverse this case."

Perjury Imputed to Particular Witness.

The general rule is that a trial judge commits error where he instructs or comments to the jury to the effect that a certain witness at the trial has given false testimony. People v. Willard, 92 Cal. 482, 28 Pac. 585;

Perkins v. Kinsey, 204 Ill. 275, 68 N. E. 486; Swenson v. Erickson, 90 Ill. App. 358; Kinter v. State, 45 Ind. 175; McDuff v. Detroit Evening Journal Co. 84 Mich. 1, 47 N. W. 671, 22 Am. St. Rep. 673; Bowman v. State, 19 Neb. 523, 28 N. W. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 750 (judge in presence of some of jury who afterward sat in trial of cause said that defendant's affidavit for continuance was false); Bonner v. State (Tex.) 32 S. W. 1043 (requested charge that testimony of certain witness was false properly refused). Thus in Kinter v. State, supra, the trial judge stopped the cross-examination of one of the defendant's witnesses and remarked, "I have serious doubts whether that witness ought not to be recognized to answer for perjury." The court said: "The action of the court is defended by the counsel for the appellee on the ground of the improbability of the testimony of the witness, arising out of the facts narrated by him, and his deportment on the stand. We do not think the action of the court can be sustained on that ground, or on any ground. The question whether the witness was worthy of credit or not was a question for the jury, and the defendant was entitled to have that question go to them without the remarks from the court disparaging or destroying the force to his testimony and showing that in the opinion of the court the witness had committed perjury. Had the court made use of the remarks in question in a formal instruction to the jury, no one could doubt, we think, as to its impropriety. We think it was equally improper for the court to make the remark when and in the manner made."

The error of such a remark cannot always be cured by an instruction to the jury to disregard it. Swenson v. Erickson, 90 Ill. App. 358, wherein the court said: "Bernard Muehrcke, the constable who executed the writ of attachment, was a material witness for plaintiffs in error. Being questioned in regard to the restaurant of defendant in error, the following occurred: 'Q. What kind of place was it? A. It was one of those cheap restaurants where they serve ten and fifteen cent meals. Mr. Cox: Q. How do you know? Did you ever buy any meals there? A. No, sir. The Court: Evidently, sir, this man is making this testimony out of whole cloth.' The attorney for plaintiffs in error excepted to the remark of the court. That the remark was well calculated to discredit the witness with the jury, and was consequently prejudicial to plaintiffs in error, is, we think, too clear to admit of discussion."

The court instructed the jury that they should not be influenced by any remark of the court touching the credibility of any witness, but we cannot think that the instruction cured the error. The remark was made near the commencement of the examination of the witness; he testified afterward at great length, and it would be only natural, if the jury after hearing such a remark by the court, would give but little, if any, attention to the testimony of the witness, or disregard it altogether. At least such might be the effect of the court's remark."

But the error of the trial judge in expressing the opinion that a certain witness has not told the truth is sometimes not sufficient to overthrow the verdict. State v. Burwell, 52 Kan. 686, 35 Pac. 780; Connor v. Wilkie, 1 Kan. App. 492, 41 Pac. 71. In the case last cited the court said: "The record shows that D. M. Carlton was examined by both plaintiff and defendant at different times, and his testimony introduced in the form of depositions at the trial. The statements of the witness in the two depositions were very conflicting, and would impress even a casual observer with the idea that the witness was far from reliable. When the second deposition given by Carlton was offered at the trial, the court asked the question, 'Whose deposition is that?' and, upon being informed that it was the deposition of the witness Carlton, made use of the following expression: 'He must be an awful liar.' There can be no doubt that a remark of this character was extremely reprehensible, and tended to detract from the dignity of the court and the entire proceeding. No court can expect the litigants, the bar or the public to retain respect for its proceedings when the court itself is lacking in the dignity which should attend the trial of causes; but it is not every expression of the court, however reprehensible it may be, that will work the reversal of a judgment. The remark made by the court in this case applies as fully to the testimony of the witness offered by the plaintiff below as it did to the testimony of the same witness offered by the defendant below. In the case of The State v. Burwell, 52 Kan. 686, a witness was personally giving testimony before the jury, and, in response to an objection made to an inquiry, the trial court remarked, 'It seems to me that the state could just let this witness go right on with his romance.' This was a remark touching the testimony of a witness introduced by the defendant alone, and upon trial of a felony case; and while the supreme court, in passing upon the remark of the trial court, criticised its action quite severely, yet it declined to reverse the judgment on account of such a remark. In this case, then, had the remark not been made which was made by the trial court, the jury must have been impressed with the fact that the witness, Carlton, did, either in the one deposition or the other, testify falsely upon the material facts at issue, and we apprehend it could have given neither deposition much weight in the determination of the case. We cannot see that the plaintiff in error was prejudiced by the remark of the court, and therefore the judgment will not be reversed on account of such remark."

In Pennsylvania it has been held that if the trial judge leaves to the jury the determination of the facts, he commits no error in calling the attention of the jury to false testimony and in expressing his opinion that it is false, where such a conclusion is justified by the state of the evidence. Price v. Hamscher, 174 Pa. St. 73, 34 Atl. 546; McClintock v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 133.

LEE

v.

STATE.

Arizona Supreme Court—December 29, 1914.

16 Ariz. 291; 145 Pac. 244.

Extortion — Sufficiency of Indictment — Particulars of Threat.

Under Pen. Code 1913, § 943, providing that an information is sufficient if it states the act charged as the offense clearly and distinctly in ordinary and concise language, so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, and with sufficient certainty to enable the court to pronounce judgment, and which contains the formal allegations of the necessary jurisdictional facts, an information for extortion by threat to accuse another of a crime as defined by Pen. Code 1913, §§ 512, 513, which charges that the defendant threatened to accuse another of grand larceny, is sufficient without alleging the particulars of the larceny.

Proof of Other Offenses.

In a prosecution for extortion by threatening to accuse another of the larceny of a cow, where the theory of the prosecution was that defendant compelled the prosecuting witness to kill a cow belonging to another so that defendant and his confederates could accuse him of the crime, and then extorted money from him to forego making the accusation, evidence that the defendant pointed a gun at the witness, and thereby forced him to kill the cow, is admissible as part of the transaction, although it tends to show the commission of another crime by defendant.

[See generally 105 Am. St. Rep. 976.]

Same.

Evidence that tracks were found leading to the place where the cow was killed is also admissible as tending to corroborate the testimony of the prosecuting witness.

Instructions — Defining Unrelated Crime.

In a prosecution for extortion by a threat to accuse another of a crime as defined by Pen. Code 1913, § 513, subd. 2, it is error for the court to read to the jury subdivisions 1, 3, and 4 of that section defining extortion by other threats.

Same.

The error in such instruction is harmless where the only evidence of threats is a threat to accuse the other of grand larceny, especially where the court, after reading subdivision 2 of the section, states that that is the one under which the prosecution is brought.

Same.

In a prosecution for extortion by threatening to accuse another of grand larceny, it is error to read to the jury all of Pen. Code 1913, §§ 481, 483, 484, defining grand larceny, and not to confine the instruction to the particular kind of larceny to which the threat referred.

Extortion — Threat to Accuse of Crime.

One who extorts money from another by a threat to accuse the other of a crime is guilty of extortion, whether the other is in fact guilty or innocent of the crime referred to in the threat.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham county: McALISTER, Judge.

Criminal action. Robert E. Lee convicted of extortion and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

John McGowan for appellant.

G. P. Bullard and Leslie O. Hardy for respondent.

[292] Ross, J.—This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of conviction of the crime of extortion. Complaint is made of errors (1) in overruling a demurrer to the information for insufficient facts to constitute the offense of extortion; (2) the admission of evidence over objection; and (3) the giving of erroneous instructions to the jury. We will consider these assignments in their order.

The charging part of the information is as follows:

"The said Robert E. Lee, on or about the 7th day of November, 1912, and before the filing of the information in the county of Graham, state of Arizona, did willfully, knowingly, unlawfully and feloniously obtain certain personal property, to wit, $1,600 lawful money of the United States, from one H. E. Smith, then and there being with his said H. E. Smith's consent, which said consent was then and there induced by wrongful use of force and fear by and upon the part of said Robert E. Lee, defendant, to wit, by a threat then and there made and communicated to said H. E. Smith by said defendant, to accuse him, the said H. E. Smith, of having committed a crime, to wit, the crime of grand larceny in said county of [293] Graham, and said personal property then and there being the property of said H. E. Smith."

Extortion is defined by the Penal Code of 1913, section 512, as follows:

"Extortion is the obtaining of property from another with his consent induced by wrongful use of force or fear or under color of official right." The "fear" mentioned "may be induced by a threat . . . (2) to accuse him . . . of any crime." Id. 513.

The appellant contends that the information is defective in that it fails to describe sufficiently the crime of which accusation was threatened, and he insists that the information, to be good, should set forth the particulars of the crime threatened. In other words, he says that the allegation that defendant threatened to accuse Smith with the crime of "grand larceny" is a mere conclusion of law, and that it cannot be made to take the place of the facts constituting the accusation. The offense with which appellant is charged is extortion, and the gist of it is the obtaining the property of another with his consent induced by fear of a threatened prosecution for a crime. For some cases the description of an offense by its generic name will indicate all the essentials of such offense. That is true of such well-known offenses as arson, burglary, larceny and murder. Fertig v. State, 14 Ariz. 540, 133 Pac. 99.

If the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, and with such a degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction, according to the rights of the case, and contains the formal allegations of jurisdictional facts, the information is sufficient. Section 943, Pen. Code 1913. Tested by this statutory rule, it seems to us that the information is sufficient. That it is not necessary in an indictment or information of extortion to give a technical description of the accusation threatened against the prosecutor is supported by Com. v. Philpot, 130 Mass. 59; State v. Lewis, 96 Ia. 286, 65 N. W. 293; Com. v. Murphy, 12 Allen (Mass.) 449; State v. Stewart, 90 Mo. 507, 2 S. W. 790; Williams v. State, 13 Tex. App. 285, 46 A.M. Rep. 237; Cohen v. State, 37 [294] Tex. Crim. 118, 38 S. W. 1005; State v. Robinson, 85 Me. 195, 27 Atl. 99. It is sufficient to charge that defendant threatened to accuse the prosecutor of a specified crime. Com. v. Goodwin, 122 Mass. 19; Com. v. Moulton, 108 Mass. 307; Com. v. Dorus, 108 Mass. 488; *Com. v. To properly understand the other two assignments of error, it is necessary to epitomize the facts as developed at the trial. The prosecuting witness Smith testified that defendant and three confederates enticed him, by representing to him that one of his cattle was down, to go to an out-of-the-way place near his ranch, and that upon his arrival there he was commanded by the defendant, who pointed a gun at him to enforce his orders, to take an ax that was given him and kill a cow that defendant and confederates had tied to a tree; that he did as directed; that after the animal was killed he asked defendant, "What he meant by pulling a gun on me and making me kill that cow." The defendant answered, "He wanted a hundred head of cattle or $3,000." "I told him I couldn't give him $3,000, nor a hundred head of cattle." "He said he would take the hide to Foster and Marshall (who were the owners), and he and what others he had on the hill there would swear against me and stick me." "I told him I couldn't get him $3,000, and he says: 'If you will give me what Foster and Marshall are giving me, $2000, I will let you off.'" That the defendant compelled him to help skin the animal, and said, taking the hide, "If I would pay him $200 the next morning he would keep the hide and not present it to Foster and Marshall." The prosecutor paid the $200 the following morning by check at defendant's home, and four days later gave defendant $1,600, and received the hide from defendant. The defendant's testimony differs from that of the prosecuting witness, in that he says he knew the prosecutor was going to kill the animal at the time and place named, and that he knew that Foster and Marshall were offering a reward for the apprehension of persons stealing their cattle, and, knowing these facts, he laid for Smith and caught him; that Smith begged him not to divulge to Foster and Marshall [295] his crime, and voluntarily gave him $1,800 to keep the crime a secret.

The evidence objected to by defendant, and the admission of which he assigns as error, was evidence given by the prosecuting witness of the defendant's pointing a gun at him, and of tracks leading to where the animal was killed. He says he was charged with extortion induced by use of threats; that the information does not charge the wrongful use of force; and that the state was permitted by such evidence to prove another and different offense than the one alleged in the information. The rule invoked by the appellant is not applicable to the facts of this case. The state was entitled to prove all the facts of the transaction, even though they did disclose another and different crime than that laid in the information. In his case, on the theory of the prosecution, it was evidently the plan or scheme of appellant to compel the prosecuting witness, by the assault with a gun upon him, to kill the animal, and then charge him with larceny and by superior numbers prove the charge, unless silence was purchased by the payment of $2,000. Indeed, the plan or scheme, if true, embraced three crimes, larceny of the animal, assault with a deadly weapon, and extortion, all involved in the one transaction. Jones, Commentaries on Evidence, sec. 145. People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286.

Proof of the tracks leading to the place where the animal was killed was also competent and relevant as corroborating the testimony of the prosecuting witness.

The court in instructing the jury as to what constituted "fear," instead of confining itself to the specific charge in the information, read all of section 513 of the Penal Code of 1913. It is contended by appellant that this was prejudicial error. Subdivisions 1, 3 and 4 of that section, defining fear induced by threats, should not have been read to the jury for the reason that the state did not rely upon the kinds of fear therein mentioned, but relied upon a fear induced by a threat to accuse the prosecuting witness of a crime. The definition given to the jury should have been restricted to the charge. The injection of the other circumstances constituting fear, under the facts of the case, were mere abstract propositions of law, and without place in the instruction.

[296] But as the evidence was all of the fear of being accused of grand larceny, it does not seem possible that the jury could have been misled or influenced in its verdict by this instruction in the form in which it was given, especially in view of the fact that the court in reading section 513, after subdivision 2, said: "This is the subdivision under which this action is brought." Simons v. State (Tex.) 34 S. W. 619; Hargrave v. State (Tex.) 30 S. W. 444.

The court submitted to the jury the question as to whether what was said and done by defendant in his threat constituted a threat to accuse the prosecuting witness of the crime of grand larceny, and in that connection defined larceny by reading sections 481, 483 and 484, Penal Code of 1913. What we have said concerning the instruction before this is applicable to this instruction. The court should have restricted its instruction to defining the kind threatened to be charged and proved on the trial.

The appellant complains of the court's instructions wherein the jury were told "that even though Smith was actually guilty of stealing the cow, and was caught in the act of butchering her, if the defendant, because of the fear that Smith had of being prosecuted, did use that as a means of frightening Smith into the payment of the money, and actually did frighten him into paying the money, and afterward did receive the money of Smith, the defendant would yet be guilty of extortion, and it would be your duty to so find him guilty." This is a correct statement of the law. People v. Choyinski, 95 Cal. 640, 30 Pac. 791; Kessler v. State, 50 Ind. 229; State v. Debolt, 104 Ia. 105, 73 N. W. 499; State v. Waite, 101 Ia. 377, 70 N. W. 596; People v. Eichler, 75 Hun 26, 26 N. Y. S. 998; People v. Wickes, 112 App. Div. 39, 98 N. Y. S. 163.

In People v. Eichler, supra, the court said:

"The fact that the person who, in writing or orally, makes such a threat for such a purpose believes or even knows that the person threatened has committed the crime of which he is threatened to be accused, does not make the act less criminal. The moral turpitude of threatening, for the purpose of obtaining money, to accuse a guilty person of the crime which he has committed is as great as it is to threaten, for a like purpose, an innocent person of having committed a crime. [297] The intent is the same in both cases, to acquire money without legal right, by threatening a criminal prosecution. But threatening a guilty person for such a purpose is a greater injury to the public than to threaten an innocent one, for the reason that the object is likely to be attained and the result is the concealment and compounding of felonies to the injury of the state."

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

NOTE.

Threat to Accuse of Crime as Criminal Offense.

It is intended in this note to consider the recent cases discussing the question whether a threat to accuse another of crime constitutes a criminal offense. For a review of the earlier cases see the notes to State v. Louanis, 9 Ann. Cas. 194, and State v. Coleman, 116 Am. St. Rep. 457.

In most jurisdictions, statutes, substantially similar in their terms, provide in effect that it shall be a criminal offense for any person to solicit money or other valuable thing, or attempt to gain any advantage over another, by threatening, either verbally or in writing, to accuse him of any crime. State v. Browning, 153 Ia. 37, 133 N. W. 330; Matter of Hart, 131 App. Div. 661, 116 N. Y. S. 193; Jones v. State, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 716, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. 363; In re Sherin, 27 S. D. 232, Ann. Cas. 1913D 446, 130 N. W. 761, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 801; Williams v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. 1, 100 S. W. 149. See also Schultz v. State, 135 Wis. 644, 114 N. W. 505, 116 N. W. 259, 571. And see the reported case. Thus in State v. Browning, supra, the court said that a threat to accuse another of crime unless he paid a sum of money or did something else against his will for the purpose of extortion was a malicious threat, though it was followed by an arrest. In the case of Matter of Hart, 131 App. Div. 661, 116 N. Y. S. 193, it was held that the service of a magistrate's summons procured by an attorney engaged to prosecute a civil action for assault on a young girl by the person served, while not the actual commencement of a criminal prosecution, amounted to a threat of such a prosecution. The court said: "It was at least as effective, if not more so, than a letter threatening a prosecution would have been, and from the whole evidence we cannot escape the conviction that the service of the summons from the magistrate's court was intended merely as a threat of a criminal prosecution made in order to force a settlement of the civil action which was contemplated and prepared for before the criminal summons was taken out, and that the respondent never actually intended to prosecute Crane criminally. If this be so, there can be no doubt that the respondent acted illegally, improperly and unprofessionally." In the case of Matter of Sherin, 27 S. D. 232, Ann. Cas. 1913D 446, 130 N. W. 761, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 801, it was held that the fact that the respondent, who was an attorney at law, was not seeking to obtain property for himself, and would not be benefited by obtaining it, was immaterial. The court said: "If, as claimed by the respondent himself, these letters were written by him with the full knowledge of his client, the respondent, in assisting her, by advising and writing the letters to carry out the scheme, rendered himself jointly guilty with her of the crime of extortion if, under such facts, she would be guilty."

It has been held to be a crime to threaten to accuse a person of fornication or adultery. People v. Gillette, 140 App. Div. 27, 124 N. Y. S. 470, reversing order 66 Misc. 516, 124

N. Y. S. 420; State v. Barr, 67 Wash. 87, 120 Pac. 509. Thus in People v. Gillette, supra, the indictment accused the relator and another of the crime of attempting to commit extortion by obtaining a sum of money by a verbal threat to accuse a married man publicly of the crime of having had sexual intercourse with a woman not his wife. Holding that a verbal threat was sufficient to constitute the felony, the court said: "The special county judge holds that, if the threat in extortion is verbal merely, it is only a misdemeanor; that in order to be a felony it must be a written threat, as well as the threat in blackmail. It seems to us this will not answer. If the legislature intended to provide that the threat must be written in order to constitute extortion, it would have so provided. Extortion and blackmail are punishable to the same extent, fifteen years. In extortion property must be actually obtained. In blackmail there need not be any property secured at all. The severity of the crime as regards the threat is in the fact of its being written instead of verbal."

It is immaterial whether the person against whom the threat is directed is guilty or innocent of the crime of which he is threatened to be accused. Matter of Hart, 131 App. Div. 661, 116 N. Y. S. 193; In re Sherin, 27 S. D. 232, Ann. Cas. 1913D 446, 130 N. W. 761, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 801; Rex v. Odell, 22 Can. Crim. Cas. 39. And see the reported case. Thus in the case of In re Sherin, supra, the court said: "It might be claimed that, inasmuch as the charges contained in such letters were true, no crime was committed by respondent. The offense before us lies, not in making the charges of wrongdoing upon the part of C and his paramour, but in making threats of prosecution based upon such charges. The fact that they were guilty of the crimes charged would not render the writing of the letters less criminal."

Under some statutes it has been held that the gist of the offense is the obtaining of money or other valuable thing by means of a threat. Eacock v. State, 169 Ind. 488, 82 N. E. 1039; Rex v. Odell, 22 Can. Crim. Cas. 39.

In State v. Nethercutt, 48 Wash. 105, 92 Pac. 938, it was held that a complaint charging the defendant with unlawfully, feloniously, wilfully, maliciously and verbally threatening another of having committed the crime of bribery with the intent to extort money and other pecuniary advantage did not charge a common-law offense.

STATE

v.

GISH.

Iowa Supreme Court—December 18, 1914. --

168 Iowa 70; 150 N. W. 37.

Automobiles — Operation of Automobile without Number Plates — Official Delay in Furnishing Plates.

Acts 34th Gen. Assem. c. 72, regulating automobiles, by section 3 requires the owner to register his machine with the secretary of state; and section 6 declares that on the filing of an application, and the payment of the fee, the secretary shall assign a number and without expense to the applicant issue and deliver, or forward by mail or express to such owner, a certificate of registration, and two number plates. Section 12 declares that no person shall operate a motor vehicle on the highways of the state after July 4, 1911, unless the vehicle shall have a distinctive number assigned to it by the secretary of state, and two number plates with numbers corresponding to those of the certificate of registration, conspicuously displayed, front and rear, section 22 declaring that a violation of sections 3-15, inclusive, of the act shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine. Held, that the gist of the offense was not the operation of a motor vehicle, but rather the failure to attach and display the number plates while so operating; and hence, where defendant had properly re-registered his machine for the year 1913, with the secretary of state, been assigned a number, and had paid the necessary license fee, but because of inability of the secretary to furnish plates, none had been received by defendant, his operation of his automobile with the plates for the previous year attached, by which it was properly identifiable until those for the year 1913 could be obtained, did not constitute a violation of the statute.

[See note at end of this case.]

License Tax — Validity.

A reasonable fee may be imposed by statute as an incident to the exercise of the state's police power to regulate the use of highways by motor vehicles.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1912D 239; Ann. Cas. 1914D 483.]

Violation of License Law — Proof of Venue Insufficient.

Where defendant, a resident of Hamilton county, while driving his automobile in Hardin county, was arrested for operating the same without having number plates for the current year displayed, and it did not appear that he had ever operated the machine in Hardin county prior to that date, the fact that he may have operated it in Hamilton county while he was in default will not justify his conviction in Hardin county, under an information charging the commission of the offense in that county.

Appeal from District Court, Hardin county: ALBROOK, Judge.

Criminal prosecution. B. H. Gish convicted of violation of motor vehicle statute and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Wesley Martin for appellant.
George Cosson for appellee.

[72] EVANS, J.—The information charged the defendant with the violation of Secs. 7, 8, and 12, of Chapter 72 of the Acts of the 34th General Assembly, in that on May 29, 1913, he operated upon the public highway his motor vehicle, without having displayed thereon registration numbers, as required by the statute. That the defendant was operating his motor vehicle upon the public highway on the date named and that no number plates for 1913 were displayed thereon was and is conceded. His denial of guilt was predicated upon his inability to obtain from the secretary of state his official number plates, he himself having complied with every prerequisite of the statute to entitle him to such number plates. He offered evidence tending to prove that more than one month prior to May 29, he had properly re-registered his motor vehicle with the secretary of state and had paid the full fee required therefor; and also tending to show that the re-registration had in fact been entered by the secretary of state and a 1913 number assigned to the defendant, and that the re-registration receipt, including the number, had been received by the defendant; that the defendant failed to receive his number plates and that such failure was through no fault on his part. This line of evidence was all rejected on the ground that the sole question to be tried was whether the defendant operated his motor vehicle upon the public highway at the time alleged without displaying the required number plates. Upon this holding the defendant was necessarily convicted, regardless of the reason for the failure to display number plates and regardless of the question of his own default in relation thereto. We are first confronted, [73] therefore, with the necessity of construing the statute upon which the prosecution is based.

The information charged the violation of sections 7, 8, and 12 of Chapter 72 of the Acts of the 34th General Assembly "and amendments thereto." This chapter was amended by chapter 130 of the Acts of the 35th General Assembly. By this amending chapter, substitutes were enacted in lieu of sections 7 and 8 of the previous statute. Such substitutes, however, made no changes in sections 7 and 8 that bear upon any question involved in this case. For the convenience of this discussion, therefore, we will take no account of the amending Chapter 130, Laws Thirty-fifth General Assembly, and will refer to the sections as numbered in the previous statute. The evidence on the trial disclosed no violation of Secs. 7 and 8. The only offense contended for by the state was the violation of Sec. 12, which is as follows:

"Sec. 12. No person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle on the public highways of this state after the fourth of July, nineteen hundred eleven, unless such vehicle shall have a distinctive number assigned to it by the secretary of state, and two number plates with numbers corresponding to that of the certificate of registration conspicuously displayed, one on the front and one on the rear of such vehicle, each securely fastened so as to prevent the same from swinging."

Section 3 of the act in question puts the duty of initiative upon the owner of a motor vehicle and requires him to register such vehicle with the secretary of state and to furnish certain data in his application for such registration. Sections 7 and 8 provide for the payment of the annual fee to the same officer. Section 5 lays upon the secretary of state the duty to make the registration in a public record and to assign to the vehicle a "distinctive number." Section 6 provides as follows:

"Sec. 6. Upon the filing of such application and the payment of the fee hereinafter provided, the secretary of state [74] shall assign to such motor vehicle a distinctive number and, without expense to the applicant, issue and deliver or forward by mail or express to the owner a certificate of registration, in such form as the Secretary of State shall prescribe, and two number plates."

When the owner has complied on his own part with every requirement of the statute necessary to entitle him to receive the number plates from the secretary of state, and he fails to receive the same only because such official is unable to furnish them, is this a lawful excuse for his failure to display such number plates upon his motor vehicle? And in such case, is it a violation of Sec. 12 to operate such vehicle upon the public highway without displaying such number plates?

To put it in another way, what is the gist of the offense defined in such section? Is it the operation of the motor vehicle? Or is it the failure to attach and display the number plates while operating the vehicle?

It will be noted that Sec. 12, above quoted, in terms prohibits the operation of a motor vehicle upon the public highways "unless such vehicle shall have a distinctive number assigned to it by the secretary of state and two number plates . . . conspicuously displayed, etc." Construing this section alone without regard to any constitutional limitation and without regard to the alternating duties of the owner and the secretary of state as specified in the preceding sections already referred to, it would bear the construction put upon it by the trial court. According to such construction, the operation of the vehicle is absolutely prohibited if number plates cannot be obtained, regardless of any fault on the part of the owner. This construction has its analogy in the construction adopted by us of the statutes relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors and to permits and consents to sell. The reason of such construction of such statutes is that absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors is the rule in this state and that [75] such prohibition is not lifted except by the full performance of the necessary conditions precedent.

These statutes and our construction thereof rest upon the undoubted legislative authority to enact absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors. If the legislature has authority to enact absolute prohibition of the use of motor vehicles, it might afford a reason why an analogous construction should be put upon Sec. 12 above quoted as is put upon such statutes relating to sales of intoxicating liquors. But counsel for the state do not claim so broad a legislative authority. Doubtless no one will contend that the legislature can absolutely prohibit the use of motor vehicles without transcending its constitutional limitations. It may regulate their use; but it can no more prohibit such use than it could prohibit the use of lumber wagons. The right of regulation rests upon its own peculiar ground, and is free from constitutional objection. As a means of such regulation, there may be imposed upon the owner reasonable duties which shall be performed by him as a condition precedent to his use of the vehicle.

Taking the entire legislative act now under consideration, it is manifestly a regulation of the use of motor vehicles and not an attempted prohibition thereof. It ought, therefore, to be construed consistently with its character in that regard. The gist of the violation, therefore, must be not the mere use of the motor vehicle by the owner, but the failure of the owner to perform the statutory duties laid upon him as conditions precedent to its use. In order that the owner may be constitutionally precluded from the use of his vehicle, he must himself be found in default in the performance of some statutory duty imposed upon him as a condition precedent to its use.

Turning now to Secs. 3, 7, and 8 of the act in question, we have already noted that they require a registration, or application for registration, and the payment of the required fee by the owner of the vehicle. Thereupon Secs. 5 and 6 of the act define the duties of the secretary of state in relation to [76] such registration. These duties include that of forwarding to the owner, without expense, "two number plates."

These number plates being furnished, Sec. 12 casts upon the owner the duty to attach them to his vehicle "conspicuously displayed." If, in the case before us, the number plates had been received by the defendant and he had failed to use them in the manner specified, he would be clearly guilty of violating Sec. 12. Assuming, however, as the rejected evidence tended to show, that the secretary of state failed to forward the number plates, manifestly the defendant could not be in default for failure to attach them. He could neither supply them himself nor substitute others for them. Section 12 must be construed in the light of Sec. 6. Section 6 in terms undertakes that number plates shall be furnished to the owner. The mandate of Sec. 12 that such number plates shall be attached to and conspicuously displayed upon the vehicle necessarily rests upon the implication that the requirements of Sec. 6 shall have been first duly performed. Counsel for the state do not contend for any power in the legislature to penalize the owner of a vehicle for failure of the state official to furnish the number plates. Their contention is that he is subject to penalty for using his vehicle before getting the number plates. To put it in another way, that he is subject to penalty for not desisting from the use of his vehicle until he shall receive the number plates, however long the delay. But to compel the owner to desist from the use of his vehicle for an indefinite length of time because of the inability of the official machinery of the state to furnish him the number plates, as contemplated by the statute, would of itself amount to a very practical penalty which might operate more seriously upon him than the maximum fine imposed by the statute. If the legislature is without power to impose upon him a direct penalty for the mere default or failure of another, the statute ought not to be construed so as to impose an indirect penalty upon him under the same circumstances and without any default on his own part. The owner's right to the use of his [77] vehicle after complying with the statutory duties imposed upon him is a substantial property right. It is common knowledge that the daily business of thousands of people in the state is dependent upon the daily use of such vehicles. It is a matter of public notoriety, also, that the machinery provided by the state for the furnishing of number plates has sometimes proved inadequate to meet the demands upon it; and that the secretary of state, without fault on his own part, has been unable sometimes to furnish number plates to those entitled to them without long delay. The construction of the statute which is contended for by the state would require many thousands of vehicles to stand unused waiting for some belated factory to perform its broken contract with the secretary of state. These considerations should not be overlooked in ascertaining the legislative intent, because these are conditions which arise naturally out of the practical operation of the law.

It is urged by counsel for the state that if the secretary of state failed to send to defendant his number plates, then such official is himself liable for violation of the statute, and that defendant has his remedy against him for such breach of duty. We see no substantial aid to the prosecution in this suggestion. It may be conceded that under a strict and literal construction of this act the secretary of state would be liable to punishment thereunder for his failure to send the number plates, however helpless he might be to do so. The penal provision of the act is Sec. 22, as follows:

"Sec. 22. The violation of any of the provisions of sections from three to fifteen both inclusive, of this act shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding fifty dollars."

This argument only emphasizes the absurdity of result to which we would be logically led by adopting the construction of the act thus contended for. It is practically inconceivable that the legislature intended to punish a state official [78] for failing to perform an official act which for the time being was impossible. It is quite as inconceivable that it should intend such failure to result in penalty to a private citizen who was himself helpless either to prevent or to supply such failure.

Assuming, as we must, that the defendant could have proved the facts which his offered evidence tended to prove and that he could have shown himself free from all default in the performance of the precedent duties imposed upon him by the statute, it is repugnant to every sense of justice that he should be punished for his mere inability to obtain from the state the number plates due him. No statute ought to be construed to such a result if it will fairly bear a different construction. The purpose, of course, of statutory construction is to ascertain and declare legislative intent as expressed in the statute. It has often been held, however, that where a literal construction of a statute leads to absurdity or to manifest injustice or oppression, the court will not be bound by literal terms, but will seek a construction consistent with a sense of justice, if possible, and will presume such to have been the intent of the legislature. The following excerpts from some of the cases sufficiently support this proposition:

"'Acts of Parliament are to be construed as no man that is innocent or free from injury or wrong be by a literal construction punished or endangered.' Margate Pier Co. v. Hannam, 3 B. & Ald. (Eng.) 266 [5 E. C. L. 278]. 'If a literal construction of the words of a statute be absurd, the act must be so construed as to avoid the absurdity.' State v. Clark, 29 N. J. L. 96. 'All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the Legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter.' U. S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 278. 'It is [79] a familiar rule that a thing may be within the letter of the statute, and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit nor within the intention of its makers. This is not a substitution of the will of the judge of that of the legislator, for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include the act in question, and yet a consideration of the whole legislation or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words makes it unreasonable to believe that the Legislature intended to include the particular act.' Holy Trinity Church v. U. S. 143 U. S. 457, 12 S. Ct. 511, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 226. 'A thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute unless it be within the intention of the makers.' Jackson v. Collins, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 89. See also Ryegate v. Wardsboro, 30 Vt. 746; Murray v. Hobson, 10 Colo. 66, 13 Pac. 921; Com. v. Kimball, 24 Pick. (Mass.) 366; Whitney v. Whitney, 14 Mass. 88; Pierce v. Emory, 32 N. H. 508; Austin v. State, 22 Ind. App. 221, 53 N. E. 481." State v. O'Neil, 147 Ia. 513, 533, Ann. Cas. 1912B 691, 126 N. W. 454, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 788.

The manifest purpose of requiring registration and the display of official number plates is (1) to accomplish in advance the collection of the license or registration fee, and (2) to furnish a means of identification of the vehicle.

The pre-eminent purpose, however, of requiring annual re-registration and annual number plates (which is the requirement involved in the case at bar) is to accomplish the collection of the annual fee. Identification is not aided by mere re-registration or by a change of numbers or plates.

According to the offered evidence in the case at bar, the re-registration was made; the annual fee was paid. There was no evasion of means of identification. On the contrary, the defendant carried on display his 1912 number plates as such. No better means of identification were available. Having responded to the purpose and spirit of the law, and having [80] performed its letter as to every duty precedent imposed upon him, the defendant is hailed for punishment only because the official machinery of the state temporarily failed to perform the impossible task laid upon it.

We reach the conclusion, therefore, that Sec. 12 must be read as pursuant to Sec. 6. If the owner of a motor vehicle is otherwise free from default, his duty to attach and display his number plates as provided in Sec. 12 cannot arise until such number plates due him shall have been furnished by the secretary of state, as required by Sec. 6, and implied by such Sec. 12 as a fact accomplished. This duty imposed upon the owner by Sec. 12 arises out of, and follows after, the performance of the requirements imposed upon the state official by Sec. 6. It is therefore necessarily in abeyance until such antecedent requirement be performed. Any other construction would impose upon him an impossible duty. It is an old legal maxim, applicable to criminal cases especially, that there can be no obligation to perform the impossible: Impossibilium nulla obligatio est. For an application of this maxim, see authorities cited in 21 Cyc. 1741. It follows, therefore, that defendant's offered evidence tended to prove that on May 29, 1913, he was not himself in default as to any regulatory condition precedent to his right to use his vehicle. Granted that his use of the vehicle without displaying the number plates was sufficient prima-facie evidence against him as tending to show his default, we hold that he was entitled to show affirmatively as a defense that he had complied with all the requirements of the statute on his own part and had failed to receive his number plates through no fault of his own.

This construction saves the spirit of the act and perhaps its validity. If there is any evasion of the letter of the act, it is only because "the letter killeth," as it is sometimes wont to do.

2. Considerable attention has been devoted by appellant's counsel to the constitutionality of the act as a whole. The [81] main ground of attack has been upon that feature of the statute which imposes a registration fee in lieu of all others forms of taxation. The argument is that this adopts a special method of taxation for this particular property and a special method of distribution of the taxes thus collected, so as to deprive certain municipalities from all benefits of such taxation. The objectionable features of the statute in this regard are all contained in Sec. 9. This section provides for the cancellation of all assessments of motor vehicles upon the assessors' books, and provides for an exemption from all taxation except the registration fee. If appellant's contention were sustained in this regard, it would avail him nothing in this case. Our pronouncement, therefore, would be mere dictum. The statute in question involves not only the taxing power, but the police power of regulation as well. If we were to strike down Sec. 9, which section alone involves the exercise of the taxing power, it would still leave the remainder of the act quite intact and independent and involving only an exercise of the police power. That a reasonable fee may be imposed as an incident to the exercise of the police power of regulation is too well settled to require citation of authorities. Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright, 225 U. S. 540, 32 S. Ct. 784, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1197; Engel v. O'Malley, 219 U. S. 128, 31 S. Ct. 190, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 128; St. Louis v. Williams, 235 Mo. 503, 139 S. W. 340.

Appellant does not assail the registration fee as being excessive. His own position is that he paid it and without protest. To strike out Sec. 9, therefore, would open no door of escape to the defendant, but on the contrary would subject his motor vehicle to assessment and taxation by the regular taxing officials.

3. The dissenting opinion filed herewith renders it necessary that a few further facts be detailed. The emphasis of the dissent seems to be put upon the suggestion that the date of the offense as alleged in the information, viz., May 29, 1913, was not material and that the defendant might have been found guilty for violation of the statute as of April 26, 1913. The defendant [82] himself testified: "I didn't start using my machine until the twenty-sixth day of April." Granting the foregoing to be sufficient to permit the affirmative inference that the defendant did use his vehicle on that date, there was no claim in the trial below that the state was entitled to a conviction for such offense, nor would the evidence in the record before us sustain a conviction as for an offense committed on any other date than May 29, 1913.

The defendant was arrested at Iowa Falls in Hardin County on the evening of May 29, 1913, under an information charging him with the violation of the statute on such date in Hardin County. He was convicted before a justice of the peace and appealed to the Hardin District Court. The defendant was not a resident of Hardin county. He was a resident of Blairsburg in Hamilton County. On May 29, he came in his vehicle to Iowa Falls to attend a funeral. While there he was arrested, as already indicated. There is no suggestion of evidence in the record that the defendant had ever operated his vehicle in Hardin County prior to that date. If he was not guilty of committing the offense on May 29, then, under the evidence, he was not guilty of any offense at any time within the jurisdiction of the Hardin County courts. If it were true, therefore, that he had operated his vehicle on April 26 in his home county while he was in default in the payment of his annual registration fee, this would not justify his conviction in Hardin County under this information.

The significance of these dates is that the defendant offered to prove that on April 26, 1913, he remitted to the secretary of state the full registration fee of $12.96 by bank draft drawn to the order of the secretary of state. The cancelled draft bearing such date was offered in evidence and was ruled out on the objection of the state. The defendant also offered in evidence the receipt of the secretary of state for such fee, such receipt being as follows:

[83] "State of Iowa, Department of State, W. S. Allen, Secretary. C. G. Watkins, Deputy. R. S. Hayward, Chief Deputy. Motor Vehicle Department. Certificate No. 52607. Fee Paid $12.96.

"Des Moines, Iowa, May 27, 1913. This is to certify that B. H. Gish of Blairsburg, Iowa, has registered an Automobile described in application on file in this department and has paid the fee required by law for the period ending December 31, 1913.

"W. S. Allen, Secretary of State.

"By K.

"Number assigned 52607."

The state objected to this evidence on the ground that "the sole and only question being tried in this case is the question whether the defendant operated a motor vehicle on the public highway of this state on May 29, 1913, without it having on a registration plate for the year 1913, and for the reason that Exhibit 'B' is incompetent and immaterial."

The question was thus squarely presented whether it was open to the defendant to prove that he was free from default on his own part in that he had complied with all the requirements of the statute on his part within such time as to have entitled him to the receipt of the number plates from the state official prior to May 29, the date of his arrest in Hardin County. The adverse ruling closed this door. We hold that such fact, if proved, was available to him and that the proffered evidence should have been received.

Whether the defendant was necessarily in default prior to April 26, by his failure to pay the registration fee prior to such date and while his vehicle was not in operation, is a question not material to our present consideration. He terminated such default, if any, by payment on such date. Previous default would not render him a permanent outlaw. Even though in default, he was under continued obligation to pay. By performing his obligation on that date, he discharged [84] it in full. He became thereby entitled to his number plates within a reasonable time and in the ordinary course of mail or express.

We shall not be swift to find any obstacle at any time to the diligent enforcement of the statute under consideration. It goes without saying that every person liable thereunder for registration fees should be required to pay the same and should be punished for operating a car without such payment. Where a defendant is found guilty in a prosecution under this statute, it is provided that judgment shall be entered against him not only for the fine imposed, but also for the amount of the registration fee due from him. The amount of such registration fee thus collected is to be thereupon remitted to the secretary of state. This proviso of the statute rests upon the assumption that failure to pay the registration fee may be deemed as of the very gist of the offense charged thereunder. However, to punish an owner for alleged violation of this statute when his money has lain for weeks in the office of the secretary of state and while he himself has fully performed every act which the statute requires or permits him to do as a condition precedent to the receipt of his number plates, is not an enforcement of the statute in any just sense. To enter judgment against him for a registration fee which had already been receipted for by the secretary of state would be mere travesty.

We hold, therefore, as already indicated, (1) That where the owner of a motor vehicle has fully complied with all the requirements of Secs. 3, 7, and 8 of the statute so as to entitle him to receive number plates from the secretary of state as provided by Sec. 6, and where he fails to receive his number plates within a reasonable time through no default of his own, then he is not guilty of violation of the statute by a mere failure to attach such number plates. In such case, the duty to attach the plates as required by Sec. 12 can only arise after the requirements of Sec. 6 shall have been performed by the secretary of state. In such case, also, the failure of the [85] secretary of state to comply with the requirements of Sec. 6 cannot operate as a bar against the operation of the vehicle by the owner.

(2) That the proffered evidence rejected by the court below was competent and material in support of the defense herein considered, and it should have been received.

The judgment below is therefore reversed.

Reversed and remanded.

Ladd, C. J., Weaver, Preston, Gaynor and Withrow, JJ., concur.

DEEMER, J. (dissenting).—The majority have, in my opinion, made the case turn upon a proposition not contended for in argument, and one not fairly arising on the record. As I understand the printed record it shows that defendant purchased and began using his automobile in the year 1911. He paid his taxes thereon for that year, and also for the year 1912; but did nothing toward paying his taxes and securing his number plates for the year 1913 until April 26, of that year. Appellant told at least two witnesses that he had been running his car during the whole of the year 1913, down to the time of his arrest on May 29th, with no other than his 1912 number plates on. Defendant himself admitted on the witness stand that he started using his machine with the 1912 number plates on, on April 26, 1913, which was the very day he sent his money to the secretary of state, without giving the state officials any time to accept the amount sent, to send the official receipt, or the number plates for 1913.

It is true that the secretary of state did not send an official receipt until May 27, 1913, and there is no showing as to when it reached the defendant. It is also true that defendant was arrested on May 29th and that the information filed against him alleged his violation of the law as on May 29, 1913.

The statute upon which the charge was based is both a revenue measure and a police regulation. Unless it be so construed, it is, in my opinion, unconstitutional; for construed [86] as a police regulation the fee charged is so large as to wholly defeat the law. So far as material, it reads as follows:

"Sec. 3. Every owner of a motor vehicle which shall be operated or driven upon the public highways of this state shall, except as herein otherwise expressly provided, cause to be filed in the office of the secretary of state, a verified application for registration on a blank to be furnished by the secretary of state for that purpose, containing: (a) a brief description of the motor vehicle to be registered, including the name of the manufacturer and factory number of such vehicle, the character and, if the motive power be derived from the products of petroleum, the amount of the motive power stated in figures of horse power in accordance with the rating established by the Association of Licensed

Automobile Manufacturers, and the number of cylinders, bore and stroke of each; (b) the name and post-office address with street number if in a city, including county and business address of the owner of such motor vehicle.

"Sec. 5. Upon receipt of an application for registration of a motor vehicle, as provided in this act, the secretary of state shall file such application in his office and register such motor vehicle with the name, post-office address and business address of the owner, manufacturer or dealer, as the case may be together with the facts stated in such application, in a book or index to be kept for the purpose, under the distinctive number assigned to such motor vehicles by the secretary of state, which book or index shall be open to public inspection during reasonable business hours.

"Upon the filing of such application and the payment of the fee hereinafter provided, the secretary of state shall assign to such motor vehicle a distinctive number, and without expense to the applicant, issue and deliver or forward by mail or express to the owner a certificate of registration, in such form as the secretary of state shall prescribe, and two number plates. In the event of the loss, mutilation or destruction of [87] any number plate, the owner of a registered motor vehicle, or manufacturer or dealer, as the case may be, may obtain from the secretary of state a duplicate thereof upon filing in the office of the secretary of state an affidavit showing such facts and the payment of a fee of one dollar; duplicate certificates of registration may be issued by the secretary of state, in like cases, without the payment of any fee therefor.

"Registration shall be renewed annually in the same manner and upon the payment of the annual fee as provided in section eight (8) for registration, to take effect on the first day of January in each year; provided, that the secretary of state shall withhold the re-registration of any motor vehicle the owner of which shall have failed to register the same for any previous period or periods for which it appears that registration should have been made, until the fee for such previous period or periods shall be paid. All certificates of registration issued under the provisions of this act shall expire on the last day of the calendar year in which they were issued.

"The following fee shall be paid to the secretary of state upon the registration or re-registration of a motor vehicle in accordance with the provisions of this act; eight dollars ($8.00) upon the registration of a motor vehicle having a rating of twenty (20) horse power or less; and for each such vehicle which shall exceed twenty (20) horse power in rating, the owner shall pay at the rate of forty (40) cents per horse power; provided, that if a motor vehicle shall have been licensed for four separate successive years under the laws of this state, and for which there shall have been paid four registration fees as provided by statute therefor, or any motor vehicle which shall have been in use for a period of not less than four years prior to August first of such registration period for which registration is about to be made, the annual registration fee thereafter shall be one-half that amount; and further provided, that the annual fee for the registration or re-registration of any electric or steam motor vehicle in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be fifteen ($15.00) [88] dollars; . . . and provided further, that the fee for registering any theretofore unregistered motor vehicle under the provisions of this act, which motor vehicle shall be purchased on or after August first of any year, shall be one-half of the annual fee therefor, for the remainder of that calendar year; and provided further, that each manufacturer or dealer selling or otherwise disposing of motor vehicles, theretofore unregistered in this state, to residents of this state shall report to the secretary of state each such sale made on or after August first of each calendar year; such reports shall be made on blanks to be furnished by the secretary of state upon request, and shall be made in such manner as he may direct; and provided further, that no motor vehicle shall be registered for less than the annual fee because of its having been purchased on or after September first until such manufacturer's or dealer's report shall have been filed as herein provided.

"The registration fees imposed by this act upon motor vehicles, other than those of manufacturers and dealers, shall be in lieu of all taxes, general or local, to which motor vehicles may be subject. It shall be the duty of the county auditor of each county to cancel all assessments entered upon the assessor's books against automobiles for 1911, and no assessments upon automobiles, as made by assessors for 1911, shall be carried upon the tax lists.

"Upon the sale or transfer of a motor vehicle registered in accordance with the provisions of this act, the vendor shall immediately give notice thereof with his name, post-office address and registration number, and the name and address of the vendee, to the secretary of state, and the vendee shall, within ten days after the date of such sale or transfer, notify the secretary of state thereof upon a blank furnished promptly by him for that purpose, stating the name, post-office address, and business address of the previous owner, the number under which such motor vehicle is registered, and the name, post-office address, with street number if in a city, including county and business address, of the vendee. Upon filing such statement [89] duly verified such vendee shall pay the secretary of state a fee of one dollar, and upon receipt of such statement and fee the secretary of state shall file such statement in his office and note upon the registration book or index such change in ownership.

"Upon the sale of a motor vehicle by a manufacturer or dealer, the vendee shall at once make application by mail or otherwise for registration thereof, after which he may operate the same upon the public highways without its individual number plates thereon for a period of not more than fifteen (15) days, providing that during such period the motor vehicle shall have attached thereto, in accordance with the provisions hereof, metal number plates to be furnished by the secretary of state to the dealer as provided in Sec. 15 bearing the registration number of the manufacturer or dealer under which it might previously have been operated for demonstration purposes; and provided further, that no manufacturer or dealer shall permit the use of his demonstration or registration number by such vendee until application for registration be so made as aforesaid, and it shall be his duty to assist the vendee in making out and filing his said application for registration, and for that purpose to keep on hand a supply of blanks to be furnished by the secretary of state upon request.

"No person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle on the public highways of this state after the fourth of July, nineteen hundred eleven, unless such vehicle shall have a distinctive number assigned to it by the secretary of state, and two number plates with numbers corresponding to that of the certificate of registration conspicuously displayed, one on the front and one on the rear of such vehicle, each securely fastened so as to prevent the same from swinging.

"Registration provided for in section fifteen (15) shall be renewed annually in the same manner and on the payment of the same fee as provided in section fifteen (15) for original registrations, such renewal to take effect on the first day of January of each year. The provisions of section seven (7) [90] relating to renewals and duration of renewals under this act shall apply to registrations and re-registration under this section. Within sixty (60) days after the first of January annually, the secretary of state shall prepare and forward to the county attorney of each county a list of the owners of motor vehicles in said county, who may have failed or neglected to pay the registration fee required by this act, whereupon the county attorney shall immediately proceed to enforce the provisions of this act, as herein provided.

"The violation of any of the provisions of sections from three to fifteen, both inclusive, of this act shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding fifty dollars; provided, that on conviction for a violation of sections eight and twelve hereof, or either of them, in case such motor vehicle shall not have been registered as required by this act, the court shall enter judgment against and collect from the person or persons so convicted, in addition to the penalty hereinabove provided, such sum as may be sufficient to pay the proper registration fee for said motor vehicle so unlawfully driven or operated, and forward such fee to the secretary of state at once, for the proper registration of such motor vehicle." (Acts Thirty-fourth General Assembly, Ch. 72, as amended by Acts Thirty-fifth General Assembly, Ch. 130.)

Provisions are also made for the suspension and revocation of the privilege granted under these and other sections, and penalties are imposed for the violation of other provisions of this act. The sections quoted, with others for the distribution of the funds, clearly indicate that this is a revenue measure, as well as a police regulation, and that the fiscal year begins on the first day of January. As I read the law, if one was the owner of an automobile on the 31st day of December, 1912, it was his duty on or before that day to send in his application, especially if he expected to operate his machine during the coming year, 1913. The tax was due January 1st, and became delinquent not later than sixty days after that [91] time; for at the expiration of the sixty days after January 1st, the secretary of state was required to send a list of all automobile owners who had not paid their license (or tax) to the county attorneys of the respective counties, which attorneys are required to enforce the provisions of the act.

Although not in my opinion necessary to a proper decision of this case, I am disposed to think that this tax may be collected by the county attorney after the expiration of the sixty days, from every owner of an automobile on January 1st of each year, although he may not expect to use his machine that year at all. Automobiles are not exempted from taxation either by this act or any other. A specific tax is fixed in lieu of all others, and this tax is collected by a different administrative body and distributed in a different manner from other taxes on personal property; but it is none the less a tax, and the tax is not, I think, imposed on the use of the machine but on the ownership thereof. All personal property should bear its just proportion of the taxes, whether used or not, and I do not see any evidence of an intent on the part of the legislature to exempt automobiles which remain inactive for any portion or the whole of a year, from the burdens of taxation. If such be the intent, then one owning a machine on the first day of January may permit it to remain idle until after July first, and then make his application and pay but one-half the tax, although he had been the owner of the machine for the entire year. Moreover, he may buy a machine after July first, and if he does not run it during the remainder of the season, he is exempt from all taxes the remainder of that year.

If the taxing feature is upon the operation rather than on the ownership of the machine, what becomes of Sec. 16 of the act, requiring the county attorney to collect taxes from the owners of automobiles in his county who have not complied with the provisions of the act? It seems to me, further, that automobiles are only exempt from the general tax in the event the owners pay the taxes imposed under the new law, or, speaking more accurately, that these taxes are in lieu of all [92] others. The greater part of the money collected is redistributed to the counties, and is used as a tax and it seems to me that this tax is and must be collectible in some manner, and doubtless by an action at law against the party in default. When the tax is once paid, the machine may be registered by a purchaser from the owner during the fiscal year at an expense of but one dollar, and it is incumbent upon the vendor to give notice of his sale or transfer. However, I do not, as already stated, regard this as a controlling feature of the case.

As to the police features of the case, the provision as to display the number of plates, with the annual change in color, it seems to me that this is not only for the purpose of identifying the owner, but also a method whereby the local taxing officials may know that the owner has paid his tax. Why the change of color of the plate each year save as a means of enforcing the payment of the tax?

It is said that the defendant did all that was required of him, and that he was therefore entitled to run his machine, after sending a draft to the secretary of state, although he had not received his number plates, and was operating in plain violation of the statute. The reasons given for this conclusion are that any other construction of the statutes would make them absurd, and also because it required of defendant the performance of the impossible. The majority uphold the constitutionality of the law in all its particulars, and the defendant escapes punishment for the sole and only reason that he was not in default; that he had done everything required of him, and that the blame was wholly with the secretary of state, or with some of the employees in that office.

It is conceded that the defendant did not pay his tax, or offer to do so, until April 26th; that he commenced running his machine on the very day he sent his draft to the secretary of state; and that he did not have the 1913 number plates on his machine as required by law, at any time prior to his arrest on May 29th.

Under these concessions, to say nothing of admissions [93] made by the defendant, which were undenied, that he had been operating his machine during the whole of the year 1913, down to May 29th, with none but his 1912 number plates displayed, I think he was clearly guilty of the offense charged against him, and that we should not search for some method of escape for him. Under no construction of the law would he be permitted to operate his machine from the day he sent his draft to the secretary of state. The latter official would have a reasonable time to acknowledge the receipt, assign the number, and send number plates, and during this reasonable time, which would necessarily be dependent upon the circumstances of the office and other things indicative of the reasonableness of the delay, the defendant would not be justified in operating his machine in violation of the statute.

Impossibility of performance is quite as available to the secretary of state as to the defendant, and just as much an excuse for him. Indeed, I doubt if there is any question of impossibility of performance in the case. It was quite possible for defendant to have ceased operating his machine until the law was complied with. He did not have to operate his machine at all, much less to operate it without the required number plates. Had he kept his machine in the barn or garage he would not have been arrested for violation of the police feature of this act. He chose to take his chances on violating it, and the most that can be said of his case is that he is compelled to rely upon the default of another as an excuse for his act. This I do not think he is legally entitled to do.

The statute is not absurd even if it be construed as the state contends it should be. It may be burdensome; but that is no reason for setting aside a valid police regulation. All police regulations are more or less burdensome, and interfere with what some men think is their personal liberty, but this is no reason for setting them aside or declaring them invalid. Police regulations are for the common good, and although burdensome on the individual, the greater good to all is deemed paramount to individual convenience. Better allow these [94] dangerous machines to remain in their stables for a time, even if the secretary of state be somewhat negligent, than to endanger life and property.

It is said the old number would sufficiently identify the defendant. If so, why require a change of number and a change of color each year? To such identification it would be necessary for one desirous of identification to notice not only the number, but the color or shape of the plate or perhaps both, and this although the night might be dark and the color obscured by dust. At any rate, the law prescribed what the identification plates shall be for each year, and the owner or driver has no power to substitute another, even though it might be his name and address in large letters or figures, conspicuously painted or displayed. The doctrine of impossibility is not in the case, and the statute is not unreasonable in its terms.

The secretary of state is not relieved of liability to one injured in any way for the nonperformance of his duties, and he cannot, in my opinion, either by action or inaction, intentional or unintentional, relieve another from his duty to observe a proper police regulation of the state.

But aside from all of this, and as completely answering, to my mind, every claim made for and on behalf of the defendant, whether in argument of his counsel or otherwise, is the fact, conceded of record, that defendant himself was at all times at fault, and therefore in no position to take advantage of any delay, if there was any, on the part of the secretary of state. His re-registration was due not later than January 1st, 1913, and he did not make application until April 26th. His taxes were delinquent, under the old law, thirty days after January 1st, and under the new, sixty days after January 1st. His name, if the secretary of state did his duty, was in the hands of the county attorney on February 1, 1913, and the county attorney should have proceeded to collect his tax or require re-registration at once. Giving the defendant even the sixty days of grace, to wit, until March 1, 1913, he did not [95] do anything until April 26th, which was nearly two months after the taxes should have been apportioned by the secretary of state and sent to the county treasurers of the several counties. Giving the defendant the benefit of every doubt, it does not appear, nor did he offer to prove, that had he made timely application he would not have received his number plates by the time he desired, as he says, to run his car. Had he complied with the law on his part, it is entirely problematical, so far as this record is concerned, whether he would have received his official receipt and number plates within time to answer his purposes or not. Being a long time in default himself, he is not, in my judgment, entitled to now rely upon what he claims was the subsequent default of another. It was easy for defendant to comply with the law as to re-registration. He did not do so, and it is a familiar principle of law that one cannot profit from his own wrong or complain of the neglect of another when he himself is also in default.

What exceptions might be made by judicial construction to the rule of the statute were the defendant himself not in default, there is no occasion now to decide, and indeed I think we should not decide it until a proper case arises. According to defendant's own admission, he was guilty of a violation of the law, because he commenced running his machine on the day he sent his draft to the secretary of state, without waiting to know whether it would be accepted or not. In such circumstances, particularly where, as here, he was himself in default, for many weeks if not months, I do not feel that we should set aside a statute by introducing questionable exceptions to the rules therein provided for the general good of all.

It is an old maxim, and a true one, that "hard cases are likely to make bad laws," but to my mind this is not a hard case. It is one arising solely, so far as this record is concerned, out of defendant's own default. It is entirely probable that had defendant made his application in time, it would have received prompt attention; and not a violent presumption to indulge that there was an adequate force in the office of the [96] secretary of state from January down to the time these matters were turned over to the county attorneys, to have reasonably taken care of all applications. Surely there is no proof to the contrary, and every presumption is indulged in favor of the acts of a public official.

Moreover, after these matters are turned over to the county attorneys there is an implication, at least, that they are to collect the taxes or re-registration fees (doubtless with some compensation for their work) and if money is thereafter sent to the secretary of state, he would of necessity have to be given time to investigate and to take the matter up with the county attorney interested, if for no other reason than to adjust his compensation. Again, we may well assume that after these matters are turned over to the county attorneys the office force in the automobile department of the secretary's office might be materially decreased. All of these things should, under any theory, be given weight; but according to the majority opinion, as I understand it, defendant practically goes acquit, because he was not required to do the impossible, that is, to run his automobile according to law.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—10.

As already indicated, I would not be so much concerned over the rule announced by the majority were it not for the fact that, so far as this record shows, the defendant himself brought about the very things of which he complains; was himself in default without any shadow of excuse, and persisted in running his machine contrary to a valid police regulation of the state. I would affirm the judgment on defendant's own statement of the facts.

NOTE.

Right of Person Entitled to License or Evidence Thereof to Do Act for Which License Is Required.

License Granted but Not Delivered.

The reported case arose under a statute making it an offense to operate a motor vehicle on the public highways of the state without registering the vehicle and displaying the distinctive license number assigned to it by the secretary of state for the current year. The defendant was prosecuted for driving his motor vehicle bearing 1912 number plates after the time for the display of 1913 number plates. He defended on the ground that he had in due time made application, paid his fee, and done all that was necessary on his part to entitle him to his license numbers and had received a certificate of registration and been assigned a license number, but that, through the inability of the secretary of state to furnish the plates, he had not received them. It is held that he had committed no offense under the statute; that the purpose of the statute was twofold, identification and revenue; that in the instant case both those purposes had been fulfilled, since the defendant had paid his fee and was sufficiently identified by his 1912 plates, and that to give a literal interpretation to the statute would be to deprive the defendant of the valuable property right of driving his machine, and to reduce the statute to an absurdity.

A similar decision was made in U. S. v. The Planter, Newb. Adm. 262, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,054, wherein it was held that where the owners of a ship had executed the bond required by law, had applied for a license, and the license had been made out, signed, sealed, dated and numbered, but had not been delivered because of the temporary inability of the owners to ascertain the amount of hospital fees due, and where they had been given oral permission by the licensing surveyor to make voyages, the ship could not be libeled for making unlicensed voyages, since delivery of the license, or the evidence thereof, was not essential to its validity. The court said: "The libel was for running the boat without a license. The answer of the owners set up and exhibited a license upon its face, good in all respects. It appeared in proof that the owners had executed their bond according to law, and applied for license after the enrolment of their boat, which license was made out on the books of the office, by the surveyor and inspector, signed, sealed, dated and numbered; and the same on a separate sheet, also signed, sealed, dated and numbered. When the owners called at the office afterwards, it appeared that there had been no account or payment of the hospital dues; that the account could not at that time be made out, as the boat had, a short time before, been sold and transferred to the present owners, who did not know how many hands had been employed by the former owners, nor how long the boat had run, both of which it was necessary to know and state in writing; that a person rendering a false account was subject to a fine; that the former owners were absent, and therefore the information could not be obtained. Under these circumstances, the surveyor declined handing over the paper made out on the separate sheet, but gave the owners permission verbally to make the voyage they were prepared for; and on their return, the former owners being still absent, they made another voyage. For these two voyages this libel suit was commenced. . . . A deed is an instrument executed by a private citizen, and is or was formerly only known to be his act and deed; because he delivered it as such. He has no public seal by which it can be known, and anciently when this law was established, not one person in a hundred, perhaps, could write his name; and his private seal was the impression of his tooth, or some other impression equally unknown to the public. Delivery is therefore essential to give it validity; and it takes effect only from delivery. 2 Black. Com. 306. It is not thus in regard to the acts of public officers, attested by public seals, and recorded in public records in public offices. Where is the law to make delivery essential to their validity? I confess I have never seen such law, and certainly none was produced or cited. In the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 177 [2 U. S. (1. ed.) 73]; 1 Cond. Rep. 273, the Supreme Court of the United States says: 'But in all cases of letters patent, certain solemnities are required by law, which solemnities are the evidence of the validity of the instrument. A formal delivery to the person is not among them. In cases of commissions the sign manual of the president and the seal of the United States are those solemnities. This objection does not touch the case.' This was said by the court in answer to an objection that delivery was essential to give validity to a commission. I have not been able to discover any difference which can be material in this respect, between a commission and a license; neither of them is a deed made by a private citizen, which can only be known to be his act, by his having delivered it as such. Both are acts of public officers, in their official capacity; both have their sign manual and public seals, and both are recorded in public records in public offices; both are letters patent, or of the nature of letters patent. Blackstone (2 Com. 346) speaking of letters patent, says: 'These grants, whether of lands, honors, liberties, franchises or aught besides, are contained in charters or letters patent, literal patentees, so called because they are not sealed up, but exposed to open view, with the great seal pendent at the bottom, and are usually directed or addressed by the king to all his subjects at large.' This is precisely the case with commissions and licenses. They are both grants. A commission grants the right to hold and discharge the duties of a certain office. A license grants authority to do a particular thing—in this case to carry on the coasting trade. They are both open letters addressed to everybody and under public seals."

It has been held that a mere oral vote of renewal of a theatre license is sufficient justification for the operation of the theatre, although formal written evidence of the license has not been received. Boston v. Schaffer, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 415.

It has been held, however, by the New York supreme court, that in an action to recover penalties for maintaining an electric sign without license it was no defense to show that the defendant diligently endeavored to procure a license but was delayed through the stupidity or laziness of employees of the license board. New York v. 503 Fifth Ave. Co. 90 Misc. 277, 153 N. Y. S. 7, wherein the court said: "In an action to recover penalties for violating a city ordinance requiring a license before certain acts may be lawfully done, it is no defense to show that the defendant diligently endeavored to procure a license but was delayed through the stupidity or laziness of employees in the license bureau. If such a 'defense' may prevail, the city ordinances are so much waste paper. With a valid ordinance such as this, the only issue in a suit for a penalty is whether the ordinance was violated. . . . The comment of the appellate division in New York v. Hewitt, 91 App. Div. 446, is pertinent: 'If, then, this judgment can be sustained at all, it must be upon the ground that the court may, as matter of benignity, suspend the operation of the ordinance against an individual. The court has no power of dispensation.'"

Where a statute specifically provides that the license under which an agent is doing business shall be in the possession of the person while doing the business required to be licensed, it is not sufficient that the taxes have been paid and the license actually mailed to the agent, and if he does business, therefore, without having the license in his actual possession, he is guilty of a violation of the law. Lewis v. Dugar, 91 N. C. 16, wherein it was said: "At first we were strongly inclined to think that the principals of the defendant having paid the taxes required, and the license having been granted and mailed to the defendant at Enfield before he sold the goods, he had not incurred the penalty prescribed. But upon more matured reflection, we are satisfied that such a construction of the statute would not effectuate the legislative intent. The language of the statute is, that 'any person violating the provisions of this paragraph,' etc. Now, one of its provisions is, that 'the license issued under this section shall not be transferable, but may be used by one agent in the service of the principal, and not more than one person at one time, and shall be in possession of the person while doing business under this section in this state to secure his protection.' This is a very material clause; it contains substantial and essential provisions. Among other things, it requires that the license 'shall be in the possession of the person while doing business.' This does not imply merely a constructive possession, but an actual possession of the license at the time of the sale, or offering to sell, the purpose being by having the license present to cut off, as far as practicable, the possibility that two or more agents might at the same time sell goods under the same license at different places and escape the penalty. But for this requirement that the party selling shall have actual possession of the license, it would be practicable for two or more agents to use the license for selling goods at the same time at different places. If the person or firm obtaining a license should have two or more agents, each might fraudulently employ it for 'his protection.' Thus, upon demand of the sheriff or other officer, to see the license, the agent then selling, or offering to sell, might say that he had a license; that he had by inadvertence or accident, left it at a distant point on a railroad; that he would get it by the next post and exhibit it as required; a second agent might sell, or offer to sell goods, and say and do likewise towards another officer; a third might do the same thing, and all three might sell or offer to sell goods, and in a few hours after such sales, each might be able to show the sheriff or other officer the license for 'his protection,' granted to his employer. . . . Looking at this case as presented by the record, we are impressed with the belief that the defendant and his principals acted in good faith, but this does not excuse or relieve him from the penalty. He had no right to sell goods as he did without having the license in his actual possession; this was as necessary for 'his protection,' as the license itself. He ought to have delayed selling the goods until he got actual possession of the license."

Refusal to Grant License.

The cases are in direct conflict as to the right of a person to do an act for which a license is required when he has done all that is necessary on his part to entitle him to a license, but the licensing officer wrongfully refuses to issue the license.

The rule has been laid down that where an applicant for a license has done all that is necessary to entitle him thereto, but the license is withheld by the licensing officer wrongfully, although mandamus is a proper remedy to compel the officer to issue the license, nevertheless the applicant need not resort to that remedy but has the right to proceed to do the act for which the license is required. Royall v. Virginia, 116 U. S. 572, 6 S. Ct. 510, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 735; Fossett v. Rock Island Lumber, etc. Co. 76 Kan. 428, 92 Pac. 833, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918. In the case first cited there was involved a law of Virginia which forbade any person to practice law without a license and further provided that every attorney at law, in addition to being licensed, sworn, and admitted to the bar, should obtain a revenue license and should not practice without such license. It appeared that a regularly admitted attorney applied for the revenue license, tendering a state coupon therefor, and that the officer refused to deliver the license because, under his interpretation of the law, a coupon was not a sufficient tender, and that the attorney proceeded to practice law without the revenue license. It was held by the United States Supreme Court, overruling the supreme court of appeals of Virginia, that the coupon was a sufficient tender and that the attorney was justified in practicing without the license. Mr. Justice Matthews said, delivering the opinion of the court: "It is doubtless true, as a general rule, that where the officer, whose duty it is to issue a license, refuses to do so, and that duty is merely ministerial, and the applicant has complied with all the conditions that entitle him to it, the remedy by mandamus would be appropriate to compel the officer to issue it. That rule would apply to cases where the refusal of the officer was wilful and contrary to the statute under which he was commissioned to act. But here the case is different. The action of the officer is based on the authority of an act of the general assembly of the state, which, although it may be null and void, because unconstitutional, as against the applicant, gives the color of official character to the conduct of the officer in his refusal; and, although at the election of the aggrieved party the officer might be subjected to the compulsory process of mandamus to compel the performance of an official duty, nevertheless the applicant, who has done everything on his part required by the law, cannot be regarded as violating the law if, without the formality of a license wrongfully withheld from him, he pursues the business of his calling, which is not unlawful in itself, and which, under the circumstances, he has a constitutional right to prosecute." In Fossett v. Rock Island Lumber, etc. Co. 76 Kan. 428, 92 Pac. 833, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918, suit was brought by a lumber company for goods sold, and the defense was set up by the defendant, plaintiff in error, that the lumber company could not recover because it had been engaged in business without a license required by ordinance. The lumber company replied that it had tendered to the city treasurer the amount of the license tax, but that the latter had refused to accept it and that the city officials had not been enforcing the tax for some years. It was contended that the lumber company had no right, under those circumstances, to engage in business without a license. The court said: "There are authorities which support this contention. Some of them we do not regard as squarely in point, for they arose over disputes as to the character and legality of the tender. Such is Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, 118 Ala. 143, 22 So. 627, 72 Am. St. Rep. 143. The person applying for the license tendered the officer the state tax and refused to pay the county tax. The court, after deciding the county tax illegal, held that appellant was not justified in continuing in business without a license, but should have resorted to mandamus to compel the officer to issue a license. So, in East St. Louis v. Wider, 46 Ill. 351, payment of the license fee was tendered in city orders instead of cash and the tender was refused. On a prosecution for doing business without a license it was held that defendant's remedy was by mandamus, and the refusal to issue the license no defense." And, holding that the lumber company had a right to proceed in business without the license, the court further said: "Nor can we believe after the lumber company had tendered the fee and demanded a license, which the officers refused, it was compelled to mandamus the officers before it could lawfully transact any business of the character in which it was engaged. At all events its failure to follow up the tender and demand by mandamus should not be held to work a forfeiture of its right to recover for merchandise, and thus inure to the benefit of a private individual who was in no respect prejudiced thereby but who retains the consideration."

But in other cases it has been held that when a license is refused by the licensing officer, although the applicant has done all that is necessary to entitle him thereto, he has no right to proceed to do the act for which the license is required. Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, 118 Ala. 143, 22 So. 627, 72 Am. St. Rep. 143; State v. Jamison, 23 Mo. 330; State v. Myers, 63 Mo. 324; Kansas v. Flanders, 71 Mo. 281. See also East St. Louis v. Wider, 46 Ill. 351. In Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, supra, it was held that if an officer improperly refuses to issue a license the remedy of the applicant is mandamus to compel its issuance, and that he has no right to continue or justification in continuing to do the act for which the license is required without having obtained the license. The court said: "Authority is not conferred by the statute to add a county tax to the specific tax imposed on the franchises of corporations doing business within the state, and the judge of probate was in error in demanding the payment of a county tax as a condition upon which he would issue license to the appellant. The error should have been corrected by mandamus, compelling the issue of the license—it affords to the appellant no excuse, or justification for continuing to do business without the license and without the payment of the tax." In State v. Jamison, 23 Mo. 330, it was said: "The indictment is sufficient, and it is no defense that the county court improperly refused the defendant a license when he applied for it. It is the granted license that justifies a party in carrying on the business of a 'dram-shop keeper,' and therefore, even although the county court ought to have granted it notwithstanding the remonstrance of the inhabitants (about which we express no opinion), yet, as they did not, the defendant had no authority to engage in the prohibited trade. It may be that it was improperly withheld, but it is enough here that it was withheld, and whether rightfully or wrongfully, is not now material. In either event, the defendant was guilty if he engaged in the prohibited traffic." In State v. Myers, 63 Mo. 324, wherein it does not clearly appear whether the applicant was lawfully entitled to the license, the court said: "The defendant was indicted for dealing in bills of exchange, etc., etc. without having obtained a license so to do. He was convicted of the charge, and now relies for reversal on the point that the court improperly excluded evidence offered by him, to show that he had made due application to the collector in the manner required by law and had tendered him the requisite sum of money, but the officer refused to issue a license as it was his duty to do. There was no error in rejecting such evidence. The law (Wagn. Stat. § 1, p. 247) applies to all who carry on the business of dealing in, or buying, or selling, or shaving any kind of bills of exchange, checks, drafts, etc., etc. . . . 'without a license for that purpose continuing in force,' and punishment must follow an infraction of the law, regardless of the reason which prevented a license from being obtained or the motive actuating the officer who, in dereliction of his duty, refused to grant it." In East St. Louis v. Wider, 46 Ill. 351, it was held that mandamus was the only remedy and that the applicant had no right to proceed to act without a license; but in that case the applicant was not actually entitled to the license because his tender was insufficient, and for that reason the case is not strictly within the scope of this note.

HARRIS

v.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

BUCHANAN

v.

WARLEY

Kentucky Court of Appeals—June 18, 1915.

165 Ky. 559; 177 S. W. 472.

Constitutional Law — Police Power — Extension by Modern Conditions.

The advance of civilization and consequent extension of governmental activities has resulted in lessening the dominion of individuals over their property and strengthening the state's regulation thereof, until all private property is now held subject to the right of the state to impose on the use and enjoyment thereof such reasonable regulations as are deemed expedient for the public welfare.

Municipal Corporations — Segregation of Races — Validity.

The race segregation ordinance of the city of Louisville which prohibits any colored person from occupying as a residence or place of assembly for colored people a building in any block in which the greater part of the houses are occupied by white persons, and vice versa, but which provides that it shall not affect the location of residences or places of assembly made previous to its enactment, nor prevent any person who has theretofore acquired a building for a residence or place of assembly from exercising such right, does not take away the right of alienation, but is merely a restriction on alienation by taking away the probability of alienation to certain classes of purchasers, and, as such, cannot be held to deprive the owner of a vested right.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That ordinance does not conflict with the Bill of Rights, Const. § 1, recognizing inherent and inalienable rights, section 2 providing that absolute power over the life and property of a man does not exist in a republic, and section 26 providing that the rights secured by the Bill of Rights shall remain inviolate, or Const. U. S. Amend. 14 providing that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, since all these guaranties are not absolute, but are subject to the right to impose reasonable restraints on the use of property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The fact that the ordinance would have the effect of excluding colored people from the more desirable parts of the city does not deprive them of liberty or property without due process of law contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment, since they can improve their sections of the city until they are equal to those of the whites.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That ordinance is a valid exercise of the police power of the municipal legislature as a reasonable measure for the public welfare, in view of the settled public policy of the state to secure the separation of races.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeals from Circuit Court, Jefferson county.

Arthur Harris convicted of violating city ordinance and appeals. Action by C. H. Buchanan, plaintiff, against William Warley, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Appeals heard together. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Logan N. Rock and W. H. Wright for appellant Harris.

Blakey, Quin & Lewis for appellant Buchanan.

Stuart Chevalier and Pendleton Beckley for appellees City of Louisville and Warley.

[560] HANNAH, J.—These two appeals involve a common question—the validity of the following ordinance enacted by the council of the city of Louisville:

"An ordinance to prevent conflict and ill-feeling between the white and colored races in the city of Louisville, and to preserve the public peace and promote the general welfare, by making reasonable provisions requiring, as far as practicable, the use of separate blocks for residences, places of abode and places of assembly by white and colored people respectively.

"Be it ordained by the General Council of the City of Louisville:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any colored person to move into and occupy as a residence, place of abode, or to establish and maintain as a place of public assembly, any house upon any block upon which a greater number of houses are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by white people than are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by colored people.

"Section 2. It shall be unlawful for any white person to move into and occupy as a residence, place of abode, or to establish and maintain as a place of public assembly, any house upon any block upon which a greater number of houses are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by colored people than are occupied as residences, places of abode or places of public assembly by white people.

"Section 3. The word 'block' as the same is used in this ordinance shall be construed to mean that portion of any street or public alley upon both sides of the [561] same between two adjacent intersecting or crossing streets or public alleys, or between such streets or alleys, if extended. In determining the boundary of any given block for the purpose of complying with the provisions of this ordinance, there shall be taken as a basis of measuring the length of such block, the space between the intersecting streets or public alleys on that side of the street or alley on which the house numbers are even, if that side of the street be divided into blocks; otherwise, the block on the opposite side shall be taken as the basis. A 'residence' or 'place of abode' or 'place of public assembly' shall be counted in that block on which it faces and has its main entrance.

"Section 4. Nothing in this ordinance shall affect the location of residences, places of abode or places of public assembly made previous to the approval of this ordinance, and nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent the occupation of residences, places of abode or places of public assembly, by white or colored servants or employees of occupants of such residences, places of abode or places of public assembly on the block on which they are so employed; nor shall anything herein contained be construed to prevent any person who, at the date of the passage of this ordinance, shall have acquired or possessed the right to occupy any building as a residence, place of abode or place of assembly, from exercising such a right. Nor shall anything herein contained prevent the owner of any building now leased, rented or occupied as a residence, place of abode or place of public assembly for colored persons, from continuing to rent, lease or occupy such residence, place of abode or place of public assembly for such persons, if the owner shall so desire; but, if such house should, after the passage of this act, be at any time leased, rented or occupied as a residence, place of abode or place of assembly for white persons, it shall not thereafter be used for colored persons, if such occupation would then be a violation of Section One hereof. Nor shall anything herein contained prevent the owner of any building now leased, rented or occupied as a residence, place of abode or place of assembly for white persons, from continuing to rent, lease or occupy such residence, place of abode or place of assembly for such purpose, if the owner shall so desire; but if such house should, after the passage of this act, be at any time leased, rented or occupied as a [562] residence, place of abode or place of assembly for colored persons, it shall not thereafter be so used for white persons, if such occupation would then be a violation of Section Two hereof.

"Section 5. Any person intending to build or erect for himself, or as agent for another, any building to be used as a residence, place of abode or place of public assembly, upon property situated on a block on which there are no buildings used as a residence, place of abode or place of public assembly, shall, in the application for a permit to the Building Inspector, declare for what purpose said proposed building for which the permit is asked is to be used, whether as a residence or place of abode or place of public assembly for white persons or for colored persons. Upon the filing of said application, the Building Inspector shall, as soon as practicable thereafter, cause to be published twice a week for two successive weeks in one German and in one English daily paper of the city of Louisville, and at the cost of said applicant, the fact that a building of the character described is proposed to be built at the place indicated in the permit and to be used or occupied as a residence, place of abode or place of public assembly, as the case may be, for white or colored people; and he shall cause to be posted at some convenient place on or near the lot where such building is proposed to be erected a similar statement; and unless within five days after the date of the last publication thereof, protest be made in writing to the Building Inspector by those owning more than fifty per cent of the foot frontage of said block against the use mentioned in said application, the permit desired shall, if in other respects said application be in conformity with the ordinances of the city, be granted. Thereafter, all buildings erected for residences, places of abode or places of public assembly on said block, and all buildings erected on said block for other purposes, but which it may be desired thereafter to use as residences, places of abode or places of public assembly, shall be so used either for white persons or for colored persons respectively, as may be determined by the permit granted in the manner hereinabove provided. If, however, the owners of more than fifty per cent of the foot frontage on said block in which the proposed building is to be erected and for which a permit is asked, shall protest against such building in the manner above provided, [563] then in such case no permit shall be issued on said application for the erection of a building for the use set out therein. Whenever a protest is filed under the provisions of this ordinance, those signing the protest shall state the exact number of feet of their respective property that front on the block in question, and each signature to such protest shall be acknowledged before a notary public; and any signature not so acknowledged shall be disregarded by the Building Inspector.

"The provisions of this ordinance are intended to provide a method by which a block which is vacant may be improved and by which its use for either white persons or colored persons may be determined, but shall not be construed to abridge unlawfully any constitutional right which any owner of property may possess to use or occupy his property, subject to reasonable police regulations.

"Section 6. No person shall be granted a permit by the Building Inspector for the construction of any house or other building intended to be used as a residence, as a place of abode, or as a place of public assembly, unless he state in his application for a permit whether the house or building to be constructed is designed to be occupied or used by white or colored people; and if upon the completion of said building, or any time thereafter, the owner shall permit said building to be occupied in any manner other than as stated in said application, he shall at once file with the Building Inspector an affidavit stating the change in the manner of use or occupancy. Whenever the use or occupancy of any building as a residence, place of abode or place of assembly for white or colored people, whether erected before or after the passage of this ordinance, is changed from white to colored, or from colored to white, after the passage of this ordinance, the owner of said building shall at once file with the Building Inspector a sworn statement of such change. If the owner of any building used or occupied as a residence, place of abode or place of assembly, shall permit its use or occupation before there is a compliance with the provisions of this section, he shall be fined for each day of such use or occupation, not less than five dollars nor more than fifty dollars. But no permit issued by the Building Inspector shall authorize any person to use or occupy any property in violation of any section of this ordinance.

[564] "Section 7. It shall be the duty of the Building Inspector, as soon as practicable after the passage of this ordinance, to prepare and preserve for inspection in his office, maps of such blocks in the city of Louisville as are now occupied as residences, places of abode and places of assembly for both white and colored people, and shall continue to make such maps from time to time as will enable his office and the public to determine the character of use or occupancy of any given block in the city. Such map so prepared and properly certified shall be prima facie evidence of the facts shown thereby. Any owner of property in the city of Louisville, or any agent therefor, or any occupant thereof, who shall refuse, upon request, to furnish to the Building Inspector, or any one whom he may appoint to gather such information, with such information as such owner, agent or occupant may possess, necessary to make up such map and to revise it from time to time, or who shall furnish any knowingly false information as to the character of use or occupancy of any residence, place of abode or place of assembly in the city of Louisville, shall be subject to a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than fifty dollars for each offense. But the failure of the Building Inspector to comply with the provisions of this section shall not operate to exempt or excuse any person from complying with the terms of this ordinance.

"Section 8. Any person who shall violate this ordinance either by himself or through his agent, or any agent for another violating any provision of this ordinance for which a penalty is not otherwise provided, shall be liable to a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than fifty dollars for each offense. Each day that property is occupied in violation of this ordinance shall constitute a separate offense for the purposes of this section.

"Section 9. The invalidity of any portion of this ordinance shall not affect the validity of any other portion thereof which can be given effect without such invalid part.

"Section 10. This ordinance shall take effect from and after its passage." (Approved May 11, 1914.)

We may say at the outset that the cases here presented involve only the first four sections of the ordinance.

[565] Upon behalf of the appellants who are attacking the ordinance it is contended that it is not a valid exercise of the police power.

The effort to relieve the situation caused by the close association of the races under the congested conditions found in modern municipalities, has resulted in the legislation here involved. "Municipal Segregation Ordinances," as they are termed, have been enacted in and passed upon by the appellate courts of but three States so far as we have been able to learn; and these we shall consider in their order.

A municipal segregation ordinance was enacted by the city council of Baltimore, and passed upon by the Maryland Court of Appeals, in State v. Gurry, 121 Md. 534, 88 Atl. 546, Ann. Cas. 1915B 957, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1087.

Unlike the Louisville ordinance here involved, the Baltimore ordinance did not undertake to legislate on what were "mixed blocks"—those occupied by members of the two races—but simply prohibited a white person from moving into a block inhabited solely by colored persons and prohibited colored persons from moving into a block inhabited solely by whites.

And, unlike the ordinance here involved, it contained no reservation in protection of vested rights, existing at the time of the enactment of the ordinance. The effect of that ordinance is shown in the following excerpt from the opinion:

"If the traverser (a colored man), for example, on May 15, 1911, when the ordinance was passed, owned a dwelling in what was made a white block, he could not, under the ordinance, move into it, although it was perfectly lawful for him to own it when he became the owner, and to use it as a dwelling. He might be unable to rent it to a white person, and as a colored person was prohibited from moving into it, he could not rent it to a colored person; and he could not under the ordinance move into it himself. The result would be that the house would remain idle unless he could sell it, which, under the circumstances, would likely be at a great sacrifice, although when he acquired it he had the right under the Constitution and laws of Maryland to occupy it as a dwelling, or to rent it to any person, while or colored, for legitimate purposes."

The Louisville ordinance is not subject to this criticism, for in Section 4 it is provided that nothing "herein [566] contained shall be construed to prevent any person who at the date of the passage of this ordinance, shall have acquired or possessed the right to occupy any building as a residence, place of abode or place of assembly, from exercising such right."

Another criticism of the Baltimore ordinance by the Maryland court is as follows:

"Or, it might be that a white person had a valuable and attractive house in a block which was otherwise occupied by colored people. Yet, if at the date of the passage of the ordinance, it happened to be unoccupied as a dwelling, he could not, under the ordinance, move into it or rent it to a white person. To deny him such right would be a practical confiscation of his property, for his house might be of such a character he could not rent it to a colored person, and if he could not use it himself, he would be deprived of not only the income from it, but of such use of it as is guaranteed to every owner of property by the Constitution and laws of the land. Of course, the same conditions might exist when the owner of one house was colored and the other residents of the block white, although probably not so likely to happen."

But, as heretofore seen, these criticisms are all provided against in the Louisville ordinance here under consideration.

Upon a consideration of the ordinance enacted in Baltimore, the Maryland court, without committing itself upon the question of whether it would be possible for the legislature of the State to take away such vested rights, held that the attempted exercise of the police power was of such character as to preclude the court from assuming that the legislature intended to confer on the municipality the power to affect vested rights in the manner sought by the ordinance.

The municipal legislature of the city of Winston, North Carolina, adopted a municipal segregation ordinance, which was passed upon by the Supreme Court of North Carolina, in the case of State v. Darnell, 166 N. C. 300, 81 S. E. 338, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332. The ordinance is not copied in the opinion, but it is apparent that it, like the Baltimore ordinance, contains no saving provision in protection of vested rights existing at the time of the adoption of the ordinance.

The opinion is notable in that the court seems to have been impressed by the time-worn sophistry (always advanced [567] when legislation of this character is being attacked), that if the power exist to segregate whites and blacks, then the power must likewise exist to segregate Republican and Democrat, persons of Irish descent and those of German descent, Protestant and Catholic, and so on. This argument was advanced and answered by this court in the Berea College case, 123 Ky. 209, 13 Ann. Cas. 337, 94 S. W. 623, 124 Am. St. Rep. 344, and conclusively disposed of by the Supreme Court of the United States in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 16 S. Ct. 1138, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 256. To give ear to this kind of reasoning is to close one's mind to the gravity of the race problem as it exists in our country today, and especially to those phases of it most intimately concerned with congested municipal conditions.

The opinion is also notable in that the court for the time being apparently forgetful that congested municipal conditions and rural conditions are not identical, seems impressed with the argument that if segregation may be enforced in a city, it may be enforced in rural communities as well.

But after a consideration of the matter, the court said that "Whether if the general assembly had passed a statute conferring on town or county commissioners the authority to make such an ordinance as this, it would have been constitutional, is not now before us. We simply hold that an act of this broad scope, so entirely without precedent in the public policy of the State and so revolutionary in its nature, cannot be deemed to have been within the purview of the legislature from the use of the words 'conferring authority to make ordinances for the general welfare.'"

The municipal legislature of Atlanta enacted a segregation ordinance which was passed upon by the Supreme Court of Georgia on February 12, 1915, in the case of Carey v. Atlanta, 143 Ga. 192, 84 S. E. 456, L.R.A. 1915D 684.

The ordinance there involved, like the Baltimore ordinance above mentioned, failed to contain any saving clause in protection of vested rights acquired before the passage of the ordinance. The court had before it the two opinions above mentioned, and interpreted the Maryland opinion as recognizing that jus disponendi (right of disposal) is a right within the protection of the Constitution, and denied by the ordinance, although indicating a disposition to hold the ordinance void because it ignored vested rights existing at the time of its passage.

[568] There is also quoted from the North Carolina case the following language: "Besides an ordinance of this kind forbids the owner of property to sell or to lease it to whomsoever he sees fit, as well as forbids those who may be desirous of buying or renting property, from doing so where they can make the best bargain. Yet this right of disposing of property, the jus disponendi, has always been held one of the inalienable rights incident to the ownership of property, which no statute will be construed as having the power to take away."

The Georgia court then adopts as its theory for denying the validity of the ordinance its operation in denying to the owner the right to use, control or dispose of his property; the court holding that the ordinance destroys the right of the individual to acquire, enjoy and dispose of his property, and that it was therefore void as being in contravention of the Due Process Clause of the Federal Constitution.

However, Lumpkin, J., in an able "special-concurring" opinion, said: "It seems to me that the discussion in regard to the right to use property as an incident to ownership may lead to extreme results. The right of an owner to use his property is important, but it is not so absolute that he may at all times and under all circumstances use it as he pleases, regardless of the public welfare, morals or safety. The statute books contain many laws restricting the use of property by the owner of it, and prohibiting him from using it for certain purposes." After further discussion of the matter, Judge Lumpkin said: "Suppose that an owner of property in the best residential portion of a city should claim the right to build upon his lot a large boarding-house or rooming-house in which he should receive indifferently boarders of both races and sexes, producing a situation of great irritation and calculated to bring about unfortunate results. It is quite possible that the sacred right of property might be subject to regulation for the public safety (which has been declared to be the supreme law) by a reasonable pre-existing ordinance." The writer of the concurring opinion then joins in holding the ordinance unconstitutional, but upon the ground that the ordinance delegated to individuals the right to say how property might be occupied, a point not involved upon the appeal here under consideration.

[569] Judge Lumpkin, in closing his concurring opinion, said that while he agreed with the majority of the court in declaring the ordinance unconstitutional, he thought the line of reasoning adopted by them may carry them too far; and in this statement we are heartily disposed to join him.

The jus disponendi has but little place in modern jurisprudence. The advance of civilization and the consequent extension of governmental activities along lines having their objective in better living conditions, saner social conditions, and a higher standard of human character has resulted in a gradual lessening of the dominion of the individual over private property and a corresponding strengthening of the regulative power of the State in respect thereof, so that today all private property is held subject to the unchallenged right and power of the State to impose upon the use and enjoyment thereof such reasonable regulations as are deemed expedient for the public welfare.

There is nothing in the ordinance here under consideration which takes away from any person the right to acquire property anywhere in the city; but the ordinance does prohibit the occupancy of property under certain circumstances, by an owner who acquires same after the adoption of the ordinance; and such restraint upon the use of property acquired with notice of a regulatory ordinance is valid as a competent declaration of the municipal legislature.

If it be conceded that the right of alienation is a vested right which cannot be taken away altogether by legislation, still such is not the effect of the ordinance. An indirect restriction upon the right of alienation, resulting from the denial of the probability of alienation to certain classes of purchasers, cannot be held to be a complete destruction of the power to alienate or deprivation of a vested right, violative of the constitutional guaranties. So much for the jus disponendi.

Appellants claim the protection of the constitutional guaranties preserved in Sections 1, 2 and 26 of the Bill of Rights included in the Constitution of Kentucky, in Article 1, Section 1, Sub-section 1 of the Constitution of the United States, and in the Fourteenth Amendment thereto; and assert that the ordinance under consideration is violative thereof.

[570] But the principle above stated is so well settled that no extended discussion is necessary to establish that reasonable restraints upon the use of private property and upon the liberty to contract, are not subversive of the constitutional limitations mentioned, and that such restraints do not constitute a deprivation of "life, liberty or property without due process of law" within the meaning and purview of the Fourteenth Amendment.

These constitutional guaranties are not absolute guaranties, but are subordinate to the paramount right of government to impose reasonable restraints thereupon when the public welfare renders such legislation expedient. Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 11 S. Ct. 13, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 620; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 S. Ct. 273, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 205.

But, it is contended that the ordinance is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment because it will prevent the residence of negroes in the more desirable portions of the city.

If such should chance to be its practical effect (though there is nothing in the ordinance itself which warrants the conclusion), we do not understand how this could be construed to be a denial of the equal protection of the law. The enforced separation of the races alone is not a discrimination or denial of the constitutional guaranty; and if such separation should result in the members of the colored race being restricted to residence in the less desirable portions of the city, they may render those portions more desirable through their own efforts, as the white race has done. Economic equality is not created by statutory declaration nor guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Nor are we disposed to concede that the ordinance here involved transcends the authority of the municipal legislature, or to doubt that it constitutes a valid exercise of the police power and a reasonable and expedient measure for the public welfare.

The public policy of this State in respect of the separation of the races has long been exhibited in legislation. By legislative mandate, the races have been separated upon public conveyances where by virtue of necessity they must otherwise have been associated; by legislative mandate, they have been separated in the public schools; and, notwithstanding the fact that attendance upon private schools is purely a matter of individual volition, by legislative mandate, the races have [571] been separated therein; and the use of private property for the maintenance of a school wherein students of both races are taught together, is, by legislative mandate, prohibited. See Berea College v. Com. 123 Ky. 209, 13 Ann. Cas. 337, 94 S. W. 623, 124 Am. St. Rep. 344, affirmed in 211 U. S. 45, 29 S. Ct. 33, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 81.

In view of the fact that this legislation is upheld partly in recognition of the peril to race integrity induced by mere propinquity, we see but little difference in the prevention by law of the association of white and colored pupils in the schools of the State and in the prevention of their living aside by side in their homes. It is said by appellant that "in a man's house no such association and contact is necessary" as in the schools or on public conveyances. But the court will not close its eyes to the fact that under the congested conditions of modern municipal life, there is practically as much, if not a greater degree of association among the children of white and colored inhabitants when living side by side than there would be in mixed schools under the direct observation of teachers.

In the Berea College case this court, in its opinion, written by Judge O'Rear, said: "If, then, it is a legitimate exercise of the police power of government to prevent the mixing of the races in cross-breeding, it would seem to be equally within the same power to regulate that character of association which tends to a breach of the main desideratum—the purity of racial blood. . . . A separation of the races under certain conditions is, therefore, enforced where it is believed that their mingling would tend to produce the very conditions which it is found lie at the base of the trouble. In its application, it becomes all the more necessary that the overmastering principles included in the police power of the government be firmly recognized, so that a clashing of race prejudice, or race destruction may be lawfully averted." And, citing from West Chester, etc. R. Co. v. Miles, 55 Pa. St. 209, 93 Am. Dec. 747, it was further said:

"The tendency of intimate social intermixture is to amalgamation, contrary to the law of the races. The separation of the white and black races upon the surface of the globe is a fact equally apparent. Why this is so, it is not necessary to speculate; but the fact of a distribution of men by race and color is as divisible in the providential arrangement of the earth as that of heat [572] and cold. The natural separation of the races is, therefore, an undeniable fact, and all social organizations which lead to their amalgamation are repugnant to the law of nature. From social amalgamation is but a step to illicit intercourse, and but another to intermarriage. But to assert separateness is not to declare inferiority in either; it is not to declare one a slave and the other a freeman—that would be to draw the illogical sequence of inferiority from difference only. It is simply to say that, following the order of Divine Providence, human authority ought not to compel these separate races to intermix. The right of such to be free from social contact is as clear as to be free from intermarriage. The former may be less repulsive as a condition, but not less entitled to protection as a right. When, therefore, we declare a right to maintain separate relations, so far as is reasonably practicable, but in a spirit of kindness and charity, and with due regard to equality of rights, it is not prejudice, nor caste, nor injustice of any kind, but simply to suffer men to follow the law of races established by the Creator himself and not to compel them to intermix contrary to their instincts."

The subject is so fully and ably discussed in the opinion in the Berea College case that it needs no extended argument at this time to demonstrate that this State is fully committed to the principle of the separation of the races whenever and wherever practicable and expedient for the public welfare; not to segregation as a measure imposing stigma, for none is thereby imposed, but in order to prevent such conflicts as are shown by this record to have resulted in Louisville from the racial discord consequent upon the close association of the races; and in order that the solidarity of the races may be preserved; and, finally, that in a spirit of mutual helpfulness and racial friendship, each race may attain those heights of human development which are its to be won, and may aid in bringing to this State and Nation of ours all that the undreamed future has in store for us.

Much has been done in the years gone by, much is being done today by the white people of the Nation for the uplift of the colored race. But those who have studied the future of the race (and, in fact, its leading member in the country today), declare that he must ultimately rise largely through the co-operation, the [573] earnest efforts and the loyal service of his own more fortunate and more enlightened brothers.

For those of the race who are doing their full duty in this respect, municipal segregation will simplify the problem; and, if there be those more fortunate members of the race who in the day of their good fortune would abandon their less fortunate fellows and be false to the duties and responsibilities laid upon them by virtue of their own success, municipal segregation will indirectly enforce their acceptance of those responsibilities and coerce their performance of the duties thereby imposed; and thus, in the end, it will justify that enlightened civic spirit by which it is demanded.

The first four sections of the ordinance are valid. The judgments are affirmed; the whole court sitting.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that an ordinance segregating the white and colored races for residential purposes is a valid exercise of the police power, the restraint on the right to dispose freely of property thereby imposed being justified by the resultant public benefit in preventing the racial discord consequent on the close association of the races. The validity of a statute or ordinance providing for the segregation of persons in different residential districts is discussed in the note to State v. Gurry, Ann. Cas. 1915B 957. v.

HOGG ET AL.

Florida Supreme Court—November 24, 1914.

68 Fla. 331; 67 So. 75.

Executors and Administrators — Presentation of Claims — Necessity — Debt Secured by Mortgage.

A mortgage by an intestate not presented to the administrator within the statute of nonclaim, is barred in the absence of payment of interest or other act of estoppel.

[See note at end of this case.]

Assets — Construed as Including Land.

Real estate is an "asset" of the estate of a decedent.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Palm Beach county: PERKINS, Judge.

Action by A. Y. W. Hogg et al., executors and administrators, etc., plaintiffs, against William Fremd, administrator, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant named appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

H. L. Bussey for appellant.

F. L. Hemming for appellees.

[331] COCKRELL, J.—A bill to enforce a mortgage lien was filed in March, 1914, by the personal representative of Annie K. Hogg, deceased, against the heirs and administrator of the estate of David Thomas, deceased. The heirs did not defend and decree pro confesso was entered against them. The administrator pleaded the statute of nonclaim and appealed from an order overruling this plea.

It is admitted that the plea should have been sustained if the decision by this court in Bush v. Adams, 22 Fla. 177, is still the law of this State. We there ruled that "when by law lands are assets of an estate and the mortgagor dies without having disposed of the parcel mortgaged, and it is a part of his estate, the statute of nonclaim, [332] as usually framed, is as applicable in its requirements to the preservation of the lien of the mortgage against the parcel of land as it is to the preservation of the claim against the general assets in case the mortgage security would prove inadequate, . . . The statute applies to all 'debts and demands of whatever nature against the estate or any testator or intestate,' and the notice is to all 'creditors,' etc. The fact that a particular portion of the land of the decedent's estate has been pledged by him in his life to the payment of a debt or demand has not been made an exception upon the requirements of the statute as to presentation. . . . If it applies to judgments which are a lien upon all the real estate, as it does (citing authorities) we cannot see why it should not hold as to a lien upon a part of the land. The policy of the legislature requires action upon the part of the creditor to preserve his claim."

It may be observed that by statute, a mortgage is both at law and in equity, a mere lien and passes neither title nor possession.

It is argued, however, that this decision is at variance with the majority of holdings of the courts of the various States, and that there has been such a change in the statute since that decision, as to require or at least justify us in going over with that majority.

Prior to the adoption of the Revised Statutes of 1892, it was the law of this State that the administrator became as such entitled to the possession of the real estate of the intestate, and was the necessary party defendant in suits for the enforcement of mortgage liens, and further that he could in his own name maintain ejectment. By Section 1917 of that Revision it was enacted: "Real estate shall be liable for the debts of a decedent, but shall descend to the heir or devisee of such decedent, and remain [333] in his possession until the executor or administrator shall take possession of or sell the same, under the order of the court, for the payment of debts, or until the same shall be sold under execution by any creditor of the decedent."

Real estate of a decedent, however, continued to be equally liable with personal property to levy and sale under an execution upon any judgment against the estate, in other words an "asset" of the estate, as it was at the time Bush v. Adams was decided. The material change is that a court order is necessary to place the personal representative in the possession of the realty, and therefore until that is done, the heirs or devisees are the necessary parties in actions or suits dependent upon possession and legal title. The salient feature of the Bush v. Adams decision that a mortgage is a debt or demand against the estate within the nonclaim statute, is not affected by the later statute.

The bill in this case shows that the mortgage was given in 1898, payable three years after date, and that no interest had been paid thereon; or any part of the principal debt; that the mortgagor died in 1906; that Fremd was appointed administrator in 1907, and had never been discharged. There is no suggestion of estoppel by the heirs in payment of interest or otherwise keeping the lien alive, and the plea shows that no presentation was made and that the lands embraced in the mortgage are necessary to the payment of the debts of the estate, other than this mortgage claim.

In the language of Bush v. Adams, the failure to present the claim does not merely postpone its payment to those claims presented, but it virtually destroys it and operates pro tanto to the advantage of the beneficiaries of the estate.

[334] The plea presented a defense to the suit and should have been sustained.

Order reversed.

In the great majority of jurisdictions it is well settled that the presentation and proof of a mortgage debt or claim within the time provided by statutes regulating the presentation and proof of claims against the estates of deceased persons is not a condition precedent to the enforcement of the mortgage lien against the estate of the decedent to the extent of the property mortgaged.

Wyoming.—O'Keefe v. Foster, 5 Wyo. 343, 40 Pac. 525.

The rule was stated in Teel v. Winston, 22 Ore. 489, 29 Pac. 142, as follows: "The death of the mortgagor and the proceedings in the probate court do not change or suspend the remedy of the mortgagee to enforce his lien on the mortgaged lands, and as a consequence no presentation of the claim for allowance to the administrator or executor is necessary before bringing suit, nor does section 377, Hill's Code, have any application to proceedings of this kind. This doctrine seems to be amply supported, and the general rule is, that the failure to present to an executor or administrator for allowance a claim secured by mortgage, only operates to prevent a judgment for any deficiency that might remain after exhausting the mortgaged property, but does not affect the right to a foreclosure where no recovery is sought beyond the proceeds of the mortgaged lands.

As a reason for the rule it has been said: "Such claims cannot in any just sense be considered as claims against the estate, but that the right to subject specific property to the claim arises from the contract of the debtor, whereby he has during life set aside certain property for its payment, and that such property does not belong to the estate, and that the instrument being of record is notice to all the world of the contract." Reid v. Sullivan, 20 Colo. 498, 39 Pac. 338. And the difference between a mortgage claim and a claim contemplated by the statute of nonclaim was further pointed out in the case of In re Eadie, 39 Misc. 117, 78 N. Y. S. 967, as follows: "Claims against a deceased's estate, as understood by the law, mean obligations owing by the deceased which have not been reduced to judgment, or which are not specific liens upon any portion of his estate, and which require to be proved in order to be allowed. A bond and mortgage is an instrument under seal. The bond imports consideration, and is the evidence of the debt, and the mortgage is a direct lien upon the real estate of the deceased. They were therefore good as to all the world until they were set aside by a decision of a court of equity in an appropriate proceeding brought for that purpose, and the executor was not required to prove the same in the ordinary method, as required of claims against a deceased's estate."

The fact that it is not sought to subject the personal assets of the estate to the mortgage lien has been given as a further reason why it is unnecessary to present the claim to the executor or administrator in order to have the benefit of the lien. Thus in Jefferson College v. Dickson, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 474, it was said: "If the complainants' claim is discharged, it must be because the law imposed upon them the unconditional necessity of presenting it to the personal representatives of the mortgagors, and of receiving payment at their hands out of the personal assets. How stands the law upon this subject? It is a well-settled rule of pleading, that in a bill for foreclosure it is not necessary to bring the personal representatives of the mortgagor before the court. . . . This could not be the rule if the mortgagee were bound to seek the personal estate, or to look to the personal representatives. Indeed the very reason of the rules it stated to be, that the mortgagee is under no obligation to intermeddle with the personal assets or to seek an account thereof. If then the creditor in such case is not bound to seek the personal assets for the satisfaction of his debt, there can be no reason for requiring him to present the claim to the personal representative, who has nothing to do with the real estate of the deceased, upon which the payment of the debt stands charged by virtue of the mortgage. It is true that at common law the personal property of a deceased person is the primary fund for the payment of his debts; but this is a question exclusively between the heir and the personal representative; in such a controversy the latter may be compelled to apply the personality in exoneration of the realty. . . . This doctrine does not, however, affect the right of a creditor who holds an incumbrance upon the realty as a specific pledge for the payment of his debt, to pursue that fund alone, if he shall so elect. I hence conclude, that it was only intended by the statute to 'discharge' such estate as properly comes to the hands of the personal representatives, to be administered, and that it is only upon that class of creditors whose proper resort is to the personality that the duty of presenting their claims is devolved."

In Gleason v. Hawkins, 32 Wash. 464, 73 Pac. 533, it was said: "A mortgage, while it is but a mere lien, and is but ancillary to the debt which it is given to secure, is capable of enforcement against the mortgaged property, though the mortgagor be deceased, in a direct suit brought for that purpose against the heirs of the mortgagor, or, rather, the person or persons in whom the legal title to the mortgaged property is vested at the time of the foreclosure; that is, it is not necessary in order that the mortgaged property may be subjected to the payment of the debt it is pledged to secure, that a probate procedure be instituted, and the debt be presented to the executor or administrator, before a suit can be instituted to foreclose the mortgage."

In Null v. Jones, 5 Neb. 500, a similar line of reasoning was followed, the court saying: "It is evident that section 226, which provides that all claims 'against a deceased person, proper to be allowed by the judge or commissioners,' which shall not be exhibited to them for allowance within the time limited by the court, 'shall be forever barred,' was not intended to apply to claims secured by mortgage, unless the holder expects to look to the assets in the hands of the executor or administrator for payment. The legislature could not have intended that the mere failure of the holder of a claim, secured by mortgage duly recorded, to present the same for allowance, should bar him of his action against the security. We are of the opinion, however, that if such a claim be not exhibited for allowance, the holder is confined to the property covered by his mortgage, and cannot, should that prove insufficient for that purpose, resort to the general assets for payment."

In answer to the contention that the administrator is entitled to notice of mortgage claims in order to administer properly the estate it has been said: "If it be said that liens also must be presented, the answer is, that liens are always in a state of presentation, at least those which are of record. The object of the statute, we have said, is, that the administrator may be informed of the condition of the estate; now, if the claim be of such a nature, that he must be informed of its existence, is not the object of the law accomplished? Suppose, then, that a creditor holds a mortgage on property of the estate, which could not take effect without being recorded; the record is constructive notice to everybody. The law supposes that every one has a knowledge of its existence. Now, could the administrator be better informed by the actual presentation, than the law supposes him to be by the record? He could not; for all legal purposes, he is as fully informed by the one as by the other." Miller v. Helm, 2 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 687.

And in Cole v. McMickle, 30 Ind. 94, it was said: "The administrator is presumed to be cognizant of mortgages executed by the decedent in his lifetime upon his real and personal property, and they are not barred by a failure to file a statement of them within the time limited by section 62. Such claims do not come within the purview of that section, and cannot be affected by it."

In Edgerton v. Schneider, 26 Wis. 385, the court, declaring that the failure to present a mortgage claim for allowance against an estate did not bar the holder's right to pursue his remedy by foreclosure, and to enforce his specific lien on the property subject to the mortgage, stated the reason for the rule as follows: "We hold this upon the ground that, even though such debts are subject to the general limitation provided in respect to claims against the estates of deceased persons, as contended by the appellant, yet the bar occasioned by such limitation should have no other or greater effect than would the bar under the general statute of limitations in favor of a living person. And in respect to that it has been settled by this court, in accordance with what was considered the result of the authorities, that the fact that the note is barred does not prevent the foreclosure of the mortgage. . . . There is no reason why the bar under the limitation as to presenting claims against estates should have any different effect, or why the decision of the one question does not dispose of the other."

MINORITY RULE.

In Florida and Texas the contrary rule is maintained, the courts holding that the language of the general statutes of nonclaim is sufficiently comprehensive to include every species of claim against a decedent's estate, and that a failure to present and prove a mortgage debt in accordance with the terms of the statute bars forever the debt as well as the right to foreclose the mortgage. Bush v. Adams, 22 Fla. 177; Graham v. Vining, 1 Tex. 639, 2 Tex. 433; Duty v. Graham, 12 Tex. 427, 62 Am. Dec. 534; Gaston v. Boyd, 52 Tex. 282; Buchanan v. Wagnon, 62 Tex. 375; Wilson v. Harris, 91 Tex. 427, 44 S. W. 65, affirming 40 S. W. 868; Tiboldi v. Palms, 97 Tex. 414, 79 S. W. 23, affirming 34 Tex. Civ. App. 318, 78 S. W. 726; Degetau v. Mayer (Tex.) 145 S. W. 1054. See also Lafon v. Phillips, 2 Mart. N. S. (La.) 225; Bradford v. Knowles, 86 Tex. 505, 25 S. W. 1117; Whitmire v. May, 96 Tex. 317, 72 S. W. 375; Taylor v. Williams, 101 Tex. 392, 108 S. W. 815; Clarke v. Dallas First State Bank (Tex.) 150 S. W. 203. And see the reported case. Compare Cole v. Robertson, 6 Tex. 356, 55 Am. Dec. 784.

In Graham v. Vining, 1 Tex. 639, 2 Tex. 433, the Texas rule was stated as follows: "The language of the 17th section, 'That no bearer of a claim for money against a succession administered by an executor or administrator, shall commence an action against such succession, before presenting his claim to such executor or administrator;' . . . is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace every claim for money, of whatever grade, upon which suit was necessary to its assertion in a court of law. A debt secured by a mortgage on specific property forms no exception. If presented, allowed, and placed on the tableau of acknowledged debts, it can have all the benefits of its specific lien, without the necessity of suit. Should the funds of the estate be sufficient, it will be paid out on the general funds: if not sufficient without sale, the sale will be ordered by the court on the application of the executor or administrator, or, on their failure to make such application on the creditor; and in making the order of sale, the judge will have regard to the nature of the claims."

And in Tiboldi v. Palms, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 318, 78 S. W. 726, affirmed in 97 Tex. 414, 79 S. W. 23, it was said: "The object of the statute in requiring all creditors of an estate to present their claims against the estate and have same adjudicated in the court in which the administrator of the estate is pending is to enable that court to adjust and fix the rights of all the creditors as well between themselves and the heirs as between each other. It would be impossible to accomplish this result if a creditor who had failed to present his claim in the administration of the estate was permitted after the close of said administration to establish and foreclose liens upon property of the estate which had been disposed of by order of the court in the administration."

Nor does the fact that the mortgage contains a power to sell relieve the mortgagee from the necessity of presenting his claim. Robertson v. Paul, 16 Tex. 472; Blair v. Thorp, 33 Tex. 38; McLane v. Paschal, 47 Tex. 365; Texas Loan Agency v. Dingee, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 118, 75 S. W. 866. In Robertson v. Paul, supra, it was said: "That the mortgage contains a power to sell, does not change its essential character. It is still a security, and nothing but a security for the payment of a debt. The debt is the principal thing; the mortgage is but an incident. The debt remains as a demand against the estate of the same, and no higher grade, in consequence of the power contained in the mortgage. It comes within the letter and policy of the law, which requires the presentation of the claim; and which postpones its payment to other preferred claims. To permit its enforcement otherwise than as the statute prescribes, would be to defeat the express requirements, and the manifest policy of the law."

But where the grantor in a deed of trust conveys his interest and afterwards dies insolvent it has been held to be unnecessary to present the claim against his estate. Miles v. Coleman Nat. Bank, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 73, 84 S. W. 284, wherein it was said: "At the time the deed of trust was foreclosed, and the Coleman National Bank became the purchaser, the estate of Bowen had no interest in the property, as Bowen had sold it to the vendor of appellant long prior to the time of his death. His death did not abate the lien created by the deed of trust, and his estate not being interested in the property in question, it would not interfere with the policy of the administration of the probate law so far as concerned his estate, that the claim or the trust lien should not have been presented to the administrator of his estate for allowance."

However, it has been held that the presentation of the note secured by the mortgage is sufficient without presenting the mortgage itself. Danzey v. Swinney, 7 Tex. 617; Simpson v. Reily, 31 Tex. 298; Cundiff v. Simpson, 32 Tex. 144; Cannon v. McDaniel, 46 Tex. 303.

And it seems that payments on the mortgage debt by the administrator are sufficient to show a presentation of the mortgage claim within the statutory period. Miller v. Crosby, 68 Fla. 365, 67 So. 76.

RULE IN CALIFORNIA.

Under the California statute (Code of Civ. Proc. § 1500) holders of mortgage claims against estates of deceased persons are allowed to enforce them without presentation and proof as required of other claims, provided all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint. Security Sav. Bank v. Connell, 65 Cal. 574, 4 Pac. 580; Dreyfuss v. Giles, 79 Cal. 409, 21 Pac. 840; Sonoma County Bank v. Charles, 86 Cal. 322, 24 Pac. 1019; Anglo-Neveda Assur. Corp. v. Nadeau, 90 Cal. 393, 27 Pac. 302; German Sav. etc. Soc. v. Fisher, 92 Cal. 502, 28 Pac. 591; Sibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Wackenreuder, 99 Cal. 503, 34 Pac. 219; Heeser v. Taylor, 1 Cal. App. 619, 82 Pac. 977. See also Hibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Hayes, 56 Cal. 297. Compare the following cases decided under prior statutes: Ellissen v. Halleck, 6 Cal. 386; Willis v. Farley, 24 Cal. 490; Ellis v. Polhemus, 27 Cal. 350; Pitte v. Shipley, 46 Cal. 154; Harp v. Calahan, 46 Cal. 222.

In Hibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Wackenreuder, 99 Cal. 503, 34 Pac. 219, it was said: "The object of this section is not only to give to the holder of such a mortgage, or other lien, the right to maintain an action against the representative of the estate to enforce the same, without presentation of the claim upon which the action is founded, when the waiver provided for is made, but also to relieve the estate from the payment of counsel fees stipulated for in the mortgage, and from the payment of any deficiency judgment, when the mortgagee elects to proceed under it."

But where it appears that the mortgage existed at the time the decedent acquired the property the statute does not apply and the mortgagee may enforce his claim even though he makes no waiver. Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 Pac. 891, wherein it was said: "The objection that the complaint should have averred either a presentation of a claim against the estate of appellant's intestate, or an express waiver of any recourse against the general estate is not well taken. Section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application to the facts of this case. The note and mortgage sued on were not in any sense a claim against the estate of said intestate. The latter was not the maker of the note or mortgage, nor did a demand of any character exist thereunder against the estate. The representative was made a party defendant solely by reason of the fact that subsequently to the making of the mortgage in suit the mortgaged land was purchased by said intestate in his lifetime, and the title thereto rested in his estate at his death, subject to the mortgage lien. It was necessary to make his representative a party only for the purpose of foreclosing the rights of the estate in the land and for that purpose alone. The estate of said intestate was in no way holden for any deficiency that might arise out of a sale of the property, nor was any such relief asked or taken. There was, therefore, no claim to be presented against said estate. The section referred to applies only to instances where the note and mortgage constitute a claim against the estate of the deceased."

Likewise, it has been held that the statute is inapplicable where it appears that the mortgage was given to secure the debt of a third person, as this does not constitute a debt against the decedent. Sichel v. Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493; Hibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Conlin, 67 Cal. 178, 7 Pac. 477.

However, where the mortgage is on the homestead the claims secured thereby must be presented and allowed as other claims against the estate (Code Civ. Proc. § 1475). Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. 375; Mechanics' Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 23 Pac. 376; Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 55, 24 Pac. 606; Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 610, 24 Pac. 779; Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852, 21 Am. St. Rep. 26; Perkins v. Onyett, 86 Cal. 348, 24 Pac. 1024; Wise v. Williams, 88 Cal. 30, 25 Pac. 1064; Hibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Thornton, 109 Cal. 427, 42 Pac. 447, 50 Am. St. Rep. 52; Hibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Laidlaw, 4 Cal. App. 626, 88 Pac. 730. In Camp v. Grider, supra, the court stated the purpose of the act requiring mortgage claims against the homestead to be presented as follows: "The purpose of the legislature in providing, by section 1475, that if there be subsisting liens or incumbrances on the homestead, the claims secured thereby must be presented and allowed as other claims against the estate, was undoubtedly to preserve the homestead if possible. That purpose is as clearly shown as can be by the language employed in the section: 'If the funds of the estate be adequate to pay all claims allowed against the estate, the claims so secured must be paid out of such funds. If the funds of the estate be not sufficient for that purpose, the claims so secured shall be paid proportionally with other claims allowed;' and this is followed with the express declaration that 'the liens or incumbrances on the homestead only be enforced against the homestead for any deficiency remaining after such payment.'"

But where the homestead is not set apart until after the husband's death, it has been held that the rule requiring the presentation of mortgage claims does not apply. McGahey v. Forrest, 109 Cal. 63, 41 Pac. 817; Browne v. Sweet, 127 Cal. 332, 59 Pac. 774.

And so where the mortgage is given on the homestead which is the separate property of the wife, it has been held that, as it is not a part of the estate of the decedent, it is unnecessary to present the mortgage claim. Schadt v. Heppe, 45 Cal. 433; Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 18 Pac. 808, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—11.

Nor does the statute requiring the presentation of a claim secured by lien or incumbrance on the homestead apply to a deed of trust containing a power of sale. More v. Calkins, 95 Cal. 435, 30 Pac. 583, 29 Am. St. Rep. 128; Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 86 Pac. 706; Athearn v. Ryan, 154 Cal. 554, 98 Pac. 390. In Weber v. McCleverty, supra, the court pointed out the distinction and applied the rule in the following language: "The application of this section to the estate of a trustee, holding under a trust deed made to provide for the payment of a debt of the deceased due to a third person, by virtue of a power of sale for that purpose conferred upon the trustee by the terms of the deed, primarily depends upon the question whether or not the trust deed, or the estate and power thereby vested in the trustee, can be considered a 'lien or incumbrance' on the land conveyed to the trustee by the deed, in the sense in which those words are used in the section. If it is neither a lien nor an incumbrance, then that statute has no application to this case. . . . In legal effect, a deed of trust does not create a lien or incumbrance on the land, but conveys the legal title to the trustee. In order to execute the trust he must be by the deed so far invested with the absolute title to the land as is necessary to enable him to convey it to the purchaser at the trustee's sale free of all right, title, interest, or estate of the trustor, or of any one claiming under or through the trustor by virtue of any transaction occurring after the making of the trust deed. The deed of trust, therefore, vests in the trustee, for the purposes of the trust, the absolute legal title to the entire estate held by the trustor, immediately prior to its execution, and that estate must remain in the trustee for that purpose until the trust is either executed or ceases to exist by reason of payment of the debt. It is consequently legally impossible for the trustee, in his fiduciary capacity, to hold a lien or incumbrance on the land which is the subject of his trust. . . . A mortgage or other incumbrance on land does not transfer the title, but leaves it vested in the mortgagor or owner. A homestead attaches to whatever estate in the land may be vested in one or both of the spouses. Consequently, when declared on land previously mortgaged or encumbered, it attaches to the legal title, which then becomes the homestead interest, and the mortgage or incumbrance may properly be said to be a subsisting lien or incumbrance on the homestead, and as such it would be governed by section 1475. But it is not so with a deed of trust. It transfers the legal title to the trustee, and, as the homestead applies only to the title vested in one or both of the spouses, and does not affect titles vested in third persons, it follows that the legal title thus vested in the trustee forms no part of a subsequently declared homestead, and that the deed of trust, or the title of the trustee, is not a subsisting lien or incumbrance on the homestead interest."

As to the effect of an unnecessary filing of the claim, see the following subdivision of this note.

EFFECT OF FILING CLAIM.

It is generally held that the mere fact that a mortgagee has presented and proved his claim against the decedent's estate does not affect in any way his right to enforce his mortgage lien against the specific property covered. Schuelenburg v. Martin, 2 Fed. 747, 1 McCrary 348; Moran v. Gardemeyer, 82 Cal. 96, 23 Pac. 6; Castle v. Haneberg, 20 Hawaii 123; People v. Phelps, 78 Ill. 147; Clarke v. Henshaw, 30 Ind. 144; Moore v. Ellsworth, 22 Ia. 299; Andrews v. Morse, 51 Kan. 30, 32 Pac. 640; Larzelere v. Starkweather, 38 Mich. 96; Putnam v. Russell, 17 Vt. 54, 42 Am. Dec. 478; Walker v. Baxter, 26 Vt. 710. Compare In re Smith, 194 Pa. St. 259, 45 Atl. 82.

In Schuelenburg v. Martin, 2 Fed. 747, 1 McCrary, 348, it was said: "The fact that plaintiffs proved their entire debt as against the estate of Kullak, and received two dividends thereon from the assets of said estate, does not extinguish their rights under the mortgage. The sum collected from the estate upon that portion of the debt which is secured by the mortgage must, however, be credited thereon." And in Moore v. Ellsworth, 22 Ia. 299, the court stated the rule as follows: "We can perceive no reason why the allowance of a claim secured by mortgage, although duly filed and proved before the county court against the estate of deceased, should constitute a waiver of the right subsequently to foreclose the mortgage. It is a well understood rule of law that a mortgage lien continues until the debt, to secure which the same was executed, shall have been paid or extinguished. Such filing, proof and allowance were simply a notice and the establishment of a claim, agreeably to the provisions of the administration laws, which the executors were authorized to pay. If it was not paid, it was competent for the plaintiffs in this case, under sections 2419, 2420 of the Revision, either to cite the administrators before the county court and obtain judgment against them, if no cause to the contrary is shown, or, at their election, to institute a proceeding to foreclose their mortgage, as they have done in this case."

Enforcement against General Assets.

Where it is sought to subject the general assets of the estate to the payment of the mortgage debt, either in full, or to make up any deficiency, the authorities are agreed that the presentation and proof of the debt is a necessary condition precedent to participation in the distribution of the estate.

In Waughop v. Bartlett, 165 Ill. 124, 46 N. E. 197, the rule was stated as follows: "The right to file and have allowed a claim of this character, under the statute relating to the administration of estates, is only an additional remedy afforded the holder of a note secured by a real estate mortgage, and where he may desire to secure judgment over for any deficiency which may result after the sale of the specific property in which he has a lien or where he may desire to hold liable a surety on the note. The mortgagee's right to a prompt foreclosure of his mortgage is not, however, to be in any manner impeded by compelling him to first resort to any personal remedy. . . . If he desires any judgment for deficiency, or recourse to any security not specifically pledged, he must proceed within the two years, in conformity with the statute."

So, a judgment of foreclosure, which included an order for a deficiency judgment, although the mortgage claim had not been presented against the estate as provided by the statute, was held to be erroneous in Pereles v. Leiser, 119 Wis. 347, 96 N. W. 799. In that case it was said: "The vital question on this appeal is, Was plaintiff entitled to recover on the note against the appellant as executor of this estate on August 24, 1900, when this action was commenced which resulted in this judgment of foreclosure and for deficiency in plaintiff's favor. Sec. 3844, Stats. 1898, provides: 'Every person having a claim against a deceased person proper to be allowed by the court who shall not after notice given as required by section 3840 exhibit his claim to the court within the time limited for that purpose, shall be forever barred from recovering such demand or from setting off the same in any action whatever.' It was held, under this statute, that all claims against a decedent which can properly be presented against his estate must be filed for allowance with the county court upon due notice, and all claims not presented as required by sec. 3844 are absolutely barred, and thereby the remedy is cut off and the right of action is extinguished. . . . In this case the limitation for exhibiting a claim on this note against the estate of Sarah Leiser, deceased, had run against it before this action was commenced. Hence, there can be no judgment over for any deficiency against the appellant as the executor of her estate. The question is well settled under repeated decisions in this state, which declare, in positive terms, that after such an extinguishment of a claim no foundation for a personal judgment remains on the note, though the right to a judgment of foreclosure of the mortgage to enforce the lien still existed, and therefore the power to render a personal judgment in the foreclosure action cannot be exercised, because there is no longer anyone personally liable to satisfy the conditions of the statute."

SCHMIDT ET AL.

GRENZOW ET AL.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—February 1, 1916.

162 Wis. 301; 156 N. W. 143.

Executors and Administrators — Presentation of Claims — Claim Secured by Mortgage.

An indebtedness secured by a real estate mortgage is not "contingent" within St. 1915, § 3858, though not due at the time of administration; therefore, where it was not duly presented as a claim against the estate, the mortgagor on subsequent foreclosure is not entitled to a deficiency judgment over against distributees after a complete administration of the estate.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Green county: GRIMM, Judge.

Action by Adam Schmidt, et al., plaintiffs, against Louis Grenzow et al., defendants. From judgment rendered, defendants appeal. REVERSED.

[301] Action to foreclose a real-estate mortgage of $6,000 securing two notes of $5,000 and $1,000, each, executed by one E. O. Grenzow, since deceased.

Administration on the estate of the mortgagor had been completed before this action was begun, and the sum of $1,762.27 out of his personal estate was assigned to each of the four appellants. At the time of administration the mortgage indebtedness was not due and plaintiffs filed no claim against the estate. The plaintiff Schmidt owns the note of $5,000 and the plaintiff Babler is the owner of the $1,000 note. The defendant Mary Legler is liable as an indorser of the $1,000 note and does not appeal. In the usual foreclosure judgment the court also ordered a judgment for a deficiency, if any should arise, against the four heirs to the extent of $1,762.27 each. From that part of the judgment they appeal.

Sprague & Jenks for appellants.
J. L. Sherron for respondents.

[302] VINJE, J.—This case presents the question whether a judgment for a deficiency in a foreclosure action can be properly entered against the heirs of a deceased mortgagor where complete administration of his estate has been had and no claim has been filed by the mortgagee in the administration proceedings. The question was answered in the negative in Pereles v. Leiser, 119 Wis. 347, 96 N. W. 799. The only difference between that case and this is that there the indebtedness was due at the time of administration and here it was not. But a fixed amount due at a definite time in the future is not a contingent claim within the meaning of sec. 3858, Stats. 1915. Hence, the only contingency in this case is whether or not there will be a deficiency after sale. That was the only contingency in the Pereles Case and it was argued that such contingency made the claim a contingent one. But the court held that it did not. It is evident that the contingency of a deficiency is no greater where the note is not due than where it is due.

If a mortgagee deems himself insecure he can file his claim against the estate. If he does not do so he must be held to rely solely upon the security.

The case of Pereles v. Leiser, 138 Wis. 401, 120 N. W. 274, is relied upon as authority for the right to a deficiency judgment. In that case the judgment of the circuit court against the executor for a deficiency had to be treated as a valid judgment because unappealed from for two years, and it was held that the allowance of such valid judgment against the estate by the county court after the time for filing claims had expired was not error, as it was only another way of collecting [303] the judgment. The decision in Pereles v. Leiser, 119 Wis. 347, 96 N. W. 730, rules this case.

BY THE COURT.—That part of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

NOTE.

The reported case is in accord with the majority of the authorities in holding that a mortgagee may enforce his lien against the estate of a decedent without presenting the claim for allowance, but that if he fails to present his claim he is confined to the property covered by the mortgage, and cannot, should that prove insufficient, resort to the general assets for payment. For a general discussion of this subject see the note to Fremd v. Hogg, reported ante, this volume, at page 155.

MOON ET AL.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—July 13, 1914.

88 Conn. 387; 91 Atl. 646.

Marriage — Conditions in Restraint — Legacy Conditioned on Obtaining Divorce.

While a condition, attached to a legacy, in restraint of marriage generally is invalid as against public policy, a condition that the legatee shall not marry a certain person, or a legacy to a widow to divest if she marries, is valid.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The condition of a legacy to testator's son to be paid to him on the death of his present wife, or if he should obtain a divorce from her, or should become separated from her, or if within a year after divorce or separation he should become married to a good respectable woman, is not contrary to public policy as a restraint of marriage.

[See note at end of this case.]

Case reserved from Superior Court, New London county: REED, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Daboll, administrator de bonis non and trustee of will of John Moon, deceased, plaintiff, against Jesse A. Moon et al., defendants. Case reserved by superior court. The facts are stated in the opinion. DECREE CONSTRUING WILL.

Perry J. Hollandersky for plaintiff.

Abel P. Tanner and Nathan Belcher for Willard B. Moon.

William J. Brennan for Jesse A. Moon.

[338] THAYER, J.—The plaintiff is administrator d. b. n. with the will annexed of the estate of John Moon, who died in 1898, leaving real and personal estate and three sons, John H. Moon, Jesse A. Moon and Willard B. Moon. One half of the testator's estate is given by the will to Jesse A. Moon upon a condition relating to the son John H., which is now unimportant, as the latter died in 1899. The other half of the estate was disposed of by the following provisions of the will: "Upon the death of the present wife of said Willard B. Moon, or if he shall obtain a divorce from her or shall become separated from her, at the end of a year from said divorce or separation, or if within said year he shall become married to a good respectable woman, then in either of said events the said Willard B. Moon shall be entitled to and shall receive the income and profit from said trust fund after the payment therefrom of one dollar and fifty cents per week to said John H. Moon, but if said Willard B. Moon shall ever return to live with his present wife his interest in said trust shall be divested and he shall not be entitled to receive any of the benefits thereof. It is my will that my said trustee may if he deem it best use and expend a part of the whole of the principal of said trust for the benefit of said Willard B. Moon, or for any [389] of the purposes of this trust, giving him full power to use his discretion in the management, interpretation and administration of this trust. . . . Upon the death of said Willard B. Moon the trust shall continue for the benefit of said John H. Moon as aforesaid, if he still be living, and the funeral expenses of said Willard B. Moon shall be paid out of the same, and if said Willard B. Moon shall have married a good respectable woman as aforementioned, and he shall have had issue by her, the income and profit of said trust that would have gone to said Willard shall be expended by my trustee for the benefit of said issue, but if said John H. Moon be then dead, and in any event upon the death of both Willard B. Moon and John H. Moon, after the payment of their funeral expenses said trust shall divest and whatever of said trust fund then be remain—I give, devise and bequeath to the issue of said Willard B. Moon if have any other than from his present wife and failing them, to said Jesse A. Moon his heirs and assigns forever."

Jesse A. Moon was named as executor and qualified as such, and as trustee under the provision quoted. He afterward resigned as executor and trustee, and the plaintiff was appointed trustee in his place.

Willard B. Moon and his wife, referred to in the will, are both living, and he has never separated from her by divorce or otherwise, and he has no children. He claims that the condition, upon which the testator made the gift to him of the income of the trust fund depend, was illegal as against public policy, as encouraging a separation by him from his wife, and therefore void, and that the gift of the income was therefore absolute, and that he is entitled to it as it accrues.

Cases can be found which hold, and perhaps the weight of authority supports the view, that a gift or [390] legacy made upon a condition which constitutes an inducement to a married person to obtain a divorce, or to live separate from the other spouse, is void as against public policy. Conrad v. Long, 33 Mich. 78, 79; Hawke v. Euyart, 30 Neb. 149, 46 N. W. 422, 27 Am. St. Rep. 391. So, it is said, are conditions in restraint of marriage. But the rule in the latter case is qualified, and there are exceptions to it. The condition must be in restraint of marriage generally. A condition that the legatee shall not marry a certain person is valid. A legacy to a widow, conditioned to divest if she marry, is valid. Chapin v. Cooke, 73 Conn. 72, 46 Atl. 282, 84 Am. St. Rep. 139. Bigelow, in a note to Jarman on Wills (6th ed. vol. 2, p. 49, s. p. 886), says: "If the question were open, there might be ground to inquire whether conditions in restraint of marriage generally are contrary to public policy."

The present case is not one where the condition is in restraint of marriage, although somewhat akin to it. The separation, which it is claimed that the condition in question tends to promote, offers no encouragement to celibacy on the part of the donee. The condition rather encourages a new marriage, for an early remarriage advances the time at which the income is to be paid to him if the condition is fulfilled. The marriage here was a fact at the time the will was made and went into effect. The gift was to vest in the donee upon the death of his wife, upon his divorce from her, or if he permanently separated from her. We are asked to say that the condition upon which the legacy was to vest is void as against the public policy of this State, and that the result of this is to make the gift absolute, so that it vests in the donee without performance of the condition.

It is clear from the language of the will that the result claimed would be directly contrary to the expressed intent of the testator. He did not intend that the income [391] should vest in Willard if he should not become separated from his wife by her death, a divorce, or in some other way. The cardinal rule in the interpretation of wills is to seek and carry out the testator's intent. Wolfe v. Hatheway, 81 Conn. 181, 184, 70 Atl. 645. This rule is in direct conflict with the one which is urged upon us by counsel for the donee, namely, that as the condition is unlawful the law understands that it is impossible of performance and that this impossibility is the equivalent of performance. We are not required to attempt a reconciliation between these rules in the present case, the conclusion to which we have come upon the other branch of the case rendering it unnecessary.

Upon the facts appearing in this record it cannot be said that the condition, upon which the income of this trust fund was bestowed, was against public policy. It has never been the policy of this State, as it formerly was the policy of the church, to compel people married to each other to continue for life in that relation and cohabit together regardless of their inaptitude for such cohabitation and however unfitted they may be in disposition and temperament to mutually perform the duties of the marriage relation. The State does not favor divorces, but it allows them for several causes, because it believes that the interests of society will thereby be better served and that its own prosperity will thereby be promoted. Dennis v. Dennis, 68 Conn. 186, 197, 36 Atl. 34, 57 Am. St. Rep. 95, 34 L.R.A. 449. So, too, the State deems it to be in the public interest that husband and wife, in some cases, shall live separate and apart, although not divorced. In 1895, before the will under consideration took effect, a law (now General Statutes, § 1354) was passed making the marrying, or living together as husband and wife, of any man and woman, one of whom is epileptic, imbecile, or feeble-minded, a criminal offense [392] punishable by imprisonment in the State prison. This law, as to one class of persons with whom it deals, was sustained as constitutional by this court as legislation in the interest of the public health. Gould v. Gould, 78 Conn. 242, 245, 61 Atl. 604, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 531. To condition a gift upon the doing of what the State treats by its legislation as promotive of the public interest and its own prosperity, or what it requires to be done in the interest of the public health, cannot be against public policy. To make the condition void as against public policy, it must appear from the language of the will alone, or in connection with extrinsic facts, that the testator in the particular case in question conditioned his gift upon an illegal divorce or separation. Numerous cases are to be found which support the view that where a gift is upon condition that the donee shall obtain a divorce, or live separate from husband or wife, the condition is valid when it appears from the will, in connection with the surrounding circumstances, that a legal divorce or separation was intended, or where a separation already existed, or a suit for divorce was pending at the time that the will was made. Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 22 Pac. 169, 338, 5 L.R.A. 577; Cowley v. Trombly, 173 Mass. 393, 397, 53 N. E. 886, 46 L.R.A. 164; Coe v. Hill, 201 Mass. 15, 21, 86 N. E. 949; Thayer v. Spear, 58 Vt. 327, 329, 2 Atl. 161; Ransdell v. Boston, 172 Ill. 439, 50 N. E. 111, 43 L.R.A. 526; Cooper v. Remsen, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 459.

Where it is possible that the condition may be legally performed, it will not be presumed that the testator intended an illegal performance. The present gift was upon alternative conditions, one of which was the death of Willard's wife. It will not be presumed that the testator, in the absence of express language so directing, intended that his son should procure his wife's death. His counsel admit that if the wife's death had been the only condition of the vesting in him of the [393] income, the condition would have been valid. But the will holds out the same inducement to him to procure her death which it does to procure an illegal divorce or separation from her. In Cowley v. Twombly, 173 Mass. 393, 397, 53 N. E. 886, 46 L.R.A. 164, where the facts were somewhat similar to those in this case, the court said: "The scheme of the trust no more tended to induce the son to improperly procure a divorce between himself and wife, than to induce him to procure her death." Upon the face of the will, therefore, the condition upon which the income was to vest in Willard was not void, and he has not shown any facts extrinsic of the will which compel a construction which will make it void as against public policy.

There was no occasion for the plaintiff, as administrator or as trustee, to bring this action. There is no one at present to demand the distribution of the corpus of the trust estate. The son Willard is claiming only the income. The disposition of the corpus of the estate is in no way affected by the validity or invalidity of the condition upon which the gift of the income is limited. The only question which the plaintiff has now to consider, either as trustee or administrator, is whether Willard is now entitled to receive the income. Before the time arrives for the distribution of the body of the estate there may be issue of Willard, either by his present or another wife, to make their own claims as to its distribution. The only question between the parties now being whether Willard is entitled to the income, it could have been settled in an action at law brought by Willard against the present plaintiff as trustee, and such an action should have been brought instead of bringing the present apparently amicable suit.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment that the condition, upon which the gift of the income [394] to Willard B. Moon is made, is not void as against public policy and good morals.

No costs will be taxed in this court in favor of either party.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

NOTE.

Validity of Legacy or Devise Conditioned on Recipient Obtaining Divorce or Separating from Spouse.General Rule.

The general rule is that when a legacy or devise is given on the condition that the recipient shall obtain a divorce or separation from the spouse, the condition is void as being against public policy and good morals. Tennant v. Braie, Tothill 78, 21 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 128; Brown v. Peck, 1 Eden 140, 28 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 637; Wren v. Bradley, 2 DeG. & Sm. 49, 64 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 23; Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, L. R. 12 Eq. 604; In re Moore, 39 Ch. D. 116; Winn v. Hall, 1 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 337; Witherspoon v. Brokaw, 85 Mo. App. 169; Snorgrass v. Thomas, 166 Mo. App. 603, 150 S. W. 106; Hawke v. Euyart, 30 Neb. 149, 46 N. W. 422, 27 Am. St. Rep. 391; Potter v. McAlpine, 3 Dem. (N. Y.) 108; Whiton v. Harmon, 54 Hun 552, 8 N. Y. S. 119; O'Brien v. Barkley, 78 Hun 609 mem., 28 N. Y. S. 1049; Cruger v. Phelps, 21 Misc. 252, 47 N. Y. S. 61; Matter of Haight, 51 App. Div. 310, 64 N. Y. S. 1029; Mores v. Gwynne, 33 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 463. See also Conrad v. Long, 33 Mich. 78; Cooper v. Remsen, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 382, 521, 5 Johns. Ch. 459; Paider v. Suchy, 159 App. Div. 230, 144 N. Y. S. 252.

In Wren v. Bradley, supra, it appeared that the testator left certain property in trust, a portion of the income to be paid as follows: "To my daughter, Ann Jeffries Wren, the wife of Abraham Wren, in case she shall be living apart from her said husband, the said Abraham Wren, and shall continue so to do during the lifetime of my said wife, an annuity of £30. . . . And I do hereby further direct that if at any time the said Ann Jeffries Wren shall cohabit with the said Abraham Wren, the said annuity hereinbefore given to her shall during the time she shall cohabit, absolutely cease and determine." The daughter and her husband were living separate on the date of the execution of the will, but they were living together at the testator's death. It was held that the testator intended to obstruct a reconciliation, and that the daughter was entitled to the legacy. In Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, supra, the evidence showed that the testator bequeathed property to her niece on the condition that the niece would cease to reside in Skipton. The niece's husband was working in Skipton and could not reside elsewhere. To comply with the condition, the niece would be compelled to separate from her husband. The condition was held to be void.

In the case of In re Moore, supra, the facts were that the testator left a legacy of £2 10s.

per week while the legatee should be living apart from her husband. At the death of the testator the legatee had never been separated from her husband, but a separation occurred about one year later. It was held that the condition sought to cause a separation of the parties, and was void.

In Winn v. Hall, 1 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 337, the will under consideration provided that the legatee should receive one thousand dollars "whenever she should become free from the power of" her husband. At that time a divorce suit was pending between the legatee and her husband. It was held that because it was against public policy to encourage divorces, the intention of the testator would be presumed to be to give the daughter the money as a provision for herself. The court said: "The manifest design of the testator was to give to the daughter the amount of money mentioned as a provision for herself. The literal import of the words used is to give it to her whenever she becomes free, or sui juris and the fact that a divorce was contemplated at the time the codicil was made ought not to alter the construction because such a construction is not within the letter of the will; and, second, because it is against public policy to encourage a dissolution of the marital relation, and it, therefore, will not be presumed that such was the intention of the testator."

In Conrad v. Long, 33 Mich. 78, it appeared that the testator left lands to his brother and sister, share and share alike. The sister's portion was conditioned as follows: "I give and bequeath to my sister Elizabeth Long, upon this condition: if at any time subsequent she should conclude not to live with her present husband, Henry Long, as his wife. But if she continue so to live as the wife of the said Henry Long until her death, then, in that case I give and bequeath all my property, real and personal, . . . to my aforesaid brother Frederick S. Conrad." The court said: "That the condition is void is admitted. It is contrary to the plainest principles of public policy to stipulate or provide in this way for a separation of husband and wife as a condition to the enjoyment of an estate. No separation against their will, except by divorce, is consistent with the nature of the marriage contract, which is of public as well as of private concern."

In Witherspoon v. Brokaw, 85 Mo. App. 169, it appeared that certain property was given to the devisee "so long as she may live separate and apart from her husband, Herbert Witherspoon, and no longer, and upon her reunion with him to vest, freed of this devise, in my son Charles D. Brokaw. Upon the death of said Herbert Witherspoon, before the termination of the above interest, the said . . . property shall vest in said

Emma Witherspoon [devisee] in fee simple absolute." The intention of the testator was presumed to be to insure the continuance of the separation, and not merely to assist the devisee during the separation, and the condition was held to be void. The court said: "It appears that Emma was married to Herbert Witherspoon and that they separated and that she returned to live with her aunt, the testatrix, bringing with her the child, Ora. And that she shortly afterwards obtained a divorce on account of desertion and nonsupport. Nothing has been heard from Herbert Witherspoon, though it does not appear that he is dead. If we view the will as giving the property to plaintiff Emma absolutely provided she remained separated from her husband as therein contemplated, it was a void condition and the property would be Emma's absolutely, freed from any condition. The condition would be void as against public policy. . . . If a separation had already taken place, or was in contemplation of being presently carried out, between Emma and her husband, and the will merely provided for her support or gave her property absolutely to sustain her so long as she should thus be deprived of the support of her husband it would be a valid will. The object being not to bring about the misfortune, but to provide for one who is in such an unfortunate condition. . . . But where the condition of the will shows by its terms and provisions that it is intended as a premium on the separation, and its object is to prevent a resumption of the marriage relation, it is void. We so regard the present will. It is apparent from the face thereof that the object of the testatrix was to make the separation final and that a reconciliation would be punished by a failure of the legacy."

In Snorgrass v. Thomas, 166 Mo. App. 603, 150 S. W. 106, the evidence showed that the testator left property in trust for his daughter. There was a provision in the will as follows: "It is further my will that if my said daughter shall lose her husband" then the property should pass to the daughter absolutely. This provision was interpreted as meaning a loss by divorce as well as by death. While the condition was sustained on the ground that the testator did not intend to induce a separation but merely provided for the daughter in case a separation should come about, the court said: "The law zealously guards the marriage relation and if we thought the will in hand was designated to hold an inducement to plaintiff to obtain a divorce from her husband we could condemn the provision creating the trust as contra bonos mores. But we find no evidence in the will of such intention. Certainly a father acts within the scope of his parental right in protecting a devise, or bequest, to his child against the possible depredations of her husband and in providing for the vesting of the absolute estate in the child on the cessation of the cause of the protective measures, that is to say, on the termination of the marriage relation, the father should be deemed to have been actuated by the praiseworthy motive of making suitable provision for possible future contingencies rather than by the reprehensible motive of attempting to impair the domestic happiness of his child by inciting her to a separation from her husband."

In Hawke v. Euyart, 30 Neb. 149, 46 N. W. 422, 27 Am. St. Rep. 391, it appeared that before the final execution of a will, a legatee was married to a woman to whom the testator was opposed. The will provided that if at the end of the ten years immediately subsequent to the testator's death, the legatee had severed all relations whatsoever with his wife, the executors should transfer the property to him. This condition was held to be void because it was in restraint of the continuation of the marriage relation.

In Potter v. McAlpine, 3 Dem. (N. Y.) 108, the evidence showed that the condition in the will was that a certain fund should be paid to the legatee when the legatee should "not live with or at any time contribute in any manner to the support or maintenance of his present wife." The condition was held to be illegal and void because contrary to public policy and good morals, the court saying that if the legatee complied with the condition, he would become liable to imprisonment for a violation of the laws of the state.

In Whiton v. Harmon, 54 Hun 552, 8 N. Y. S. 119, the facts found were that the testatrix devised all her realty to her son "for and during the term of his natural life, or while he shall live separately from his present wife." The son and his wife were separated at the time of the testatrix's death, and the condition was held to be void.

In O'Brien v. Barkley, 78 Hun 609 mem. 28 N. Y. S. 1049, it appeared that the testator left property in trust for his daughter, the income from which was to be paid to her during her natural life on the express condition that "she do not, at any time after my decease, associate, cohabit, or live with one James O'Brien." The will also provided that "in case she shall at any time after my decease, associate, cohabit, or live with the said James O'Brien," then the property was to be divided between other specified legatees, and further declared that "if the said James O'Brien shall depart this life, or otherwise lawfully cease to be the husband of my said daughter, and she shall at no time after my decease have associated or cohabited or lived with him, the said James O'Brien," then the property should be forthwith transferred to the daughter. This condition was held to be void and unlawful because contra bonos mores.

In Cruger v. Phelps, 21 Misc. 252, 47 N. Y. S. 61, the evidence showed that the testatrix left property in trust for her daughter, the income from which was to be paid to her provided that during the life of her husband, a resident of New York, she should travel in Europe, should be divorced absolutely from her husband and should remain so divorced. The condition was held to be void because it tended to induce a separation. The court said: "The condition, being imposed only during the lifetime of her husband, or until she obtains a divorce from him, is a direct inducement to the daughter to procure such divorce. The separation of husband and wife impairs the peace of families, seriously affects the offspring of the marriage, and is at war with the best interests of society. The courts have uniformly held all contracts and provisions tending to induce a husband and wife to live separate or be divorced void as against public policy and good morals."

In the case of Matter of Haight, 51 App. Div. 310, 64 N. Y. S. 1029, it appeared that the testator left property in trust, the income from which was to be paid to his son during his natural life, subject to the following condition: "It is my will that so long as the present wife of my said son shall be living, and he shall be lawfully bound to her as a husband, the income to be paid to my said son shall not exceed the sum of two thousand dollars in any one year; and that in case of the death of said wife, or in case of his ceasing to be bound to her as a lawful husband, then the whole of said income is to be paid over to my said son during his natural life." The condition was held to be void as against public policy and good morals in that it tended to destroy the legatee's matrimonial union. The reasons for the decision were given as follows: "The appellant insists that the provision of his father's will which makes his enjoyment of the whole of the income dependent on the termination of his marriage relations is void, as in contravention of good morals and public policy, and that he may now raise the question, notwithstanding the decree of November 10, 1880. I have concluded that he is correct on both points. As to the first point, the condition must be held void if its manifest object was to induce Benjamin Haight to take such steps as might be necessary in order that he should cease to be lawfully bound to his wife as a husband; in other words, to obtain, or provoke, and so occasion, a legal divorce or separation, either in this state or in some other jurisdiction. If any other and innocent construction can be placed upon the condition, it is, of course, to be adopted. But the will was made directly after the marriage of testator's son, and the condition must be regarded as made in hostility to that union, and in the hope of destroying it, in so far as that object could be accomplished by offering money by way of a premium or reward. It is true the condition is not in so many words that the son shall procure or suffer a divorce in order to entitle him to the entire income, but the precise effect of such an express condition is produced by a provision which gives him the entire income when such a divorce is procured or suffered. If the former offends public morals and contravenes public policy, it is difficult to see why the latter does not also.

. . . I can but conclude that there is no difference in spirit and principle between a gift made expressly dependent upon the procurement of a divorce and one which is made payable only in the event of a divorce. The one invites the divorce directly and in terms, while the other incites it by the offer of a premium. The end desired by the donor is the same, viz., to induce the separation or divorce, and the means employed must be regarded as objectionable, whatever form or language may be employed, so long as it is apparent that the sole object of the donor is to encourage that result, and the means employed are calculated to promote it."

In Moores v. Gwynne, 33 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 463, the evidence showed that a testatrix's will contained the following clause: "The remaining half of the residuum of my property shall be invested in a fund, the income of which shall accumulate from year to year and be added to the principal thereto for and during the natural life of Lenore Boyer Viers, or so long as she remains the wife of my brother, Basil W. Viers; then at her death, if my brother Basil W. Viers be living, or at her legal separation from my brother Basil W. Viers, if such occurs, my brother . . . shall receive the accumulated income of this one-half of the residue of my estate absolutely, and thereafter shall receive the income of this said fund for and during his natural life." The condition was held to be void. The court said: "By the provisions of this clause Basil W. Viers can only receive the legacy therein given upon the happening of one of two events, that is to say, at the death of his wife or his separation from her. She must either die or he must get a divorce. He is offered a pecuniary inducement to separate from her. A condition in a will designed to effect the separation of husband and wife is contrary to public policy and is absolutely void."

Qualifications of Rule.

A devise or legacy conditioned on a divorce or separation is valid if it is made by way of provision for an existing or anticipated separation or for any other reason does not operate as an inducement to a separation. Thus, in Shevell v. Dwarria, 70 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 384, it appeared that the testatrix left property to her nephew if he should be living with his wife at the time of the testatrix's death, but if he should not be living with his wife at that time, then he was to receive only one-half of the property and the wife was to receive the remaining portion. It was held that since the condition would be performed at the time of the death, it could not influence the conduct of the legatees. Likewise, in Ransdell v. Boston, 172 Ill. 439, 50 N. E. 111, 43 L.R.A. 526, the will under consideration gave the income from or the use of lands to the devisee until he should become sole and unmarried; and on the happening of that event, the devisee was to receive the lands in fee simple. If he should die without having divorced his wife, Julia, the lands should be held in trust for other devisees. At the time of making the will, there was a divorce suit pending between the devisee and his wife. They were separated and remained so for a number of years. It was held that the testamentary provision did not, therefore, incite the devisee to a separation, and the condition was upheld. The court said: "While it is of the first importance to society that contract and testamentary gifts which are calculated to prevent lawful marriages or to bring about the separation or divorce of husbands and wives should not be upheld, it is no less important that persons of sound mind and memory, free from restraint and undue influence, should be allowed to dispose of their property by will, with such limitations and conditions as they believe for the best interests of their donees. On the whole case, we are inclined to the view that the condition in this will should not be held as contrary to public policy and void." In Coe v. Hill, 201 Mass. 15, 86 N. E. 949, there was involved a gift of property to be held in trust for the testator's daughter until her legal separation from her husband, on which event the whole fund was to vest in her. While it was said that if this provision was purposed to induce a separation, it would be void because antagonistic to public policy, it was held that the testator's intention was to provide for his daughter in case she should become a widow or should secure a separation based on her legal rights, and the validity of the condition was therefore sustained. The reasons for the decision were given by the court as follows: "In its conservation the law has steadily refused to sanction the validity of testamentary provisions founded upon conditions precedent to their enjoyment by the legatee, which are intended to bring about the separation of husband and wife.

If the testator's purpose was to induce a future separation or divorce of his daughter from her husband, upon the happening of which the fund with accrued income would immediately become payable to her, the condition for this reason would be void. . . . But, while the testator's intention is the only test, the language he employed is to be construed in the ordinary sense, and for this purpose the condition, which is made dependent upon either one of two contingencies, is to be treated as a whole. If this is done, then, upon either the death of the husband or upon a divorce between them, whether obtained by her or by him, the fund vests in possession, but it would be a plain perversion of words to say that the testator meant or intended that, in order to accelerate the enjoyment of the property, the petitioner should procure either her husband's death or a divorce. The testator refers only to a separation, which, under the laws of his domicile, whose provisions he may be presumed to have in mind, could be grounded by her only on the husband's misconduct. He speaks of its permanency in the sense that the marriage status was to be ended, not by a breach of marital obligations, but by an irrevocable decree for an absolute divorce. It is as if, in making provision for her future welfare, he had said, 'If my daughter becomes a widow,' or 'If because of her husband's marital misconduct she lawfully obtains an absolute divorce, then the trust as to her is to be terminated, and she is to have her share of the property.' The voluntary exercise by a legatee of a right which the law confers is not against public policy, and does not avoid a testamentary gift, the language of which may show the testator had in mind that such a contingency might arise." Similarly, in Dusbiber v. Melville, 178 Mich. 601, 146 N. W. 208, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 367, it appeared that a will provided that if the legatee could not live with her husband because of his cruelty, and if for that reason she should be compelled to support herself, then she was to have a legacy of two thousand dollars. The executor was empowered to determine whether the legatee could live with her husband. At the time of the execution of the will divorce proceedings were pending. The condition was held to be valid in view of the fact that the legatee was not to determine the possibility of living with her husband. In deciding the case, the court said: "The testator knowing that the inevitable was near, made this provision for Mrs. Melville only eight days before he passed away. At the time he made the will he was cognizant of the fact she was living separate from her husband, and that she had begun divorce proceedings against him. It is not unreasonable to suppose that he felt that he owed her some duty to provide for her if she could not live with her husband after he was gone. If she could and did live with him again, she would be provided for, and would be in no need of his bounty. If she could not, she would then need the legacy which he gave to her. Considered from this viewpoint, I am impressed that the condition is not an unreasonable one, especially in view of fact that she is not to be the judge as to whether she can live with her husband, but that determination lies with the executor. She might decide that she could not; but that would not entitle her to the legacy. The executor might conclude otherwise, and, if he did, she could not get it, even though she actually lived away from her husband."

Two New York decisions have sustained provisions that property should vest if the legatee should be separated from her husband, but in each case the court declared that if the condition was designed to induce a separation, it would be void. In Cooper v. Remsen, 5 Johns. Ch. 459, the provision was as follows: "I do give and bequeath to her [the legatee], during her separation from William Cooper, her present husband, one thousand dollars a year." The separation was already existing. The condition was held to be lawful. The court said: "There is a wide difference between a bequest to a daughter during her separation from her husband, when the separation was then actually existing, without being procured by the testator, and a legacy to her, if she lived apart from her husband; for that would be to hold out a temptation to a separation which would be contra bonos mores. The legacy would be simple and pure in the latter case . . . but in the former case the legacy depends upon the fact of separation then already commenced, and was in that event, a kind and charitable provision." In Paider v. Suchy, 159 App. Div. 230, 144 N. Y. S. 252, the evidence showed that the testator left property in trust, the income thereof to be payable to his daughter in case she should be a widow or should not be living with her husband. The daughter was confined in an insane asylum and was thus living apart from her husband. The provision was construed to mean such a separation as was then taking place, and the condition was held to be valid. It was said that if the provision was construed as offering a premium for separating from the husband, the condition would be void because against public policy, but that the circumstances did not warrant such an interpretation.

In some cases the validity of a condition that a legacy or devise shall not vest unless the party shall obtain a divorce seems to rest on the intention of the testator rather than on the existence of an actual inducement to end the matrimonial union. In re Gunning, 234 Pa. St. 139, 83 Atl. 60, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 637; Ellis v. Birkhead, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 529, 71 S. W. 31; Thayer v. Spear, 58 Vt. 327, 2 Atl. 161; Snorgrass v. Thomas, 166 Mo. App. 603, 150 S. W. 106. In the case of In re Gunning, supra, it appeared that a testatrix's will contained the following clause: "The income of the balance to be given to Karl F. Miller, provided he is not living with the woman he married in 1899—one Jane Wilson, should she die, or he be divorced from her—that is finally divorced—he is to be given absolutely one-half of the principal, and the interest of the other half as long as he lives." The condition was sustained. It was held that the condition was intended merely to keep the wife from receiving any benefit from the money and that there was no inducement to cause a separation. In Ellis v. Birkhead, supra, the evidence showed that under the will the property was kept in trust for a daughter of the testator. But if she outlived her husband or if she should be divorced from him, then the legal title to a life estate would vest in her. Although there was evidence of strained relations between the testator and the husband, the court construed the condition as not having been made to induce a divorce but to provide for the daughter in case she should be needy. The will was held to be valid. The reasons for the decision were given as follows: "While it may be readily conceded that conditions in a will manifestly intended to bring about a separation or divorce are void, we think they should be clearly so before the courts, by decree, nullify the expressed will and purpose of the testator, for our statutes on the subject, as well as sound considerations of public policy, dictate that those having testamentary capacity shall have the greatest freedom, consistent with public safety, in the disposition of their estate by will, and the importance of this right should not be ignored. In our judgment, the will before us should not be construed as manifestly intended to incite a divorce between appellees, but, rather, that the testator merely intended to provide for his daughter in the contingency named, and to protect her in the meantime from the improvidence of her husband." In Thayer v. Spear, 58 Vt. 327, 2 Atl. 161, it appeared that the testatrix bequeathed to her daughter the income of the estate so long as she remained married to her then husband; but if the daughter should become a widow, or for any cause should cease to be the wife of her then husband, her ownership was to become absolute. The provision was held to be valid, because the testatrix did not intend to induce a separation from the husband, but to provide for the daughter in case she should be deprived of her husband's care. In speaking of the condition, the court said: "It was a wise and prudent provision to make for her daughter. While she should remain a wife, her husband would be under obligation to support her, and hence the income, only, was absolutely left her during the continuance of that relation; but when she should cease to be a wife, and so become dependent upon her own resources, it was just and wise to provide that she should have the entire estate."

While no other decision goes as far as does the reported case in sustaining a gift conditioned on the obtaining of a divorce, several courts base their holdings on a similar argument, i. e., that the condition involves only the exercise of a right granted by law. In Cowley v. Twombly, 173 Mass. 393, 53 N. E. 886, 46 L.R.A. 164, the will under consideration provided that the property should be held in trust so long as the testator's son should remain the husband of his then wife. On the death or divorce of the wife, the trust was to cease, and the son would hold the property in his own right. It was held that it was not against public policy to make a devise contingent on the devisee's obtaining a divorce, because a divorce was a legal right and obtainable only for cause. The court said: "The scheme of the trust no more tended to induce the son improperly to procure a divorce between himself and his wife, than to induce him to procure her death. Either event would give the son an estate which otherwise he could not have. But the testator was under no obligation to give property to his son, and had full right, if he chose, to give it to the defendant, his niece. There is here no gift to the son upon a condition that the son should lose the benefit of the gift if he should not separate from his wife, as in Wren v. Bradley, 2 DeG. & Sm. 49, and in Conrad v. Long, 33 Mich. 78. What the testator has done is to provide that, upon the son's death, the property shall go to the defendant, unless before the son's death the woman who when the will was made was the son's wife had ceased to be such by reason of death or divorce. That a devisee of a contingent remainder will benefit by the death of the life tenant does not make such a devise void as against public policy, because tending to induce the remaindermen to compass the death of the life tenant. The separation of husband and wife, the marriage continuing, is against public policy. Hence conditions annexed to limitations by settlements or wills, providing that a husband or wife shall lose the benefit of an estate unless they live separate, have been held void. . . . But while the separation of persons who are husband and wife is against public policy, divorces are provided for, sanctioned and regulated by law. There is no more likelihood or presumption that a divorce will be wrongfully brought about by one of the parties to a marriage in order to secure property, than that a death will be so occasioned. A testator no more offends public policy by simply making his bounty contingent upon the occurrence of a divorce than of a death." In Boon v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 22 Pac. 169, 338, 5 L.R.A. 577, it appeared that by the will property was left to trustees, the income from which was to be equally distributed quarterly among the children. It was provided that "in the event of any of my said daughters becoming a widow, or otherwise becoming lawfully separated from her husband," then that daughter was to receive immediately her portion of the principal of the estate. One daughter divorced her husband and was assigned her undivided interest in the realty. The other daughter contended that the condition of the will was void in that it was against public policy and contra bonos mores, because it incited an encouraged the daughters to separate from their husbands. But the validity of the condition was sustained, on the ground that it merely incited the daughters to do a lawful act in a lawful way. The separation would have to be passed on by a court. The court said that such a provision was not only valid, but under certain circumstances was commendable.

RILEY ET AL.

LITCHFIELD ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—December 19, 1914.

168 Iowa 187; 150 N. W. 81.

Names — Presumption that Letter Constitutes Name.

A person's name is composed of the Christian name and a surname, and a Christian name may consist of letters only, and there is no presumption that letters are not themselves Christian names, and where a letter or letters appear before a surname they are treated, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, as the Christian name assumed by the person.

[See note at end of this case.]

Disregarding Middle Name or Initial.

Where two or more Christian names are used, the middle name or names or letter is generally disregarded.

[See 15 Ann. Cas. 117; Ann. Cas. 1912B 601.]

Same.

Where a given name is written, the middle name or letter may be disregarded in identifying the person.

Intoxicating Liquors — Consent to Sale — Signatures — Identity with Poll List.

Where poll lists contained the Christian names of electors, while the names to a statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors contained only the letters of the Christian names, the signatures to the statement were not signatures of names of persons appearing on the poll books, and must be disregarded.

Same.

Where names signed to a statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors were spelled differently from the names in the poll books, but the names would be pronounced the same, the doctrine of idem sonans will apply, and the names must be counted.

Proceeding for Permission to Sell — Nature of Proceeding.

A proceeding under the mulct law for permission to sell intoxicating liquors pursuant to a statement of consent, though special, is at law.

Mode of Trial.

Code, § 2450, providing for the filing of statements of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors, and authorizing any aggrieved party to appeal from the decision of the board of supervisors to the district court, where the matter shall be tried de novo, requires a trial in the district court as though not previously heard.

Review of Finding.

A finding by the district court, on appeal from a finding of the board of supervisors, that a statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors is insufficient, will not be disturbed on appeal where there is room for reasonable minds to differ as to the facts.

Consent to Sale — Signatures — Conformity to Poll Book.

Where the names on a statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquor and on the poll books are the same, the identity of the signers with the electors whose names are on the poll books is presumed, but the presumption may be overcome.

Signature by Incorrect Name.

Where persons signing a statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquor testified that the names signed by them were not their true names, but that the change in the signatures was to make the names conform with those on the poll books, and not to deceive, but there was nothing to show that other persons resided in the city bearing the names appearing on the poll books, the names must be disregarded in determining the number of signers on the statement.

Same.

Where "C. A. Oppelt" signed a statement of consent as "E. A. Oppelt," the name appearing on the poll book, and he testified to having resided in the city and to having voted at the last preceding election and that there was no one living in the city by the name of "Oppelt" excepting himself and son, and that the son had never voted, but did not know whether a person by the name of "E. A. Oppelt" voted, the person signing as "E. A. Oppelt" was "C. A. Oppelt," and his name must be counted.

Same.

Where persons signing a statement of consent to the sale of liquor testified that the names signed by them were not their true names, evidence that the change in signatures was to make the names conform with those on the poll books and not to deceive, and that all of them were registered in their true names, but none of their true names appeared on the poll books, is admissible as against the objection that the evidence varied or explained the names on the poll books.

Same.

Where electors signing a statement of consent to the sale of liquor, on discovering that their true names were not on the poll books, signed the names to the statement corresponding with those on the poll books, supposed to have been written for them by the judges of election, pursuant to advice of canvassers to procure signatures to a statement of consent, the canvassers are not chargeable with inducing electors to sign names other than their own.

Affidavit to Signatures — Knowledge of Affidavit.

The purpose of Code, § 2452, declaring that the signing of a name of another to any statement of consent shall be punishable as forgery, and every statement shall be accompanied by affidavit of some reputable person showing that these persons personally witnessed the signing of each name thereon, and any false statement in the affidavit shall be punishable as perjury, is that each signer shall be identified as the person named, so that a genuine statement may form the basis of subsequent proceedings, and a canvasser who procured over 200 signatures to which he made affidavit, and who admitted that he did not know over half of them, and had never seen them before or since the signing of the petition, and only knew their names because attached to the statement, is guilty of perjury in the performance of his work and is not a reputable person, and the signatures procured by him must be excluded.

Effect of Death or Removal of Signer.

Code, §§ 2448, 2452, providing that a statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors signed by a majority of the voters as shown by the poll list shall, if found sufficient, be effectual, and that no name shall be counted that is not signed within thirty days prior to the filing of the statement, imply that all signing within thirty days prior to the filing shall be counted, and fixed the period during which signatures may be procured, and the thirty days mentioned is that period, and a name signed within that time and while a resident of the municipality must be counted, though he has since that time removed from the city or has died.

Qualification of Signers — Right to Vote — Poll Book — Conclusive.

The poll list of the electors is conclusive evidence of those who voted at the election in determining whether a statement of consent to the sale of liquor has been signed by the requisite number of electors, and the law does not contemplate an investigation as to who had the right to vote, but it is sufficient that the name appeared on the poll lists.

Withdrawal of Signature — Revocation of Withdrawal.

Electors signing a statement of consent may revoke withdrawals not filed, and may file revocation of withdrawals prior to the taking effect of withdrawals.

Appeal from District Court, Black Hawk county: DUNHAM, Judge.

Action by J. H. Riley et al., plaintiffs, against H. L. Litchfield et al., defendants. From judgment rendered, all parties appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

[190] Appeal from a judgment of the district court declaring the statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the city of Waterloo insufficient, thereby affirming a like finding of the board of supervisors of Black Hawk County. The appeal is by both parties, that of those presenting the statement being first perfected. Affirmed.

W. N. Birdsall, H. B. Boise and J. T. Sullivan for appellants.

Wirt P. Hozie, Reed & Tuthill and Court-right & Arbuckle for appellees.

LADD, C. J.—A written statement of consent to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the city of Waterloo purporting to be signed by 3,917 persons who had voted at the last preceding election at which 6,795 votes had been cast was filed with the county auditor, December 17, 1912. Of these, 402 subsequently were withdrawn, 18 names were twice signed, 9 were forgeries, 2 improperly witnessed, 2 were names of nonresidents, and 4 did not appear on the poll books. In addition to these, 36 were not counted because of difference in names on statement from those appearing on the poll books, 23 owing to difference in initials and 26 being declared fictitious names. Deducting these, or 522 names, from the 3,917 appearing on the statement of consent, there remained but 3,395 or 3 less than a majority of the electors voting at the last preceding election.

The appeal by those presenting the statement of consent will be considered first.

I. Thirty-six names attached to the petition of consent were not counted because different from any appearing on the poll books and the correctness of this ruling as to the following names is challenged by appellants: [191]

Ward.	Precinct.	Name.	Poll No.	Name.
2d	1st	Robert Thorn	307	R. Thorn
2d	1st	Hiram B. Colvin	415	H. B. Colvin
2d	1st	John R. Armstrong	741	J. R. Armstrong
3d	2d	Will G. Lusthoff	288	W. G. Lusthoff
4th	1st	Lee Lovelett	422	L. Lovelett

A person's name is the mark or indicium by which he is distinguished from other individuals. By universal practice or custom, the designation is composed of the christian or given name and a surname. The one is given at birth or at baptism, the other is the patronymic derived from the common name of parents. The Christian or first name is in law, and is denominated the proper name. Surnames do not appear to have come into use in England until the middle of the fourteenth century and were not considered of controlling importance until the time of Queen Elizabeth. Because of the given name being conferred by the religious rite of baptism, it was deemed of the more importance, whereas the surname was then usually assumed by the individual or given him by others because of some characteristic or peculiarity. Snook Petition, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 566.

Some Christian names were often borne by several individuals, and so the use of the surname was adopted in order to better distinguish the one from the other. Such distinctions were often made by the name of the estate or place where born or of abode or from whence the individual came, or by occupation. The Christian or given name may consist of letters only, though this does not frequently happen,—and there is no presumption that letters stand for other names and are not themselves the Christian name of the party. Hinkle v. Collins, 113 Mich. 105, 71 N. W. 481; Andrews v. Wynn, 4 S. D. 40, 54 N. W. 1047; State v. Cameron, 86 Me. 196, 29 Atl. 984; Tweedy v. Jarvis, 27 Conn. 42; King v. Hutchins, 28 N. H. 561, 578; State v. Webster, 30 Ark. 166; Minor v. State, 63 Ga. 318; Charleston v. King, 4 McCord L. (S. C.) 487; Lomax v. Landells, [192] 6 C. B. 577, 60 E. C. L. 577; Perkins v. McDowell, 3 Wyo. 328, 23 Pac. 71; Note to Laffin, etc. Power Co. v. Steytler, 146 Pa. St. 434, 23 Atl. 215, 14 L.R.A. 690.

Possibly a single letter may have become so commonly used as an abbreviation for the Christian name that in view of other circumstances it will be recognized as such. Thus "J" before the surname was held in Clafin v. Chicago, 178 Ill. 549, 53 N. E. 339, to be the abbreviation of John. But generally where a letter or letters appear before the surname they are treated, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, as the Christian name, assumed by the party; for, as parents are under no legal obligation to baptize their children, the first name may be assumed and consist only of a letter or letters. Tweedy v. Jarvis, 27 Conn. 42; Charleston v. King, 4 McCord L. (S. C.) 487; Reg. v. Dale, 15 Jur. (Eng.) 657; Lomax v. Landells, 6 C. B. 577, 60 E. C. L. 577.

Where two or more Christian names are used, the middle name or names or letter is quite generally disregarded, though the rule appears otherwise in Massachusetts. Parker v. Parker, 146 Mass. 320, 15 N. E. 902.

The middle name or names, letter or letters cannot well be said not to constitute a part of the name, as some decisions declare, but merely are not essential to the identification of the person.

Where the given name is written, then the middle name or letter may be disregarded in identifying the individual and where only a letter or letters precede the surname such letter or letters, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, are to be treated as the given or proper name. It should be added that differences in spelling are of no consequence if this makes no difference in the sound when correctly pronounced.

These rules were recognized in Wilson v. Bohstedt, 135 Ia. 451, 100 N. W. 898, and Porter v. Butterfield, 116 Ia. 725, 89 N. W. 199, and it need only be added that the ruling of the court, in holding the above names not the same, was not erroneous.

[193] II. A considerable number of names spelled differently on the statement of consent and in the poll books were counted because of sounding the same. The doctrine of idem sonans was held not applicable to seventeen names. As to two of these, we have no difficulty in disagreeing with the district court. One of these appeared on the petition as Arthur Rohweder, and on the poll book as Arthur Rohwweder. Spelled either way, the surname would be pronounced the same. Indeed, it would be difficult to so pronounce the two as to render the sounds distinguishable. E. F. Goodell was spelled alike on both petition and poll book.

As to some of the other names, there is a difference of opinion, but as, on other grounds, we find the statement of consent insufficient, it is unnecessary to review in detail the remaining fifteen. For a collection of authorities, however, see 29 Cyc. 272 et seq.

III. The court's finding as to the manner in which the above names and some others were spelled on the poll books is challenged. We have examined these names on the poll books and are inclined to the opinion we ought not to interfere. Were the matter before us for hearing as an equitable action, the writer would be inclined to hold that several of the names rejected were identical with those on the statement of consent. This is true, to illustrate, of O. H. Sossaman, A. C. Sorensen, H. S. Caward and Matt Geib. The second letter of each of the first two on the poll book might well have been read "o" instead of "a" and in the third "a" instead of "o". But the second letter in Caward's name seems almost exactly like the second letter in the others. Had those making affidavits to signatures to the statement of consent appreciated their purpose as being to identify these as the signatures of those signing, some help might have been derived from this source. This is especially true in the case of Matt Geib. His given name on the statement was found [194] to be Watt though the affidavit described him as Matt and the name so appears on the poll book. Persons examining these reach different conclusions and would be as likely, perhaps more likely, to agree with the conclusion reached by the district judge than otherwise. As persons other than the elector enter his name on the poll books, some liberality is desirable in making comparisons to the end that, while none but electors may be included as signing the statement of consent, as few as possible be denied an expression of their wish without their fault, because of mistakes or oversights of election officers. However, there was room for the findings of the trial court, and, as minds might well differ, such findings must be accorded the effect of a verdict and cannot be disturbed. The proceeding, though special, is at law. Dye v. Augur, 138 Ia. 538, 110 N. W. 323; Porter v. Butterfield, 116 Ia. 725, 89 N. W. 199; Green v. Smith, 111 Ia. 183, 82 N. W. 448.

True, section 2450 of the Code provides that in the district court the matter shall be tried de novo. This means no more than that it shall be tried not as before the board of supervisors or on the record there made, but again and as though not previously heard. An analogy is found in appeals from justices of the peace which are tried in the district court anew but always at law precisely as special proceedings, in the absence of any provision contrary, are there tried. No provision respecting appeals in such matters to this court are to be found and therefore these must be on errors as in other law actions. If then, in examining the names on the poll books and comparing them with those on the statement of consent, minds might reasonably differ as to their being the same or different, the finding of the trial court must be accorded the force of a verdict of the jury. For this reason we are not disposed to disturb the findings of the trial court.

IV. Where the names on the statement of consent and the poll books are the same, the identity of the signers with the [195] electors whose names are on the poll books is presumed. To overcome this presumption, twenty-three electors were called by contestants and testified that the names by them signed were not their true names. On cross-examination, proponents elicited that the change in signature was to make the names conform with those on the poll books and not to deceive. This was objected to for the reason that the poll books were the exclusive evidence of who had voted. Appellees insist also that the evidence failed to identify these witnesses with those who had voted under the particular names appearing on the poll books. All of them were registered in their true name and none of their true names appear on the poll books. But for all that appears save as to the witness referred to further on, none knew whether other persons resided in the city bearing the names appearing on the poll books. This being so, it could not well be inferred that these witnesses were the persons intended rather than others, especially since they may as well have been given other initials or names in the poll books. It was a mere guess or surmise and not sufficient on which to base a finding. Had others of the same surname who had voted at the election been called and showed that they voted under other names appearing on the poll book, then there would have been room for the inference that the particular person's name was as written therein, especially if it were shown that no other of that name resided within the precinct. That the elector knew of no one of that name was of little significance unless a showing were made that he probably would have known if there were such. In Taft v. Snouffer, 157 Ia. 461, 137 N. W. 922, the identity of the person signing with him whose name was written on the poll book was conceded. Here the proof was insufficient to do more than show that the particular elector voted and that a name something like his appeared on the poll book and that he knew of no one in the precinct bearing such name. It is needless to say that this [196] was not conclusive and in any event did not preclude a finding to the contrary. As to one only was the evidence of this character. C. A. Oppelt, who signed the statement of consent as E. A. Oppelt, the name appearing on the poll book, testified to having resided in Waterloo, to having voted at the last preceding election, that there was no one living in Waterloo by the name of Oppelt except himself and a son by that name, and his son had never voted, but that he did not know whether a person by the name of E. A. Oppelt voted.

In the light of this evidence and in view of the fact that but one Oppelt voted in the precinct, there is but one inference reasonably to be drawn from this evidence and it is that Oppelt was the identical person whose name appeared on the poll book as E. A. Oppelt. All this evidence was objected to as tending to vary or explain the names on the poll books, but such was not its design. The witnesses having been asked by appellees whether their names were as actually signed to the statement of consent and it appearing that they were not, this evidence was adduced to show that, although different, they were not forgeries or fictitious names but those of the identical persons who had voted and their names entered in the poll books precisely as they had signed them to the statement of consent. For this purpose, the evidence was admissible.

V. On the appellees' appeal they contend that the evidence disclosed that several of the canvassers were not reputable persons in that (1) they were guilty of perjury; (2) induced electors to sign names other than their own; and (3) made affidavits to signatures of electors unknown to them. Disposing of the second of these first, it is to be said that a number of electors, upon discovering that their true names were not on the poll books, signed the names to the statement corresponding with those on the poll books which were supposed to have been written for them by the judges of election. This was in pursuance [197] of the advice of those in charge of the campaign and was approved in Taft v. Snouffer, supra, and therefore the action of those making affidavit thereto cannot well be criticized.

The first and third grounds may be considered together. Section 2452 of the Code declares that, "The signing the name of another to any statement of general consent provided for in the sections of this chapter relating to the mulct tax, shall be punishable as forgery, and every such statement shall be accompanied by the affidavit of some reputable person showing that said person personally witnessed the signing of each name appearing thereon, and any false statement contained in such affidavit shall be punishable as perjury." The manifest design of this statute was that each signer be identified as the person named, to the end that a genuine statement form the basis of subsequent proceedings.

As said in re Intoxicating Liquors, 120 Ia. 680, 95 N. W. 194, "the object of the legislature in adopting this provision was to secure a genuine statement—that is, one signed by the requisite number of qualified persons—and to furnish the board of supervisors a prima facie showing by way of affidavit that the signatures relied on are genuine." The notion of an attesting witness is that a person other than the one signing place his name on the paper or instrument for the purpose of making an implied or express statement thereby that it was then known by him to have been signed or executed by the purported maker. 11 Wigmore on Ev. Sec. 1292.

And this was the interpretation of the statute by those preparing the form of affidavit used in which the affiants deposed that the person named therein signed "the foregoing statement of consent in my presence and that I personally witnessed his signature thereto." It was not essential that the canvasser make the affidavit; any reputable person may do so provided he is able to identify the individual signing the statement as the person of the name signed. Were less exacted, the making of the affidavit would be an idle and useless [198] formality. Several of the canvassers made affidavit to signatures without knowing who made them. One of them estimated that one-third of those signing were strangers and another thought one-half had never been seen by him before or since. Another declared that he did not give the question of identity of the persons with the names signed any consideration whatever.

One B. D. Ryan testified that he procured 200 to 225 signatures to which he made affidavit; that he did not know all of them, probably not over half and never saw them before or since and only knew their names from these being attached to the statement. He had been acquainted with E. F. Patterson, residing at 901½ Sycamore Street, and employed by the Independent Electric Company, for three or four years and had requested him to sign the statement of consent two or three times, but Patterson refused and never did sign it. Nevertheless, Ryan made affidavit that E. F. Patterson signed the statement and that he personally witnessed such signing, and his explanation was that a person whom he did not know and who gave his residence as at a transient hotel signed that name. No reason for thinking such person E. F. Patterson appeared and there is no escape from the conclusion that Ryan was guilty of wilful perjury in making the affidavit. In the instance of Seeland, the evidence is not so conclusive, though he gave no attention whatever to the identity of the person signing the name, and his affidavits to signatures purporting to be those of Albrecht, Neith and Case, none of whom ever attached his name to the statement, were false. Other forgeries were shown and in view of the carelessness of the canvassers, still others may not have been detected. Whatever may be said as to the showing against Seeland, that against Ryan was conclusive and no argument is essential to sustain the conclusion that a person guilty of perjury in the performance of the work under investigation is not a reputable person. Not being such, the signatures witnessed by him should have been rejected. Taft v. Snouffer, 157 Ia. 461, 137 N. W. 922; Foster v. Crisman, 165 Ia. 189, 144 N. W. 1021.

[199] VI. After signing the statement and before it was filed, several of those who signed died and others removed from the city before the statement was filed and it is insisted by appellees that the names of these should not have been counted on the petition.

The statute provides that as a condition to the taking effect of the mulct law, "A written statement of general consent that intoxicating liquors may be sold in such city, signed by a majority of the voters residing in such city, voting therein at the last preceding election, as shown by the poll list of said election, shall have been filed with the county auditor and shall, by the board of supervisors, at a regular meeting, have been held sufficient, and its finding entered of record, which statement when thus found sufficient, shall be effectual for the purpose herein contemplated, until revoked, as hereinafter provided." Section 2448.

Section 2452 of the Code provides that "No name shall be counted that was not signed within thirty days prior to the filing of said statement of general consent." This implies that all signing within the thirty days prior thereto shall be counted and the statute quoted plainly means that the persons signing the statement shall be residents of the city at the time of signing. Some period must necessarily be fixed during which signatures may be procured and we think the thirty days mentioned is that period and that the name having been signed within that time and while a resident, it should be counted.

VII. It appears that some electors voted without being registered. They made the proper affidavits on the day of election and received certificates which were presented to the judges of election at the time of voting but the register was not signed, and for this reason, the appellees contend that they voted illegally and that their names ought not to have been counted. We have repeatedly held that the "poll list of the said electors" is conclusive evidence [200] of who voted at the election and those so voting are entitled to sign the petition and be counted. The law does not contemplate the investigation as to who had the right to vote, it being sufficient that his name appeared on the poll lists. The point is not well taken.

VIII. Some 14 electors who had signed the statement of consent executed withdrawals thereof, but subsequently, and before the withdrawals had been filed, executed revocations of the withdrawals and filed such revocations with the county auditor prior to the filing of the withdrawals with that officer. As the withdrawals had been revoked prior to their taking effect, there can be no doubt but that the revocations were effective and that the names were properly counted.

The complaint of appellants that withdrawals filed after the names undertaken to be withdrawn from the statement of consent had been counted is not borne out by the record before us and for that reason is not considered.

It will be observed that the margin of difference between the names on the statement of consent conceded to have been correctly counted, leaving out those procured by Ryan, and the majority of the electors at the last preceding election, is narrow, being but eighty-five, in a city having 6,795 electors. Rejecting the names appearing on the statement of consent witnessed by Ryan, there is left considerably less than a majority, and therefore, the district court rightly held the statement to have been insufficient.

On the grounds stated, we are able to agree that the judgment of the district court should be and it is Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that where a single letter is prefixed to a surname the presumption is that the letter constitutes the given name of the person designated and not that it is an abbreviation standing for the given name, "for, as parents are under no legal obligation to baptize their children, the first name may be assumed and consist only of a letter or letters." Accordingly it is held that there is no presumption that a person designated in a "poll book" by a given name and surname is the same as a person signing a petition with the same surname to which is prefixed the initial letter of the given name appearing in the "poll book." The presumption that a letter constitutes a name is discussed in the note to People v. Reilly, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1112.

SCOVEL ET AL.

SHADYSIDE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Louisiana Supreme Court—October 19, 1914.

137 La. 918; 69 So. 745.

Fixtures — Gas and Electric Light Accessories.

Combination gas and electric light chandeliers and brackets, mantels, stationary washstands, bathtubs, etc., attached to a building by the owner thereof for the service and exploitation of said building, are immovable by destination, and pass with the house when it is mortgaged or sold, if not reserved by the owner.

[See note at end of this case.]

Statutory Enumeration of Fixtures — Effect.

The instances given in article 468, Civil Code, of immovables by destination are merely illustrative, and are not restrictive.

Intent in Attaching Property — Change of Intent.

After movables have become immobilized by destination the mere change of mind on the part of the former owner cannot, of itself, deimmobilize them as against a purchaser without notice. It is the same with reference to a mortgage.

Manner of Attachment as Controlling Intent.

Whilst the purpose for which things are placed, by the owner, on "a tract of land," ordinarily determines whether or not they acquire the immobility of the land, the immobility vel non of things placed in a tenement or building (other, perhaps, than a manufacturing establishment which, legally speaking, has become part of the tract of land upon which it is erected) depends, finally, upon the manner in which they are attached thereto.

Gas or Electric Light Plant and Accessories.

Combination gas and electric light chandeliers and brackets which form parts or accessories of gas and electric light plants established, the one, in the cellar of the residence on a plantation, and the other, in the sugar house, and without which those plants would be unable to render the service for which they were established, partake of the immobility of the plants, and cannot be reclaimed by the vendor of the plantation, on the ground that they are not permanently attached to the house, but may be unscrewed without injury to it or themselves.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from Civil District Court, Parish of Orleans: KING, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Isabel Scovel et al., plaintiffs, against Shadyside Company, Limited, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Brook & Himel and H. G. Bloch for appellants.

Foster, Milling, Brian & Saal for appellee.

[920] SOMMERVILLE, J.—Mrs. Barnett was one of the original plaintiffs in this cause; but, having died, her three sons and sole heirs, who were coplaintiffs with her, have been made parties in her place.

J. W. Barnett, the husband and father of plaintiffs, erected a building upon Shadyside plantation, in the year 1898, in which he and his family lived. The house was very complete in all of its parts, and was elegantly furnished. He mortgaged all of the property and its appurtenances; and subsequently he sold the plantation, together with the residence, in 1903, to the Shadyside Sugar Company, of which he and his family were the principal stockholders. That company also mortgaged the property and its appurtenances. It became involved, and was placed in the hands of a receiver, a sale took place under an order from the federal court, and the whole property was adjudicated to C. A. Farwell, who subsequently sold it to the Shadyside Company, Limited, defendant in this cause, April 7, 1904. Mr. Barnett died August 7, 1904.

The mortgages and sales referred to were made by Mr. Barnett without reserving to himself the household fixtures sued for by his heirs in this case.

Mrs. Barnett and some of her sons continued to live in the house until September, 1910. Subsequently they made demands upon the defendant company to turn over to them combination gas and electric light chandeliers and brackets which were in the house, together with bathtubs, toilets, stationary washstands, a complete double outfit for heating purposes, a complete gas outfit, mantelpieces, and certain grillwork. This suit was instituted therefor November 2, 1911.

[921] Defendant answered, denying that the articles referred to were the personal effects of plaintiffs, and alleged that they, the articles, had been permanently attached to the house, for the service and improvement thereof, by the owner, and that they were parts of the building, and that the building, as a residence, would be incomplete without them.

Since the filing of this suit the Legislature has declared that the things here sued for are immovable by their nature. Act No. 51 1912, p. 60.

The evidence shows that the articles mentioned were placed in the house at the time it was erected by Mr. J. W. Barnett; and it is clear that his intention was that they should be permanently attached thereto for the service and convenience of the house and its occupants.

Article 468, C. C., is as follows:

"Things which the owner of a tract of land has placed upon it for its service and improvement, are immovable by destination. . . . All such movables as the owner has attached permanently to the tenement or to the building, are likewise immovable by destination."

And article 469 provides:

"The owner is supposed to have attached to his tenement or building forever such movables as are affixed to the same with plaster, or mortar, or such as cannot be taken off without being broken or injured, or without breaking or injuring the part . . . to which they are attached."

In considering the two articles just quoted, in the case of Mackie v. Smith, 5 La. Ann. 717, 52 Am. Dec. 615, we hold that two valuable mirrors found in one of the rooms of a dwelling house, which had been sold in that case, were immovable by destination.

We there say that the only matter before the court to decide is whether or not the mirrors had been attached permanently to the building by the deceased. If they had been, the purchaser of the house had acquired them. It was shown that they were not affixed to the building with plaster or mortar, and that they could be moved without [922] being broken or injured. It was contended by the appellee that the mirrors might have been removed without breaking or injuring the parts of the building to which they were attached, and that, as the case would come under none of the provisions of the Code, the judgment in her favor should be affirmed. We there hold that the cases specified in article 469 do not limit the general disposition contained in article 468. Article 468 provides that all such movables as the owner has placed for the service and improvement of the land and those which are attached permanently to the building are immovable by destination; it embraces all cases in which the movable has been placed by the owner ad integrandum domum; and, when none of the presumptions established by article 468 exist, the fact may be shown by any competent evidence. 2 Toullier, No. 16; 4 Duranton, p. 63, No. 68.

In the Mackie Case it was shown that after the owner of the property purchased the mirrors recesses 4½ inches deep were cut in the walls of the room to receive them; that they were placed in these recesses and secured in their places by means of architraves or large wooden frames, which were nailed to plugs of hardwood fastened to the wall. The frames of the mirrors had grooves in them corresponding to a tongue in the architrave, and nails were driven from one to the other to make the glasses more secure. The recesses were left rough and unfinished: the glasses and architraves being clearly intended as a permanent finishing of the walls. It is difficult to conceive a case more strictly within the letter and spirit of article 468 of the Code.

And it is shown in this case that Mr. Barnett, in having bathtubs, toilets, stationary washstands, radiators, mantelpieces, and grillwork placed in the house which he was then erecting, caused holes to be made in the ceilings, walls, and floors for the introduction [923] of gas, water, and waste pipes with the view and intention of attaching all the fixtures, permanently to the building, thereby, in the language of the Code, making them immovable by destination. The evidence further shows that the moldings in the rooms were cut for the placing of the stationary washstands; that the mantelpieces were made of wood and tiles; that the removal of these things would not only leave holes in the walls, ceilings, and floors, but that the rooms would be left rough, unfinished and in an injured condition; and that repairs would have to be made to the house. The same is true of the grillwork, claimed by the plaintiffs, and which was put in the openings or doorways leading from one room into another throughout the house, for the purposes of ornamenting and beautifying the same.

The complete double outfit for heating purposes and the complete gas generating outfit are established under the building, several feet below the surface of the earth. They were clearly placed there for the service of the house, and were connected with the fixtures in the house, and were to be used therewith permanently or so long as they might last. They were attached permanently to the building, and they are declared to be immovable by destination.

The combination gas and electric light chandeliers and brackets fall within the same category as do the other things mentioned above. It is argued on behalf of plaintiffs that gas chandeliers have been held by the court to be movables, and that they do not usually form part of the premises in which they have been hung. Reference is made to the decision of the court in L'Hote v. Fulham, 51 La. Ann. 780, 25 So. 655. The evidence in that case showed that the chandeliers were only used for lighting by gas, and that they were screwed on the gas pipes, as was usual and customary in [924] the city of New Orleans, and that they were capable of being detached by being unscrewed and taken away without breaking or taking away the pipe or injuring the ceiling of the house. And we there hold that gas chandeliers, so far from being attached to pipes and to the walls of buildings, with reference to their remaining there permanently, are placed with direct reference to the facility of detaching and removing; that the chandeliers themselves, the pipes with which they are connected, and the walls through which the pipes are passed are not in the slightest degree injured by their removal. But in the instant case the evidence shows that the chandeliers and brackets are combination gas and electric light chandeliers and brackets, and that they were not prepared with direct reference to facility of detachment and removal. On the contrary, it is testified on the trial of this case that the electric wires which connect these chandeliers and brackets to the motor for generating electricity located in or near the sugar house on the plantation would have to be cut or broken to remove said articles; and this would leave exposed electric wires and holes in the ceiling and walls which would have to be repaired and the places be repapered to make the house safe, complete, and comfortable. It is quite evident to our minds that the owner in this case had these fixtures permanently attached to the building in which he and his family were to live, and did live, and that he designed them for the service and improvement of the building.

The views which we have here expressed are in line with the French authorities, and were adopted in the case of Morton Trust Co. v. American Salt Co. 149 Fed. 540. We quote from this last decision, in part, as follows:

"There are two, and only two, ways in which an immovable by destination may be created:

"(1) Without any physical attachment to the fundus, but merely by the dedication of the [925] movable to the service of the fundus. See Civil Code Louisiana, art. 468.

"(2) By means of a physical attachment affixing the movable permanently—a perpetuelle demeure. See Civil Code La. last paragraph of article 468."

"The above is an extract from Plainol, Droit Civil (Paris Ed. 1904) vol. 1, p. 703.

"These two kinds of immovables by destination are plainly shown by Civil Code Louisiana, art. 468 (459), in which instances of both kinds are given. See that article cited in full, supra. It may be well to say here that the instances given in that article are clearly not restrictive."

The court then proceeds to quote from Baudry-Lacantinerie, Droit Civil, Des Biens (Paris Ed. 1890) vol 5, p. 59, as follows:

"All the objects attached to a fundus by the owner for its service and exploitation are by that fact alone immovables by destination, whether they are placed there forever or not. . . . All movable objects so become immovables by destination, which an owner has attached to his fundus forever in another interest [the author meaning an interest other than the service and exploitation of the fundus]; such, for instance, as a purpose of utility to or of ornamentation of the fundus. Therefore perpetuity does not seem necessary except when the immobilization takes place in an interest other than the agricultural or industrial benefit of the fundus.'

"The same author, same work, and volume (page 56) states the essentials of immobilization to be: '(1) That the immovable was placed on a fundus, that is to say, an immovable by nature [either land or a building]; for the movable can only become an immovable by destination as being an accessory to the fundus. (2) That the movable was placed there in the interest of the fundus, that is to say, for its service, its exploitation, its utility or its ornament. (3) That it was placed there by the owner of the fundus. Immobilization by destination necessarily supposes the act of the owner. It could not result from the act of a lessee, a renter, or even a usufructuary. The reason is that immobilization by destination takes place in the interest of the fundus, and the owner is the sole representative of that interest.'"

We agree with the judge of the district court that the things sued for in this case were permanently attached to the house by the owner thereof for its service and improvement, and that they are therefore immovable by destination.

Judgment affirmed.

[926] ON REHEARING.

(October 18, 1915.)

MONROE, C. J.—By the terms of the order granting the rehearing, the present inquiry is restricted to the question of the status of the combination gas and electric light fixtures. Counsel for defendant call attention to the following admission, made on behalf of plaintiffs, which appears of record, to wit:

"It is admitted that these fixtures, all of which are being sued for in this action, were installed in the house, by the owner thereof, for the service of the house and the use of the occupants."

And it is argued that, the meaning of the admission being that the fixtures were installed by the owner, for the service of the house and the use of the occupants, whether owner, vendee, or tenants, the effect is to give to the fixtures the status of immovables by destination, no matter whether they are attached to the house, permanently or otherwise. Considering the fixtures by themselves, however, it is not altogether clear that the argument is well founded. Reproducing article 468 of the Civil Code, for the purposes of the present inquiry, it will be seen that it reads as follows:

"Art. 468. Things which the owner of a tract of land has placed upon it for its service and improvement are immovable by destination.

"Thus the following things are immovable by destination when they have been placed by the owner for the service and improvement of a tract of land, to wit: Cattle intended for cultivation. Implements of husbandry. Seeds, plants, fodder, and manure. Pigeons in a pigeon house. Beehives. Mills, kettles, alembics, vats, and other machinery made use of in carrying on the plantation and works. The utensils necessary for working cotton and saw mills, taffia distilleries, sugar refineries and other manufactories."

"All such movables as the owner has attached permanently to the tenement or to the building are likewise immovable by destination."

(Italics by the court.)

It will be observed that the article begins with the declaration that, "Things which the owner of a tract of land has placed upon it for its service and improvement are immovable [927] by destination;" that the word "things" is used without qualification as to the character of the things, and the word "placed" with no other qualification than that the "things" are to be placed upon "a tract of land," by the owner of the land, for its service and improvement. And the idea thus conveyed is emphasized in the second paragraph of the article, which purports, not to limit, but merely to illustrate, the character of the things contemplated by the first paragraph, and repeats the declaration that they "are immovable by destination when they have been placed by the owner for the service and improvement of a tract of land."

The next paragraph seems, however, to provide an exception to the comprehensive rule established by those which precede, for, notwithstanding that it follows the words "Thus," and "to wit," which are contained in the second paragraph, and would otherwise be governed by the rule applied to the "things" which are therein mentioned, it contains the specific declaration, "All such movables as the owner has attached, permanently, to the tenement or to the building are likewise immovable by destination," which is equivalent to saying that the preceding declarations, though apparently broad enough to include anything placed on a tract of land, in any manner, by the owner of the land, for its service and improvement, and certainly broad enough to include any "machinery made use of in carrying on the plantation and works," and any "utensils necessary for working cotton mills . . . and other manufactories" so placed by the owner, was not intended to include movables which the owner has attached "to the tenement or to the building," and which become immovable by destination only when attached "permanently" to such "tenement" or "building." The word "tenement," as thus used, is readily understood. The meaning of the word "building" is not so clear, and [928] may have been used either as a synonym for "residence," or as applicable to any building other than the mills, distilleries, refineries, and other manufactories mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

The lawmaker then specifies the circumstances under which the owner shall be considered to have attached, permanently or "forever," movables to his tenement or building so as to make them immovable by destination, viz.:

"Art. 469. The owner is supposed to have attached to his tenement or building forever such movables as are affixed to the same with plaster, or mortar, or such as cannot be taken off without being broken or injured, or without breaking or injuring the part of the building to which they are attached."

Another exception to the general rule enunciated in article 468 is declared in article 476, as follows:

"Art. 476. Materials arising from the demolition of a building, those which are collected for the purpose of raising a new building, are movables, until they have been made use of in raising a new building. But if the materials have been separated from the house or . . . edifice, only for the purpose of having it repaired or added to, and with the intention of replacing them, they preserve the nature of immovables, and are considered as such."

From which it follows that, whilst old material intended for the service and improvement of the land in the reconstruction of an old building is immovable by destination, new material intended for the service and improvement of the land in the erection of a new building does not acquire that status until actually used in the building.

In Mackie v. Smith, 5 La. Ann. 717, 52 Am. Dec. 615 (as appears from the opinion handed down), it was held that mirrors which had been set in recesses cut $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches deep in the walls, and the removal of which would have left the recesses rough, unfinished, and at variance with the obvious design of the architect, constituted the permanent finish of so much of the walls, and hence were parts of the house. The court said:

[929] "The plaintiff alleges and has shown that at a previous sale of the movable effects of the succession the mirrors were adjudicated to her, but, as the knowledge of that fact is not brought home to the defendant, we have only to inquire whether, under article 459 [now article 468] of the Code, they had been attached permanently to the building by the deceased. If they were, the defendant [who purchased the house] acquired them."

In Folger v. Kenner, 24 La. Ann. 436, it was held that an iron safe that had been built as part of the house had become immovable by destination, and that plaintiff had no more right to remove it than to remove "a mantelpiece from the drawing room."

In L'Hote v. Fulham, 51 La. Ann. 780, 25 So. 655 (also considered in the opinion handed down), the sole question decided was that gas chandeliers and brackets had not become immovables by destination. The court, after reviewing the facts and conclusions stated and reached in Mackie v. Smith, said:

"The facts of the cited case were much stronger for the purchaser than are those of the present one. The mirrors as placed in the rough recesses made in the wall were practically embodied in and formed part of the building itself, and the court not only reached that conclusion, but also the conclusion that such had been the intention of Mr. Story, that he had not contemplated a removal of the mirrors from their assigned place, but fixed them there as a permanency. We do not think there is a fair parallelism between that case and the one at bar, either as to the intentions of the owner in placing the movables in the building, in the mode [in] which they were attached thereto, or their situation after they were so attached. Chandeliers and brackets, so far from being attached to gas pipes and to the walls of buildings, with reference to their remaining there permanently, are prepared with direct reference to facility of detachment and removal. It is true that, when there are gas pipes connected with a building, and the occupants . . . desire to make use of the same, some means have to be resorted to to make use thereof, but chandeliers are not the only means of doing so, and when they are used they are so arranged as to be susceptible of easy change or alteration. Neither the chandeliers themselves, the pipes with which they are connected, nor the walls through which the pipes are passed are in the slightest degree injured by their removal. The only object for their attachment to the pipes to which they are joined is to enable them to [930] be utilized for the time being, just as fastenings of various kinds have to be resorted to to hold different movable objects temporarily in position for present use."

In considering the conclusion thus reached, however, we must assume that the chandeliers and brackets to which the court refers were independent articles, having no connection with anything else that the owner had put into the house save the pipes, from which they could be unscrewed; whereas in the instant case those things, in so far as they were intended for the illumination of the house by the use of gas, were component parts of a plant established in the cellar of the house for the manufacture of gas, and, in so far as they were for the use of electricity, were accessories of the electric light plant established by the same owner in the nearby sugar house, and with reference to which he had established them in the house. Those plants were indisputably immovables, and it does not appear to us that it would be reasonable to hold that they can be dismembered and their utility destroyed by the withdrawal, on the ground that they are movables, of those parts through which, alone, they can render the service for which they were established. As well might it be said that the cocks can be removed from the water pipes, or the steam and water gauges from the engine which supplies the house with heat, or that any other essential part of a plant the whole of which is an immovable can be converted into a movable merely because it can be unscrewed.

"The obligation of delivering the thing," says the Civil Code, "includes the accessories and dependencies, without which it would be of no value or service, and likewise everything that has been designed to its perpetual use." C. C. art. 2490.

The doctrine of the case of Receivership of the Augusta Sugar Co. 134 La. 971, 64 So. 870, is without application here. The question there was whether a vendor could enforce his lien upon particular pieces of [931] machinery which he was able to identify, but which had become immovable by destination, and which could not be withdrawn without disabling the sugar factory of which they had become parts. The majority of the court conceded that the machinery had become immovable by destination, but were of opinion that the right of the vendor to enforce his privilege was not thereby affected. The question here is, whether the vendor of immovable property, or those claiming under him, can recover from his vendee an essential part or accessory of that property on the ground that it was not included in the sale. Our conclusion is that he cannot.

It is therefore ordered that the decree heretofore entered in this case be reinstated and made the final decree of the court.

In the reported case the court considers the status as fixtures of accessories attached to a gas generating plant and an electric light plant which were installed in a private residence. While the court does not pass directly on the status of the plants themselves it is said obiter that the plants were indisputably "immovables" and a holding that the accessories were fixtures is put on the ground that they were so attached as to form integral parts of the plants.

The New Jersey cases have consistently held that gas generators or dynamos for generating electricity are fixtures and are included by a mortgage ordered of the realty. Keeler v. Keeler, 31 N. J. Eq. 181; Security Trust Co. v. Temple Co. 67 N. J. Eq. 514, 58 Atl. 865; Temple Co. v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 69 N. J. L. 36, 54 Atl. 295; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Guild (N. J.) 64 Atl. 694. But the view seems to have been taken that such a piece of apparatus does not become a fixture so as to prevent a tenant who has attached it to the landlord's realty from removing it during the term of the lease. Hays v. Doane, 11 N. J. Eq. 84. In Prudential Ins. Co. v. Guild (N. J.) 64 Atl. 694, a generator or dynamo installed in a factory for supplying it with electric light was held to be a part of the realty since it met the following requirements: "(1) Actual annexation to the freehold; (2) application to the uses for which the real estate was appropriated; and (3) erection or annexation with the intention of making a permanent accession to the freehold, by their use for an indefinite period in connection with the building." In Keeler v. Keeler, 31 N. J. Eq. 181, it was held that apparatus for generating gas situated in a building especially erected therefor and separated from the mill for which it was to manufacture gas was a part of the realty. In Temple Co. v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 69 N. J. L. 36, 54 Atl. 295, dynamos for lighting installed in a theatre were held to be fixtures since in addition to being annexed to the freehold they were fitted for and applied to the use to which the real estate was appropriated.

But in New Jersey L. Ins. Co. v. Allison, 107 Fed. 179, 46 C. C. A. 229, it was held that dynamos and engines constituting the lighting plant of a theatre did not pass under a mortgage thereof, the court saying: "The trial judge instructed the jury, in substance, that the dynamos and their connections were chattels, not fixtures, and that the engines and their connections were chattels, not fixtures, unless they found that they were to some extent a part of the heating system of the building, and if they so found they were fixtures. The dynamos and engines were not especially adapted for use in this particular building, were susceptible of use either singly or jointly with their connections in any other building or place where such machines are operative, and could be removed without difficulty and without any injury to the building or themselves. The circumstances that the building was prepared to be lighted with gas, that its electric lighting system was prepared for connection with the street supply, and that the dynamos and engines were introduced into the building upon considerations of temporary economy, and not of necessity, are quite controlling. We are satisfied that in his instructions to the jury in regard to the dynamos, the engines, and their connections, the trial judge committed no error of which the defendant had a right to complain." And in Vail v. Weaver, 132 Pa. St. 363, 19 Atl. 138, 19 Am. St. Rep. 598, the engine, dynamo and appliances constituting the electric lighting plant of a factory and by which electric power was supplied to a theatre across the street were held not to pass with the realty on foreclosure sale, no matter how securely fastened, for the intention rather than the method of attachment governed and the jury having found no intention to make the annexation permanent their verdict was controlling.

In Liebe v. Nicolai, 30 Ore. 364, 48 Pac. 172, dynamos and electric light machinery installed for use in a hotel by a tenant who agreed to "surrender all future erections and additions to or upon the same" were held, having been annexed for purposes of trade, to be removable at the option of the tenant. The court said: "The harsh doctrine of the common law in relation to the respective and reciprocal rights, duties, and obligations of a landlord and tenant has been very much ameliorated by modern adjudications, and it is now universally conceded, in enlightened countries, that the tenant has risen above the relation of a mere vassal to his lord, and now enjoys many privileges heretofore denied him. Among these may be classed the right to remove during the term of his lease all trade fixtures annexed to the demised estate, and, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, he may also remove, during the same period, erections and additions made by him upon the premises which hitherto had been considered paramount fixtures. In view of this modern doctrine, as announced in the opinion just quoted, we cannot think the dynamos and other electric light machinery are to be classed as erections or additions made to or upon the leased premises, and hence the defendants' claim to the same under this clause of the lease is without merit."

In Morrison v. Berry, 42 Mich. 389, 4 N. W. 731, 36 Am. Rep. 446, it was held that a gas machine installed in a house owned by the wife of the man who contracted therefor became a part of the freehold, so that a refusal by the wife to allow the removal thereof by the person who installed the machine on the premises could not be treated as a conversion of personal property.

Electric wires and poles used in connection with a public power plant for the transference of current are fixtures and pass under a mortgage of the plant. Fechet v. Drake, 2 Ariz. 239, 12 Pac. 694; Southern Electrical Supply Co. v. Rolla Electric Light, etc. Co. 75 Mo. App. 622. Thus in the case first cited it was held that the wires used in connection with an electric light plant formed an integral part of the machinery situated on the premises, and passed as fixtures to the mortgagee under a mortgage of the premises which contained the clause, "together with all machinery, including the boiler, engine and dynamo now situated on said land, and together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining." And in Southern Electrical Supply Co. v. Rolla Electric Light, etc. Co. 75 Mo. App. 622, it was said: "Applying the ordinary tests in determining what is a fixture or an appurtenance, unquestionably the wires belonging to an electrical plant would be regarded as an integral part of the plant or machinery however far they might be extended from the lot upon which the plant is situated." In Gunderson v. Swarthout, 104 Wis. 186, 80 N. W. 465, 76 Am. St. Rep. 860, a dynamo and exciter together with belts used in operating the same, all installed in a public plant subsequent to the giving of a mortgage thereon and so firmly attached to the realty that they could not move from their positions when used, were held to be a part of the realty since they were actually annexed to the realty, were adapted to the use to which the realty was devoted, and had been annexed with the intention of making them a permanent accession to the freehold.

It has been held that where service gas pipes leading from the mains in the street to a house are laid by a gas company through another's land, they retain their character of personality and the gas company has control over them. Laclede Gas Light Co. v. Gas Consumers Assoc. 127 Mo. App. 442, 106 S. W. 91. In Poughkeepsie Gas Co. v. Citizens' Gas Co. 20 Hun 214, it appeared that the plaintiff gas company had laid a pipe for the purpose of furnishing gas to a row of dwelling houses, the property of a single owner, across the land in front thereof. After the sale of the property to various owners, a rival gas company on the written consent of the purchasers disconnected the pipe from the plaintiff's main in the public street and attached it to its own. In an action for injunction the court held that the pipe remained personalty and could be considered as having been laid and maintained under a license from the original and subsequent owners.

Accessories.

IN GENERAL.

While there is some conflict of authority on the point, by the weight of authority, gas or electric appliances or so-called fixtures installed in a house do not become a part of the realty. See the cases cited in the following subdivisions of this note.

In Towne v. Fiske, 127 Mass. 125, 34 Am. Rep. 353, it appeared that a person in possession of certain property under a contract for the purchase thereof installed gas fixtures and having defaulted on the contract, before vacating sold the fixtures to another. It was held that the purchaser was entitled to remove the fixtures as against the owner as they did not become a part of the realty. The court said: "Gas fixtures, whether in the form of chandeliers suspended from the ceiling at the top of the room, or projecting as brackets from the perpendicular walls, though attached to the gas pipes by screws, and made tight by cement, are in the nature of furniture, and do not lose their character as chattels by reason of the manner in which they are affixed." In Andrews v. Powers, 66 App. Div. 216, 72 N. Y. S. 597, a gas grate and fixtures together with other articles installed in a house by a vendee in possession under a contract of sale were held to be a part of the realty in an action to recover their value by the seller thereof from the vendor of the house who had taken possession on the vendee's default in fulfilling the terms of the contract. It appeared that the removal of the articles would leave the house in bad condition and put the vendor to considerable expense to repair the damage resulting from the severance. In McFarlane v. Foley, 27 Ind. App. 484, 60 N. E. 357, 87 Am. St. Rep. 264, it was held that chandeliers and bracket lights which had been installed in a house by a contractor were realty on which the contractor was entitled to a mechanic's lien. In British Economical Lamp Co. v. Mile End. Empire, 29 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 386, it appeared that the plaintiff company had let certain electric filament lamps to the lessees of a theatre and that they were attached to the brackets in the customary and usual way. The defendants, on the lessees' default in payment of rent, having taken possession of the premises, the plaintiff claimed the ownership of the lamps. It was held that no recovery could be had.

AS BETWEEN MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.

It is the more generally accepted rule that gas and electrical appliances or accessories commonly known as fixtures attached to the realty in the usual and customary manner of making annexation or in such a way that detachment can be made without injury to the realty do not become a part thereof but retain their character of personalty, and therefore are not included in a mortgage of the realty. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Allison, 107 Fed. 179, 46 C. C. A. 229 (switchboards, chandeliers and appurtenances in theatre); Capehart v. Foster, 61 Minn. 132, 63 N. W. 257, 52 Am. St. Rep. 582 (gas chandeliers and burners); Rogers v. Crow, 40 Mo. 91, 93 Am. Dec. 299 (gas fixtures); McKeage v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 16 Hun 239, affirmed 81 N. Y. 38, 37 Am. Rep. 471 (gas fixtures); Cosgrove v. Troesch, 62 App. Div. 123, 70 N. Y. S. 764 (gas fixtures); Columbia Ins. Co. v. Kneisley, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 432, 13 Cinc. L. Bul. 437 (chandeliers and other gas fixtures); Penn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Thackara, 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 104; Montague v. Dent, 10 Rich. L. (S. C.) 135, 67 Am. Dec. 572 (chandeliers and pendant gas burner); Hall v. Law Guarantee, etc. Soc. 22 Wash. 305, 60 Pac. 643, 79 Am. St. Rep. 935 (globes for electric and gas lights and gas and electric light fixtures). See also Condit v. Goodwin, 44 Misc. 312, 89 N. Y. S. 827, affirmed 108 App. Div. 360, 95 N. Y. S. 1122 (gas fixtures). In New York L. Ins. Co. v. Allison, 107 Fed. 179, 46 C. C. A. 229, it was said: "While the wiring of an electric lighting system would be a part of the realty, the chandeliers and their appurtenances not permanently affixed to the building would be chattels, and not realty. On the same principle the other contrivances constituting a part of the lighting apparatus, not specially adapted to the particular building, but susceptible of use elsewhere as well, and readily detachable, would not be fixtures. The fact that the electrolier was a chandelier of exceptionally large dimensions is immaterial. The electric signs were no more a part of the building than are ordinary signs when not affixed as permanencies. If the letters with which they were supplied had been merely capable of advertising the name of the particular theatre, a different conclusion would be reached." In McKeage v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 16 Hun 239, affirmed 81 N. Y. 38, 37 Am. Rep. 471, the court speaking of gas fixtures said: "The articles in question were not put in the house when it was built, and the house was not erected to receive them, but, on the contrary, they were put up in the house to be used there as chattels. There was no permanent attachment of the things to the freehold, and there was no difficulty in removing them from this house and putting them up in another. These are some of the tests recognized in the law by which to determine whether a chattel retains its character of personal property and as they are in favor of the latter position, we think the articles in question retained that character." In Capehart v. Foster, 61 Minn. 132, 63 N. W. 257, 52 Am. St. Rep. 582, it was said: "During all of said time these gas fixtures were screwed to the ends of the gas pipes projecting from the walls and ceilings, and can be readily unscrewed. It is held by the great weight of authority that, under such circumstances, such gas fixtures are not a part of the realty, even as between vendor and vendee or mortgagor and mortgagee; that they are merely a part of the furniture of the room,—a substitute for the lamps and lamp holders, candlesticks and chandeliers, formerly used to hold candles. . . . While this doctrine is rather doubtful in principle, it is too well established as the law of the country generally to be now overturned." And in Montague v. Dent, 10 Rich. L. (S. C.) 135, 67 Am. Dec. 572, the court said: "The elementary idea is, that the article claimed as part of the freehold must be in some way fixed, in the soil or part and parcel of that which is. . . . Now the articles embraced by this case seem to want this necessary condition to make them fixtures. The ease or difficulty with which an article may be detached may not be a satisfactory criterion, and it is not; but the effect of its detachment upon itself or some portion of what is the realty or part and parcel of it, is a matter that enters into the question. As to this consideration the defendant has the advantage in the present case, for admitting the gas pipe to be part of the realty purchased, the removal of the chandeliers and the pendant gas burner did not disorder that pipe, did not mutilate it as a conduit, did not diminish or waste any gas, nor were the articles detached less perfect. Then these chandeliers, etc., were not necessary to the enjoyment of the freehold, for the use of the gas itself does not deserve to rank in that category. It is much more matter of convenience than of necessity, or even serious importance. A fortiori, may this be said of the mere terminating joints, as it were, of the gas pipe; things including the exercise of taste and ornament, withdrawn and replaced at pleasure, substituted by others affording more or less light, as economy or the reverse, or convenience, may dictate."

In other jurisdictions gas and electric light accessories installed in a building have been held to pass by a mortgage of the premises. Johnson v. Wiseman, 4 Metc. 357, 83 Am. Dec. 475 (gas chandeliers); Cunningham v. Seaboard Realty Co. 67 N. J. Eq. 210, 58

Atl. 819 (gas logs and gas chandeliers): Security Trust Co. v. Temple Co. 67 N. J. Eq. 514, 58 Atl. 865; Canning v. Owen, 22 R. I. 624, 48 Atl. 1033, 84 Am. St. Rep. 858 (electric light fixtures). And see the reported case which distinguishes L'Hote v. Fulham, 51 La. Ann. 780, 25 So. 655. In Security Trust Co. v. Temple Co. supra, gas fixtures though merely screwed on the gas pipes were held to be a part of the realty since they were as firmly attached to the freehold as many other articles considered a part thereof, since the building could not be efficiently used for the purpose for which it was appropriated without the use of the articles so attached, and since there appeared an intention to make the annexation a permanent one. And in Canning v. Owen, 22 R. I. 624, 48 Atl. 1033, 84 Am. St. Rep. 858, the view was taken that it was of no consequence that the appliances could be removed without injury to the freehold since they should be governed by the general rule that whatever is physically annexed to the realty becomes a part thereof as between vendor and vendee or mortgagor and mortgagee. The court said: "Adopting the general rule, then, as we do, that, as between the vendor and vendee of real estate, whatever has been physically annexed or affixed thereto by the owner, under the conditions aforesaid, becomes part and parcel thereof and passes with the conveyance of the estate, it follows that the electric light fixtures in question, which take the place of and serve the same purpose as ordinary gas fixtures, passed to the defendant by the conveyance [on foreclosure sale] referred to, and hence that the ruling complained of was erroneous. We can see no reason whatever why such fixtures are not as much a part of the realty as radiators, water faucets, set-tubs, bath tubs and bowls, portable furnaces connected with hot-air pipes for heating the building, storm doors and storm windows, window blinds, whether inside or outside, firegrates, pumps, mantels, and such other things as are annexed to the freehold with a view to the improvement thereof. All of these things, though mere chattels before their annexation to the freehold, are no longer such after their annexation, any more than the other materials which go to make up the house, but then become part and parcel of the real estate. And the mere fact that they can be removed therefrom without physical injury to the freehold does not change their character as between the vendor and vendee of the realty."

Where a house is fitted with gas and electric fixtures of a uniform design according to a decorative scheme or where the fixtures have been attached with the evident intention that they shall adequately serve the uses of one particular building and no other, they become a part of the realty and pass with a mortgage thereof. Berliner v. Piqua Club Assoc. 32 Misc. 470, 86 N. Y. S. 791; Newman v. Montrose Realty Co. 92 Misc. 182, 155 N. Y. S. 253.

In Filley v. Christopher, 39 Wash. 22, 80 Pac. 834, 109 Am. St. Rep. 853, it was held that sets of gas light switches, gas piping and an electric switchboard annexed to a theatre passed with a mortgage thereof. The court said: "The true criterion of a fixture is the united application of these requisites: (1) Actual annexation to the realty, or something appurtenant thereto; (2) application to the use or purpose to which that part of the realty with which it is connected is appropriated; and (3) the intention of the party making the annexation to make a permanent accession to the freehold. Within this rule, we are of opinion that all, or nearly all, of the articles above referred to are fixtures, and a part of the realty."

AS BETWEEN GRANTOR AND GRANTEE.

It has been held that gas or electric accessories do not pass by a deed of the realty. Shaw v. Lenke, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 487 (gas brackets and chandeliers); Kirchman v. Lapp, 19 N. Y. S. 831 (gas chandeliers); McLean v. Palmer, 2 Kulp (Pa.) 349 (gas pendants); Taylor v. Lee (Tex.) 139 S. W. 908 (chandeliers). See also Vaughan v. Haldeman, 33 Pa. St. 522 (chandeliers and side brackets); Jarechi v. Philharmonic Soc. 79 Pa. St. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 78; Heysham v. Dettre, 89 Pa. St. 506 (gas fixtures). Compare Smyth v. Sturges, 108 N. Y. 495, 15 N. E. 544 (gas piping). In Shaw v. Lenke, supra, the court said: "The adjustment of the bracket or chandelier to the gas pipe is not such actual annexation to the freehold as is contemplated by law. The fixture itself, though employed for a useful purpose, and often highly ornamental, is not indispensable to the enjoyment of the realty. It forms no part of the soil by annexation, actual contact, or otherwise. It is not fastened to the wall, and it can be removed without injury either to the wall, freehold, or pipe to which it is attached. In addition to this, it may be said with propriety that it has become by usage and general concession, as much an article of furniture as a mirror or carpet, although not so universally owned. Without pursuing the subject further, however, and without reviewing the numerous cases on the subject of fixtures, and which relate in a great majority to improvements made for the purposes of trade or manufacture, it is sufficient to say that the articles claimed by the plaintiff are not fixtures, and part of the realty, within the rule established by any case decided in this state." In Jarechi v. Philharmonic Soc. 79 Pa. St. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 78, it was said: "The fixtures [gas] are put up in more or less expensive style, according to the taste and means of the persons who mean to occupy them, whether as tenants or owners. If the tenant puts them in, it is not denied that as between him and the landlord they are his, and he may remove them, or they may be sold as his personal property on an execution by the sheriff. No doubt the owner, if they belong to him, often sells them with the house. They add more to the value of the house than they would be worth if removed. But if there is no agreement to sell the house as it is—fixtures and all—the purchaser is not entitled to them."

Other cases take a contrary view and hold that gas and electric fixtures constitute a part of the realty and pass under a deed thereof. Fratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 126, 41 Am. Rep. 251 (gas fixtures in hotel); Atkinson v. Noad, 14 L. C. Rep. 159 (gas pipes); Stack v. T. Eaton Co. 4 Ont. L. Rep. 335, 1 Ont. W. Rep. 511 (gas and electric fittings). See also Dorey v. Gray, 42 Nova Scotia 259 (electric light fittings). In Fratt v. Whittier, supra, it appeared that an agreement had been made to convey a certain hotel with the appurtenances and improvements thereunto belonging "with a reservation of the right to remove furniture, carpets and pictures, but none of the permanent fixtures or appurtenances." It was held that the gas fixtures were essential to the purpose for which the building was occupied and that title thereto passed by the deed of conveyance in the absence of an express reservation negating that intention.

In Funk v. Brigaldi, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 359, it was held that certain chandeliers and brackets were a part of the realty where the owner as an inducement to make the sale represented that those appliances were to be instructed in the sale. In Central Trust, etc. Deposit Co. v. Cincinnati Grand Hotel Co. 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 348, 26 Cinc. L. Bul. 149, it was held that the title to chandeliers designed especially for a particular building and placed therein with the clear intention of having the same become part of the realty passed on the sale of the building. In Sewell v. Angerstein, 18 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 300, it was held that where on the sale of a lease it was covenanted that all fixtures were conveyed, the title to "gasliers" fastened to gas pipes by screws and removable without injury to the freehold passed under the lease. In L. & M. Mercantile Co. v. Wimer, 94 Kan. 573, 146 Pac. 1162, it was held that the trial court had properly charged that a "gas light system" was realty and passed under a deed if it was "permanently affixed to the building by nails, bolts or screws" with the intent that it "be permanently used in carrying out the purpose for which the building was designed."

AS BETWEEN LANDLORD AND TENANT.

It has been held that gas or electric accessories placed in a building by a tenant do not become a part of the structure, but are removable by the tenant. Raymond v. Strickland, 124 Ga. 504, 52 S. E. 619, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 369 (chandelier and annunciator); Wall v. Hinds, 4 Gray (Mass.) 256, 64 Am. Dec. 64 (gas pipes attached by brackets, in tavern); Guthrie v. Jones, 108 Mass. 191 (gas fixtures). See also Elliott v. Bishop, 10 Exch. (Eng.) 496 (grates and gas fittings). In Raymond v. Strickland, supra, the court said: "A further indulgence is allowed the tenant in removing such . . . domestic fixtures as may be annexed to the premises by the tenant for the more advantageous use thereof, provided no material injury results to the realty or to the substantial characteristics of the articles themselves. Domestic fixtures have been held to include ranges and stoves fixed in brick work, furnaces, gas fixtures, pumps, clocks, window blinds, bathtubs, and other chattels annexed for convenience. . . . With regard to domestic . . . fixtures, it is very generally held that they may be removed by the tenant, and are to be considered personalty even though annexed; and that any wrongful act or refusal on the part of the landlord with respect to the removal of the tenant's fixtures amounts to a conversion for which an action will lie. . . . In the case in hand, the annunciator and chandelier are easily classified as domestic fixtures; the evidence shows that both could be removed without injury to the ceiling or walls of the house. They were the personal chattels of the tenant, and she had the right of removal during her tenancy and possession." In Wall v. Hinds, 4 Gray (Mass.) 256, 64 Am. Dec. 64, it was said: "In order to determine, whether in any particular case chattels annexed to the freehold come within these classes, so that the tenant has the right to remove them, several considerations are to be regarded. One of the chief of these is the mode of their annexation to the building; that is, whether they are annexed to the fabric of the house, and the extent to which they are so united, and whether they can be taken down and removed . . . without substantial injury to the building or to themselves. Another important consideration is the intention with which they were annexed by the tenant, and the purposes which they were designed to answer; that is, whether they were intended for a permanent and substantial improvement to the realty, . . . or whether they were put up and used for a temporary object, or for the more convenient occupation and enjoyment of the premises for the particular purpose for which the tenant used them, so that they were useful and necessary rather to the comfortable and convenient occupation of the building than to the building itself. . . . The application of these rules and principles to the case at bar is decisive of the nature and character of the articles which were removed from the demised premises by the tenants. They were but slightly annexed to the building, and were removed without any substantial damage to the building, and without essential injury to themselves. The premises were intended for and demised as a tavern and boarding-house. The articles were themselves of a mixed nature, and may well be regarded as combining the qualities of both domestic and trade fixtures. They were designed by the tenants to be used in carrying on the business for which the premises were occupied, and they were also adopted for the more easy and comfortable use and enjoyment of the building. They were useful and convenient, rather than essential and permanent additions to the premises. At the time of the demise, the house was . . . furnished with light by other means. The pipes were not necessary therefore to the complete enjoyment of the premises. They were only added to subserve the domestic purposes to which they were applied, and to render the premises more suitable for the particular use to which they were appropriated." In Guthrie v. Jones, 108 Mass. 191, the court said: "They [gas fixtures] are in their nature articles of furniture, and the fact that they were fastened to the walls, for safety or convenience, does not deprive them of their character as personal chattels and make them a part of the realty. . . . The nature of the articles, the circumstances under which they were placed in the building, the mode of their connection, and the relation which they bear to the use of the freehold, are not such as to give them the character of fixtures or additions to the real estate."

Particularly, it has been held that gas or electric accessories are not a part of the realty, but rather movables, where they have been installed by the tenant for trade purposes. Lovett v. Birmingham-Seaman-Patrick Co. (Mich.) 158 N. W. 881 (gas lights in office and shipping room); Lawrence v. Kemp, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 363 (gas fixtures in store); Livingston v. Sulzer, 19 Hun (N. Y.) 375 (gas fittings in saloon); Webber v. Franklin Brewing Co. 123 App. Div. 465, 108 N. Y. S. 251, affirmed 198 N. Y. 509, 92 N. E. 1106 (window chandeliers with gas and electric fixtures in saloon); Excelsior Brew- ing Co. v. Smith, 125 App. Div. 668, 110 N. Y. S. 8, affirmed 198 N. Y. 519, 92 N. E. 1084 (combination gas and electric chandeliers in saloon); Argles v. McMath, 26 Ont. 224 (gas fixtures in store); Dunn v. Garrett, 7 N. Bruns. 218 (gas fittings in shop). And title to the chattels is not lost by a failure to remove them before the termination of the lease. Lawrence v. Kemp, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 363, wherein it was said: "Such articles [gas fixtures] when placed by a tenant in a demised building during his term are his property. If not removed by him during the term, they do not, for that reason, cease to be his property. He may remove them after his term expires without subjecting himself to any damages for such removal, even though he be liable to an action of trespass for an entry on the demised premises." Same.

Where a city having power to make a street improvement, but without power to have the cost assessed against the abutting property in excess of fifty per cent of the value thereof, contracted for street improvements, the cost of which exceeded fifty per cent of the value of the abutting property, and issued bonds for the cost of the work and pledged its credit for their payment, and the bond issue was taken over by the contractor, who completed the work, the obligation incurred by the city is an indebtedness within Const. § 157, limiting municipal indebtedness; and, where the debt created exceeds the debt limit, any holder of the bonds cannot recover from the city thereon.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton county, Common Law and Equity Division.

Action by German National Bank of Covington, plaintiff, against City of Covington, defendant. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

Frederick W. Schmitz for appellee.

[293] SETTLE, J.—Cities of the fourth class are authorized to improve streets at the cost of the abutting property, and to issue street improvement bonds (Sections 3572-7, Kentucky Statutes), but have no authority to assess the abutting property in excess of one-half the value thereof after the improvements are made (Section 3578, Kentucky Statutes). Cities of the second class are also authorized to improve streets on the ten-year bond plan, and to issue the bonds of the city, secured by liens on the abutting property, and also to pledge the faith and credit of the city for the payment of the bonds. Section 101, Kentucky Statutes.

Prior to July 29, 1909, Latonia was a city of the fourth class. During the period immediately preceding that date, it ordered the improvement of a number of its streets on what is known as the ten-year bond plan. On the above date, the City of Latonia was annexed to the City of Covington, a city of the second class. Some of the streets under course of construction at the time of the annexation were subsequently completed and the cost provided for by the City of Covington. Among the streets so improved is Randall Avenue. The cost of the improvement was $2,962.48, which sum was assessed on eight lots of the Green subdivision. After the street was so improved, it developed that these lots were worth only $2,338.94, and could be put in lien for only one-half that amount, or $1,169.47. The cost of the improvement, therefore, exceeded fifty per cent of the value of the property to the extent of $1,793.01. The City of Covington issued bonds for the cost of the work, and pledged for the payment thereof not only the special fund accruing from the collection of the ac-assessment of the abutting property, but also the faith and credit of the city. The issue of bonds was taken over by the contractor, and subsequently a number of these bonds were sold to various parties, including the German National Bank.

This action was brought by the German National Bank to recover on three of these bonds. A personal judgment was sought against the city. The city defended on the ground that no vote of the people authorizing the indebtedness was ever had, and that the indebtedness exceeded the revenue and income for the year for which it was incurred, and was therefore void [294] under Section 157 of the Constitution. On final hearing the trial judge gave judgment for plaintiff for the amount collected, and to be collected, from assessments on the abutting property, but declined to give any personal judgment against the city for that portion of the bonds not secured by liens on the abutting property. From that judgment the bank appeals.

Section 157 of the Constitution provides in part as follows:

"No county, city, town, taxing district, or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to become indebted, in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding, in any year, the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the voters thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose; any indebtedness contracted in violation of this section shall be void. Nor shall such contract be enforceable by the person with whom made; nor shall such municipality ever be authorized to assume the same."

It is admitted in this case that the indebtedness was not authorized by a vote of the people and that it exceeds the revenue and income provided, or that it could be provided, for the year in which it was incurred.

We have frequently held that contracts for local improvements, the cost of which is to be borne wholly by the property benefited, form no part of the indebtedness of the municipality within the meaning of Section 157 of the Constitution. The reason for the rule is that the contractor or holder of the bond must look alone to the fund created by the collection of the assessments on the abutting property and the city is a mere agency for collecting the assessments and custodian of the fund when the assessments are collected. Catlettsburg v. Self, 115 Ky. 689, 74 S. W. 1064, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 163; Adams v. Ashland, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 184, 80 S. W. 1105; Guilfoyle v. Maysville, 129 Ky. 532, 125 S. W. 666; Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 23 N. E. 788, 7 L.R.A. 681. On the other hand, the fact that local improvement bonds are to be paid out of assessments which are made a lien upon the property benefited does not render them legal on the theory that they do not create an indebtedness against the city where the bonds provide for the pledging of the faith of the city for the payment of the principal and interest thereon. Covington v. McKenna, 99 Ky. 508, 36 S. W. 518; Covington v. Nadaud, 103 Ky. [295] 445, 45 S. W. 498, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 151; Gedge v. Covington, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 273, 80 S. W. 1160. Here the improvement bonds are not payable wholly out of a special fund derived from the assessment on the property benefited. The faith and credit of the city are pledged for their payment. They are, therefore, a personal obligation of the city, and since they represent an indebtedness in excess of the revenue and income for the year in which the indebtedness was incurred without a vote of the people, they come within the inhibition of the Constitution and are null and void.

The above propositions are conceded, but counsel for the bank insist that the city is liable for the deficiency on an entirely different theory. Briefly stated, their position is this: Where the city has the power to make the improvement, but none to charge it upon the abutting property, the city itself becomes liable. Louisville v. Bitzer, 115 Ky. 359, 61 L.R.A. 434, 73 S. W. 1115; Caldwell v. Rupert, 10 Bush (Ky.) 179; Louisville v. Nevin, 10 Bush. (Ky.) 549, 19 Am. Rep. 78; Craycraft v. Selva, 10 Bush (Ky.) 696. The constitutional provision applies only to a contractual indebtedness. O'Bryan v. Owensboro, 113 Ky. 680, 68 S. W. 858, 69 S. W. 800; Overall v. Madisonville, 125 Ky. 684, 102 S. W. 278, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 433; Fowler v. Oakdale, 158 Ky. 603, 166 S. W. 195. It does not apply to an obligation imposed by law. 28 Cyc. 1541. Here the city had the power to make the improvement but no power to assess the cost thereof against the abutting property in excess of 50% of its value. That being true, the case falls within the rule laid down in the above cases. The law itself imposes upon the city the obligation to pay, and that being true, the debt limit provision of the Constitution does not apply. There are authorities which tend to support this position. Thus in the case of Addyston Pipe, etc. Co. v. Corry, 197 Pa. St. 41, 46 Atl. 1035, 80 Am. St. Rep. 812, the city entered into a contract for the construction of a sewer for the price of $57,000.00. Of this sum $9,300.00 was to be paid out of the general sewer fund and the remainder to be assessed upon the property benefited. The city paid its part of the cost; the remainder was assessed on the property benefited, including abutting and non-abutting property. All of the assessments on the abutting property were paid; the assessments on the non-abutting property were held invalid. The city was held liable for the deficit, although [296] the indebtedness exceeded the constitutional limit. The court said:

"In the present case the City of Corry provided the contract price of the sewer by an appropriation of money which, as already said, we must assume to have been in the treasury, and by assessments upon the property benefited. There is nothing to indicate that these assessments were not in good faith and reasonable expectation supposed to be adequate to produce the required fund and offered and accepted by the contracting parties in the mutual belief in their validity. So far as they were upon abutting property they fulfilled their intended purpose. The distinction in regard to non-abutting property had not then been made, and was not in contemplation of either side. When it was determined that this part of the agreed means of payment would be unavailable, the loss should in equity and justice fall on the city which has received the full consideration stipulated for, and to this extent paid nothing.

"The cases on this subject are conflicting. See Dillon on Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) Secs. 480-482 and notes. They show that there is no disposition of the question which is wholly free from difficulty. We have preferred to follow the line which we think not inferior in just legal reasoning, while clearly superior in the honesty and justice of the result reached."

Following the rule above laid down, the same court held in the case of Gable v. Altoona, 200 Pa. St. 15, 49 Atl. 367, that where a city in good faith provides that bonds for street paving shall be payable out of assessments on property, and it turns out that such assessments are illegal because of the improper manner in which the ordinances authorizing them were enacted, the city is liable for the bonds although at the time of their issue they increased the debt beyond the constitutional limitation.

In the case of Ft. Dodge Electric Light, etc. Co. v. Ft. Dodge, 115 Ia. 568, 89 N. W. 7, the court held that where a municipal contract for street improvements provided that the contractor should receive the special assessment certificates in payment, the city's liability for damages resulting from an erroneous assessment upon property not liable is not an incurring of indebtedness, so as to fall within the prohibition of Constitution, Article 11, Section 3, prohibiting municipal corporations from becoming indebted to an amount in excess of 5 per cent of the value of its taxable property, since the constitutional [297] provision did not apply to a liability arising from a wrongful act. The ground on which the decision is rested is shown by the following quotation from the opinion:

"It was not by any voluntary act of the contractor that the city became indebted to him, and it was not contemplated by the contract that in this respect the city should become his debtor; but, by its own negligence in failing to perform a duty which it had lawfully assumed, a claim against the city in favor of the holder of these certificates has arisen. It does not matter whether this breach of duty was a tort, in the technical sense of the term, or not. The constitutional limitation does not make any such distinction. Nor do we think that it is conclusive to say that the obligation is one arising by implied contract. No doubt, some obligations arising by implied contract are within the prohibition of the constitutional clause. If the city should direct the improvement to be made without any express contract therefor, and without any arrangement for payment by assessment on abutting property, the obligation to make payment of the reasonable cost to one who should perform the work would be an obligation by implied contract; but it would be an obligation voluntarily assumed, as between the city and the contractor, and would create an indebtedness, within the terms of the constitutional provision. The liability of the city here is one growing out of negligent omission to do that which the city had the right to do, and which, if done, would not have involved any creation of indebtedness, and therefore we think the constitutional limitation does not apply."

In the case of Little v. Portland, 26 Ore. 235, 37 Pac. 911, it was held that a stipulation in a contract with a city for a public improvement that the contractor should look for payment to a particular fund to be raised by assessment, did not relieve the city from liability for negligently delaying to raise such fund, and that the city was liable even though its limit of indebtedness had been reached.

Without approving the doctrine laid down in the above cases, it seems to us that they are clearly distinguishable from the case under consideration. Indeed it is plainly pointed out in the Iowa case that the city did not become indebted to the contractor by any voluntary act on the part of either. The liability of the city was based solely on its negligence in failing to perform [298] the duty which it had lawfully assumed. Here the indebtedness was created by the voluntary action of both debtor and creditor. The city agreed to issue its bonds and did issue them. The contractor agreed to accept the bonds and did accept them. The obligation thus imposed by the voluntary act of both parties exceeded the constitutional debt limit and was, therefore, void. Here the contractor looked to the bonds for payment. The bank took the place of the contractor; relying on the faith and credit of the city it made the purchase. The suit itself is to recover on the bonds. Whatever liability the city incurred was merged in the bonds. In our opinion, it would be a mere jugglery of words to say that the bonds are invalid because they exceed the debt limit and yet allow a recovery based on the fact that the city did not have the power to assess the abutting property in excess of 50% of its value. We often find courts saying that a certain decision, which has the effect of annulling debt limit provisions, is in the interest of honesty and justice. In laying down a just rule in such cases, however, two parties are to be considered: the contractor, on the one hand, and the taxpayers on the other. In order to apply justice in a particular case we should not announce a rule of law that will lead to great injustice in the future. That this would be the effect if the contention of the bank were sustained cannot be doubted. In every case municipalities could make public improvements without the power of assessing the cost thereof against the abutting property and thus clearly violate the provisions of the Constitution by imposing unlimited burdens on the people. It is true that the rule herein announced may lead to occasional hardship. If so, it is largely of the contractor's own making, for there is no proposition better settled than that one dealing with a municipality must take notice of its debt limit provision. We, therefore, conclude that in the long run the safer plan is to give effect to the constitutional provision and not permit it to be evaded by any refined distinction which has no substantial basis.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Right of Municipality to Contract for Local Improvement with Special Assessment against Persons Benefited Where Cost Exceeds Authorized Debt Limit.

General Rule.

Contracts by a municipality for local improvements, the cost of which is to be borne by the property benefited, form no part of the indebtedness of the municipality within a constitutional limitation thereof. Therefore the municipality has a right to contract for the improvements although their cost added to existing indebtedness exceeds the debt limit.

In Little v. Portland, 26 Ore. 235, 37 Pac. 911, it was said: "It is now well settled, however, that even though the limit of municipal indebtedness may have been reached, an appropriation of anticipated income does not create an indebtedness, and that a contract which provides that the cost of any improvement shall be paid out of a fund expressly created therefore is valid, notwithstanding the provision of the charter as to the limit of the city's indebtedness: Salem Water Co. v. Salem, 5 Ore. 29; Kopikus v. State Capital Com'rs, 16 Cal. 248; People v. Pacheco, 27 Cal. 175; East St. Louis v. Flannigan, 26 Ill. App. 449; State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429; People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11; Grant v. Davenport, 36 Ia. 396; People v. May, 9 Colo. 404, 12 Pac. 838; Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626; Fuller v. Heath, 89 Ill. 296. The reason assigned by these decisions for the application of the foregoing rule is that materials furnished to and labor performed for a municipal corporation are exchanged for warrants, to be drawn upon the treasury and made payable out of a specific fund which has been created by an assessment or levy of taxes and appropriated to that purpose, under an agreement that the person furnishing the materials or performing the labor will rely upon the specific fund only for payment, and that the corporation shall incur no liability whatever. The contract in the case at bar contained a stipulation that the contractors should look for payment only to the fund to be raised by an assessment of the property benefited, and that they would not require the city by any legal process or otherwise to pay for the same out of any other fund; and when the improvement under the contract was completed warrants were drawn upon the treasury in favor of the contractors and made payable out of said fund.

As the contract provided that the cost of the improvement should be paid out of the special fund, the city incurred no indebtedness until it failed to collect the fund within a reasonable time, and hence its authority to enter into the contract was not affected by the charter prohibition." And in Monk v. Moultrie, 145 Ga. 843, 90 S. E. 71, the court, in holding that the issuance of notes by a city representing a portion of the balance due by abutting property owners for street improvement was not the creation of a debt within a constitutional limitation, said: "As to the first contention, under the facts as stated above, the giving of the note by the city was not a creation of a debt falling within the constitutional prohibition relied on by the plaintiff. The city, Ann. Cas. 1917B.—13.

at the time of executing contract for the improvements of its streets, designated by ordinances of April 7th and 21st, had in its treasury cash, derived from the sale of bonds legally issued for the improvement of its streets, largely in excess of the amount required for the payment of its proportionate share of the cost of such improvements contracted for. And when the city, after expending the whole amount of such cash on hand for work on the street as it progressed which included the one-third of the cost of paving for which the city was liable and all of the cost of curbing and two-thirds of the cost of paving for which the abutting property owners were liable, gave its note for the balance due for all work done, with the expectation and the right to collect by execution the assessments due by the abutting owners, and with the special fund derived from the proceeds of the collection of such assessments, to pay off such note—the giving of the note in these circumstances, was clearly not the creation of a debt against the city and illegal and unconstitutional because violative of article 7, § 7, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6563). . . . The act of 1913 (acts 1913, p. 1062), empowering the city of Moultrie to improve its streets, limits the liability of the city for such improvements to one-third of the cost of paving, and the giving by the city of the note to the construction company, representing a portion of the balance due by the abutting property owners to the construction company did not make the note such an indebtedness of the city as to be violative of the provision of the constitution referred to."

In Addyston Pipe, etc. Co. v. Corry, 197 Pa. St. 141, 46 Atl. 1035, 80 Am. St. Rep. 812, it was held that where a municipality entered into a contract for local improvements to be paid out of special assessments on the property benefited, they being made in good faith, the fact that some of the assessments were afterwards held to be invalid did not affect the validity of the contract. And in Beaumont v. Masterson (Tex.) 142 S. W. 984, it was held that a contract by a municipality for local improvements part of which was to be paid by special assessments against the persons benefited was not invalid as exceeding the debt limit by reason of the municipality failing to foresee that part of the assessments could not be collected.

In Kenny v. Minneapolis, 63 Minn. 125, 65 N. W. 115, 30 L.R.A. 281, it was held that park board certificates issued by a city which were payable out of special assessments against the persons benefited were not a debt of the city within the meaning of a constitutional provision limiting its amount of indebtedness. To the same effect see Kansas City v. Ward, 134 Mo. 172, 35 S. W. 600.

The rule that contracts for local improvements to be paid for by special assessments against the persons benefited may exceed the debt limit applies to contracts by counties or townships. Braun v. Benton County, 70 Fed. 369, 17 C. C. A. 166, 34 U. S. App. 393; Strieb v. Cox, 111 Ind. 299, 12 N. E. 481; Burton v. State, 111 Ind. 600, 12 N. E. 486; Monroe County v. Harrell, 147 Ind. 500, 46 N. E. 124; Switzerland County v. Reeves, 148 Ind. 467, 46 N. E. 995; Smith v. Hamilton County, 173 Ind. 364, 90 N. E. 881, reversing 89 N. E. 867; Moore v. Bible, 173 Ind. 413, 90 N. E. 892; Hutton v. Boze, 173 Ind. 719, 90 N. E. 893. See also Johnson v. Norman County, 93 Minn. 290, 101 N. W. 180. Thus in Strieb v. Cox, supra, there was involved a statute which authorized the construction of roads and the issuance of bonds by counties to raise the money required and provided for the payment of the bonds by taxing lands adjacent to the roads constructed. The court, in holding that bonds so issued by a county were not indebtedness of the county within a constitutional limitation, said: "We are of opinion that the bonds issued by the board of commissioners of Grant county, under the provisions of the section quoted and pursuant to the authority thereby conferred, did not and do not constitute an indebtedness of such county, and did not and do not evidence an indebtedness incurred by such county, within the inhibition of article 13 of our state constitution. Such bonds are not payable by the county, or out of the general funds of the county treasury. They are payable out of the particular fund to be raised by the collection of the assessments made on the lands adjacent to such free gravel road, 'divided in such manner as to meet the payment of principal and interest of said bonds,' and placed as divided upon the tax duplicates against the lands assessed, 'and collected in the same manner as other taxes,' which fund, when so collected, 'shall be applied to no other purpose than the payment of said bonds and interest.' No other provision is made by law for the payment of either the bonds or the interest thereon; and the bonds and interest are made payable out of the particular fund to be derived from the collection of the assessments made on the lands adjacent to such free gravel road, and from no other source, and such fund is pledged by the statute for the payment of said bonds and interest. It is manifest, we think, from all the provisions of the above entitled Act of March 3d, 1877, and the amendments thereof, that the legislature intended that the entire cost and expense of constructing any free gravel, macadamized or paved road, and all bonds of the county issued for the purpose of raising the money necessary to meet the expense of such improvement, should be borne and paid out of the particular fund to be raised by and from the collection of the assessments made on the lands adjacent to such road. While it is provided that the preliminary expenses of such an improvement may be paid out of the county treasury, yet it is further provided that the amount so paid must be refunded out of the particular fund to be raised as aforesaid from the assessments on adjacent lands."

Limitation of Rule.

Where the credit of a municipality is pledged to pay for the cost of a local improvement which exceeds the authorized debt limit, the contract is invalid although it also provides for payment out of special assessments on the property benefited. Burlington Sav. Bank v. Clinton, 111 Fed. 439; French v. Burlington, 42 Ia. 614; Allen v. Davenport, 107 Ia. 90, 77 N. W. 532; Covington v. McKenna, 99 Ky. 508, 36 S. W. 518; Atkinson v. Great Falls, 16 Mont. 372, 40 Pac. 877; Austin v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 667, 27 Pac. 557; Soule v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 315, 33 Pac. 384, 1080; Fowler v. Superior, 85 Wis. 411, 54 N. W. 800. And see the reported case. See also Levy v. McClellan, 196 N. Y. 178, 89 N. E. 569. Thus in Austin v. Seattle, supra, the court, in denying the right of a city to issue local improvement bonds on the ground that the authorized debt limit of the city was already exceeded, said: "The city of Seattle has already passed the limit of one and one-half per cent of her indebtedness based upon the assessment roll of August 30, 1890, and no vote has been taken authorizing the increase of her indebtedness. The city council, by ordinance No. 1696, has provided for the issuance of Broadway improvement bonds in the sum of $17,812.50; and the appellants contend that the city has no power, without a vote of authorization, to issue such bonds, for the reason that when issued they will constitute evidences of primary indebtedness of the city. The ordinance (§ 5) provides: 'The principal and interest of such bonds shall be paid by the city from the proceeds of such local assessments, but the city shall be liable for the payment of both principal and interest if it fails or neglects to collect said assessments, or fails or neglects to collect sufficient to pay the principal or interest on said bonds when they fall due.' For the city, it is claimed that the bonds when issued would not constitute primary indebtedness of the corporation, for the reason that they are payable out of the fund to be created under the terms of the charter, and that the ordinance makes the city liable only in case of its failure or neglect to collect the assessment, or to collect sufficient to pay the principal and interest of the bonds when they fall due. The appellant must succeed in his contention because the ordinance does not comply with the charter. The last clause of § 9 is, 'and the city shall be liable for the payment of both principal and interest;' and the council has no power to issue a bond which does not provide for a liability equal in degree with that provided by the charter." In Allen v. Davenport, 107 Ia. 90, 77 N. W. 532, it appeared that a city entered into a contract for street improvements obligating itself to pay the contractor a fixed and definite price, it having already exhausted its constitutional power to create indebtedness. Payments were made from time to time as provided for in the contract until the contractor was paid the greater part of the sum due him. The bonds which were issued to raise funds to defray the most of the improvements, were on their face an absolute promise to pay, but they were subject to the condition that they were payable only out of the fund created by the collection of the special tax for the improvements on the abutting property. It was held that the contract was void and that consequently the bonds were also invalid. So in Fowler v. Superior, 85 Wis. 411, 54 N. W. 800, it appeared that a municipality proposed to issue improvement bonds whereby it acknowledged itself to be indebted to and promised to pay the bearer. The bonds also provided that the "principal sum and interest shall be payable out of the proceeds of the improvement assessments hereinafter mentioned, and this bond and accompanying coupons are issued upon the faith and security of said assessments." The municipality was already indebted to the extent of its authorized limit. It was held that the issuance of the bonds would be enjoined.

Where a municipality contracts for local improvements the cost of which is to be borne partly by it and partly by special assessments against the persons benefited, and the share of the cost of which the municipality is liable exceeds its authorized debt limit, its liability on the contract cannot be enforced. People v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 253 Ill. 191, 97 N. E. 310; Cason v. Lebanon, 153 Ind. 567, 55 N. E. 768. See also Vallelly v. Park Com'rs, 16 N. D. 25, 111 N. W. 615, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 61. But a contract will not be held to be invalid on the ground that the share of the cost for which the city is liable exceeds its authorized debt limit where it does not appear that the city is unable to pay its share out of its current revenue as well as its ordinary current expenses. Jacksonville R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 114 Ill. 562,

HANFORD

v.

CITY OF SEATTLE.

Washington Supreme Court—July 19, 1916

92 Wash. 257; 158 Pac. 987.

Dedication — Park or Square — Sale of Lots with Reference to Plat.

A sale of lots, according to a plat and the execution of deeds therefor by the owner of the plat, constitutes a ratification of such plat as filed.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where plat and deed of dedication contain no evidence of intent of platlor to donate a block known as "East Park," for public purposes or for any specific use, and where no public use was made of land, and taxes and special assessments were collected, and the land was transferred by deed as private property, it is held, under Code 1881, §§ 2332, 2339, there was nothing more than an ambiguous dedication of such tract which had been revoked, so that city could not claim land as public park (citing Words and Phrases).

[See note at end of this case.]

Revocation of Dedication.

A dedication by plat of lands for public purposes may be revoked before acceptance by conveying the land as private property.

[See Ann. Cas. 1917A 1109.]

Acceptance of Dedication — Levy of Tax as Refusal to Accept.

Where there has been no acceptance, formal or otherwise, by the city or by the public, of land dedicated for public use, the levy and collection of taxes and special assessments shows an intention not to accept the dedication.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county:
RONALD, Judge.

Action by Frank W. R. Hanford, plaintiff, against City of Seattle, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Hugh M. Caldwell, James E. Bradford, Howard A. Hanson and Geo. A. Meagher for appellant.

C. H. Hanford and P. V. Davis for respondent.

[257] HOLCOMB, J.—Respondent brought action and had judgment to quiet title in him to a certain block of land known as “East Park,” or block 32, Hanford’s addition to South Seattle. The city claims this land as a public park. It is a part of the same plat of land involved in the case of [258] Meacham v. Seattle, 45 Wash. 380, 88 Pac. 628, but the status of this particular tract as a public ground was not there involved or considered. The contention of appellant, briefly stated, is that a parcel of ground included within a plat of lots and blocks, streets and alleys, dedicating the streets and alleys and “other public grounds” to the public, which plat designates the tract involved as “East Park,” ex vi termini dedicates the tract to the public as a park or “public ground.”

This plat was acknowledged by Edward Hanford on June 9, 1869, and filed for record in the King county records of deeds on June 18, 1869, and afterwards re-recorded in the plat book of towns, “Per Order of County Comrs.,” on March 16, 1875. The patent to the land from the United States was not issued until August 27, 1871. On July 1, 1878, Edward Hanford and his wife executed a “Deed of Dedication” to the platted lands, to particularly identify the land with reference to the legal government description and further describe the plat and dedication. Between the dates of the filing of the original plat and the later deed of dedication, the platters sold lots with reference to the plat and joined in deeds therefor, which acts constituted ratification of the plat as filed. Meacham v. Seattle, supra.

In 1881, Edward Hanford and wife conveyed all they then had remaining of the platted land “excepting the block in the platted land marked East Park, or Block 22,” which they expressly reserved. In 1882 they conveyed this block 32, or East Park, to Aaron A. Wait. In 1884 Wait conveyed the block to his daughter Anna E. Wait. She intermarried with Frank Hanford in 1886, and died intestate in 1894, leaving as her heir the respondent, who from her inherited the block.

Seattle was incorporated in 1869, and Hanford’s addition to South Seattle was then within its corporate limits and so continued until 1875, when the limits of Seattle were reduced to such an extent as to exclude the Hanford addition to [259] South Seattle, and so remained until 1883 when the corporate limits were again extended so as to include it. It has remained within the limits of Seattle to this time.

No taxes were levied against the platted tract known as East Park prior to 1882. Taxes were levied against it and paid by the original owners, or the Waits, or descendant, to and including 1905. A certificate for 1906 and subsequent taxes to and including taxes for 1913 was sold and issued to another. Appellant in its governmental capacity has twice assessed block 32, or East Park, for local public improvements, as late as 1913.

The town plat law in force at the time of the dedication of the plat of this land is found in the Code of 1881, §§ 2332 and 2329. The first section contains the following:

“All streets, lanes and alleys, laid off and recorded in accordance with the foregoing provisions, shall be considered, to all intents and purposes, public highways, . . .”

The second section is as follows:

“Every donation or grant to the public, or to any individual or individuals, religious society or societies, or to any corporation or body politic, marked or noted as such on the plat of the town, or wherein such donation or grant may have been made, shall be considered, to all intents and purposes, as a quitclaim deed to the said donee or donees, grantee or grantees, for his, her or their use, for the purposes intended by the donor or donors, grantor or grantors, as aforesaid.”

By these provisions of the law then in force, it will be noted that the first provision constituted a legislative acceptance of all streets, lanes, and alleys laid off in accordance with the law providing for the platting and subdivision of land. But as to the second section, it will be observed that, if any grounds other than those designated as streets, lanes, or alleys are intended to be donated or granted to the public or to any other person or concern, it was necessary to mark or note on the plat that such grounds were donated or granted and for what use or purposes intended by the donor or [260] grantor. Three things were essential: (1) An affirmative act of donation or grant by the donor or grantor noted as such on the plat or expressed in some other instrument; (2) the donee or grantee must be named or specifically indicated; (3) the specific use to which the donated or granted property is to be devoted according to the intention of the donor or grantor must be expressed or provable in some way. There was not in this plat, or in the subsequent dedication by deed, any affirmative words or expressions indicating an intent on the part of the platters, who were the grantors of the public grounds, streets, or alleys, to donate East Park or block 32 to the public or to any individual or body politic, for public purposes or any specific use. Authorities are cited by appellant to the effect that dedication is shown by spaces on plats designated by the words "Park," "Public Square," "Public Ground," "Common," "County Block," "College Square," "Plaza," "Place," etc. Rhodes v. Brightwood, 145 Ind. 21, 43 N. E. 942; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L.R.A. 145; Steel v. Portland, 23 Ore. 176, 31 Pac. 479; Bayonne v. Ford, 43 N. J. L. 292; Ehmen v. Gothenburg, 60 Neb. 715, 70 N. W. 237; Fereday v. Mankedick, 172 Pa. St. 535, 34 Atl. 46; Thaxter v. Turner, 17 R. I. 799, 24 Atl. 829; 6 Words & Phrases, 5177.

In the text of the authority last cited, it is said:

"The word 'park,' written on a block on a map of city property, indicates a public use, and conveyances made by the owner of the platted land by reference to such map operates conclusively as a dedication of the block."

The situation here, however, is distinguished from that in most of the cases above cited by the positive terms of the statutes which we have quoted. We have here, in addition to that situation, the fact that, prior to any use indicating an acceptance by the public or the city acting for the public, whatever indicia of dedication to the public there had been by the plattors and dedicators of this land had been revoked by subsequent reservation of this particular block by their [261] deed more than thirty-seven years ago. After having reserved this particular block by expressions in a deed, they transferred the land and it was again transferred.

If the dedication was ever a donation in intention, it was a revocable donation prior to acceptance or use by the donee. Revocation may be effected in such case by conveying the land as private property. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 78. Since 1882, the county, which has at all times been a taxing power within the state, has levied and collected taxes upon this block. Tax receipts, showing that the city has collected taxes upon this block since its coming into the city limits in 1882, are in evidence. The city has levied two special assessments upon this property within the last three or four years for public improvements and caused it to be placed upon the assessment rolls therefor. It is contended by appellant that the city could do this without being understood as waiving any of its rights, for the reason that it can assess itself upon its parks for local improvements, and that it customarily does so, in order to assist the property owners in paying for public improvements. The answer to that is that the city did not assess itself, but assessed this particular property as if the property of another, and so placed it upon the assessment roll. Where there has been no acceptance by the city or the public, either formal or otherwise, the levy and collection of taxes and special assessments shows an intention not to accept the dedication. Spokane v. Security Sav. Soc. 82 Wash. 91, 143 Pac. 435.

Appellant also relies upon Thonney v. Rice, 43 Wash. 708, 86 Pac. 713, which we do not consider an authority, because in that case it was held that there was timely acceptance of the dedication. We consider this case more analogous to that of Spokane v. Security Sav. Soc. supra. As was observed by the lower court, "the city has never done a single act to evidence its understanding that the property was a donation to the public."

[262] We conclude that there was in this case at best nothing but an ambiguous grant to the public by deed or other written conveyance. There was never any acquiescence in the use of it by the public. There was no user or improvement or adverse possession of the block by the public. There has never been any expressed acceptance of the supposed dedication of the block for public purposes. The property has not been separated from the mass of other taxable property. The city never, during the forty-five years elapsing after the platting of the land showing "East Park," exercised any proprietorship over it. The doubtful and incomplete dedication has been revoked by subsequent effective action on the part of the dedicators. It was not, prior thereto, confirmed and made certain by acceptance and use by the public or the city. The incomplete dedication, if any, was rejected by the inclusion of the block in the mass of taxable property, and the city is estopped to assert it as a part of the public property of Seattle by its act in assessing the same as private property.

The judgment of the trial court is right and is Affirmed.

NOTE.

Dedication of Park or Square by Selling Lots According to Map or Plat.

General Rule, 197.

Reason of Rule, 198.

Illustrations of Rule, 199.

General Rule.

The rule laid down in Cole v. Minnesota Loan, etc. Co. 17 Ann. Cas. 304, that where an owner plats his land, and lays off lots according to the plat, and sells one or more of the lots with reference thereto, he thereby irrevocably dedicates to the public for the public use the land designated in the plat or map as a park, square, common, or other public place, is supported by the recent decisions on that subject. Davenport v. Buffington, 97 Fed. 237, 38 C. C. A. 453, 46 L.R.A. 377; Davidow v. Griswold, 23 Cal. App. 189, 137 Pac. 619; McIntyre v. El Paso County, 15 Colo. App. 78, 61 Pac. 237; Macon v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239; East Atlanta Land Co. v. Mower, 138 Ga. 380, 75 S. E. 418; Campbell County Ct. v. Newport, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 538; Vinton v. Lyons, 131 La. 673, 60 So. 54; Northport Wesleyan Grove Camp-meeting Assoc. v. Andrews, 104 Me. 342, 71 Atl. 1027, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 976; Conkling v. Mackinaw City, 120 Mich. 67, 79 N. W. 6; Shearer v. Reno, 36 Nev. 443, 136 Pac. 705; White v. Moore, 139 App. Div. 269, 123 N. Y. S. 1012; White v. Moore, 161 App. Div. 400, 146 N. Y. S. 593, affirming 73 Misc. 96, 132 N. Y. S. 441; Ramstad v. Carr, 31 N. D. 504, 154 N. W. 195, L.R.A.1916B 1160; Steel v. Portland, 23 Ore. 176, 31 Pac. 479; Com. v. Rush, 14 Pa. St. 186; Tullahoma v. Gill, 1 Tenn. Cas. 326; Clement v. Paris (Tex.) 154 S. W. 624; Re Lorne Park, 33 Ont. L. Rep. 51, 7 Ont. W. N. 558, affirming 30 Ont. L. Rep. 289, 5 Ont. W. N. 626. See also Jefferson County v. Oskaloosa, 80 Kan. 587, 102 Pac. 1095; New Orleans v. Carrollton Land Co. 131 La. 1092, 60 So. 695; Bartlett v. Harmon, 107 Me. 451, 78 Atl. 842; Green v. Miller, 161 N. C. 24, 76 S. E. 505, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 231; Sexton v. Elizabeth City, 169 N. C. 385, 86 S. E. 344; Com. v. Alburger, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 469. And this rule applies where there has been a lease instead of a sale of the lots. Cushwa v. Williamsport, 117 Md. 306, 83 Atl. 389. Likewise a nation, state, or municipality which dedicates land which it owns in the site of a town to public use for the purpose of a park, is as conclusively estopped as a private proprietor from revoking the dedication, from selling the park, and from appropriating the land which it occupies to other purposes after lots have been sold. Davenport v. Buffington, 97 Fed. 234, 38 C. C. A. 453, 46 L.R.A. 377; Com. v. Beaver, 171 Pa. St. 542, 33 Atl. 112. So, in Davenport v. Buffington, supra, the court said: "We are unwilling to concede that a nation or a state which becomes the proprietor of a town site, plats it, and dedicates its streets and parks to public use, has any greater or better right to revoke or avoid its grant or covenant than a private proprietor would have. It may be that either, before any rights have accrued, can revoke the dedication, but, after lots have been sold, after streets have been graded, after parks have been cared for and improved according to the plat—in other words, after rights have vested in reliance upon the dedication—we deny the right of nation or of individual to revoke it, or to release or destroy the right of the public to the exclusive use of the parks and streets for the purposes for which they were granted."

It has been held that where the dedication is made by the statutory method of filing a plat, and the sale of lots by the owner with reference thereto, it can be withdrawn only by a vacation of the plat under the statute. Ramstad v. Carr, 31 N. D. 455, 154 N. W. 195, L.R.A.1916B 1160.

In the reported case it is held that while the foregoing general rule might have, under other circumstances, been applicable to the facts therein, it did not apply for the reason that the plat failed to comply with the three essentials of the statute (Code 1881, §§ 2332, 2329) viz.: (1) An affirmative act of donation or grant by the donor or grantor noted as such on the plat or expressed in some other instrument; (2) the donee or grantee must be named or specifically indicated; (3) the specific use to which the donated or granted property is to be devoted according to the intention of the donor or grantor must be expressed or provable in some way; and the further fact that, prior to any use indicating an acceptance by the public or the city acting for the public, whatever indicia of dedication to the public there had been by the platters and dedicators of the land had been revoked by a subsequent reservation of the particular block and by later conveyances of it as private property.

Reason of Rule.

The reason for the rule was aptly stated in Green v. Miller, 161 N. C. 24, 76 S. E. 505, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 231, and, though there used with respect to the dedication of streets, is equally applicable to the cases of parks, squares, etc. The court said: "The reason for the rule is that the grantor, by making such a conveyance of his property, induces the purchasers to believe that the streets and alleys, squares, courts, and parks will be kept open for their use and benefit, and having acted upon the faith of his implied representations, based upon his conduct in platting the land and selling accordingly, he is equitably estopped, as well in reference to the public as to his grantees, from denying the existence of the easement thus created." To the same effect, see Sexton v. Elizabeth City, 169 N. C. 385, 86 S. E. 344.

In Clement v. Paris (Tex.) 154 S. W. 624, the court said: "In the reported cases, which are numerous, it has been uniformly held that the proprietor who had sold lots with reference to a plat or map of the town with a block marked 'public square' was estopped to deny that such square had been dedicated to the public. These decisions rest upon the theory that, by marking the word 'public' thereon, there is implied the representation to the purchasers of lots that such square had been dedicated to the public. If the one act of the owner in so marking the block on the map could be looked to as operating and having the effect to conclusively show to purchasers of the abutting lots the intention of the owner to dedicate to the public use, then the entire marking and arrangement of the map could be further looked to as an act of the owner operating and having the effect of fairly and reasonably indicating and representing to such purchasers that the particular square—open, undivided, unnumbered, and situated as it was—was designed for use by the general public purely and exclusively, as in the nature of a highway or plaza. The block appears in the center of the town site, not divided into building lots like all the others, but left open and entirely surrounded by streets. All the other blocks were subdivided into lots, indicating their use as building lots."

In Shearer v. Reno, 36 Nev. 443, 136 Pac. 706, it was said: "When by the sale of the property by reference to the map filed or bounded by streets marked upon it, other parties had become interested in the property set apart for public uses, the owner was precluded from asserting his original rights. The sale by the map, or with reference to the streets upon it, was a sale not merely for the price named in the deed, but for the further consideration that the streets and public grounds designated on the map should forever be open to the purchaser and to any subsequent purchasers in the town. This was an essential part of the consideration. The purchaser took not merely the interest of the grantor in the land described in the deed, but, as appurtenant to it, an easement in the streets and in the public grounds named, with an implied covenant that subsequent purchasers should be entitled to the same rights. The grantor could no more recall this easement and covenant than he could recall any other part of the consideration. They added materially to the value of every lot purchased."

In Davidow v. Griswold, 23 Cal. App. 189, 137 Pac. 619, the court said: "If we may state it more concisely, we have, then, this situation: The owner of a tract of land has it surveyed and platted as a town site. He has a map of it, upon which are delineated streets and parks, filed in the recorder's office. He sells lots all over this town site, described by reference to this map, and, moreover, upon the positive representation that the streets had been laid out and dedicated to public use, and, in reliance upon these representations, the lots are purchased and improved. This may not be dedication in the strict acceptance of that term but the result is the same. The owner has voluntarily placed himself in a position where equity will not permit him to deny thereafter that the said streets and parks are as represented by him; and, independent of the statement that they have been dedicated to public use, the other acts of the owner, considered in connection with the said purchases under the conditions mentioned, would preclude the said owner from contending, at least as far as said purchasers are concerned, that they are not streets and parks. And if they are to be considered as really streets and parks when we regard the rights of the purchasers, it is difficult to understand how their status would be changed when we regard the rights of the public generally."

In Vinton v. Lyons, 131 La. 673, 60 So. 54, the court said: "The dedication became binding and irrevocable the moment lots were sold from the plat, and the plat and sales were recorded in the conveyance records. The setting aside of the two parcels of land designated as block 7 of the plat as a public park had the effect of increasing the value and desirability of the other lots, especially those fronting thereon. The law considers, under such circumstances, that the value of the land dedicated goes into the remaining property and is received by the owner in making sales at an increased price. Besides it may be said that the owner, in laying out a town site when he provides reasonably for parks, makes sales of lots more readily, for the more advantages that property has the more readily it sells. . . . It would be contrary to equity and justice to hold that a real estate company could plat a town, make provisions for a park, sell lots from the plat after filing it for recordation, and after the purchasers had built homes on their lots, and after the company no doubt received a better consideration for those lots, or many of them, because of the dedication, to then withdraw the dedication and make a sale of the property to a private individual. To so hold, it seems to me, would be to set a trap for the unwary, and not only this, but it would place owners of real estate at a disadvantage in laying out town sites and subdivisions to towns, for it is to their interest, quite frequently, that they make some provision of this kind, and, in case of laying out a town, they could give no assurance that what they marked on their plat as a park was indeed a park, and the proposed purchaser of the lots is the one in whom the owner has an especial interest at the time."

Illustrations of Rule.

In Woodcock v. New Orleans, 222 Fed. 260, 138 C. C. A. 50, wherein it appeared that certain landowners made a plan of their property on which a vacant space was delineated by the designation of "Samuel Place," it was held that a sale of various lots by an owner in accordance with the plan, operated as a dedication of "Samuel Place" to the public.

In Northport, Wesleyan Grove Campmeeting Assoc. v. Andrews, 104 Me. 342, 71 Atl. 1027, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 976, it was held that all the essential elements of a complete dedication of the locus by the owner to the public and the adjoining lot owners for a park were established. It appeared therein that there was a division of a tract of land bordering on the seashore into small lots for sale, the setting apart of a portion of the tract for a park, the representation of the platting by a plan showing the lots by numbers and the locus as "Bay View Park," the exhibition of the plan to purchasers, the selling of lots by express reference to the plan, the promise that the park should be graded and kept open as such, and its use by the lot owners and the public generally at their pleasure continuously for a long period of years during which they had improved and beautified it at their own expense.

But in Brown v. Dickey, 106 Me. 97, 75 Atl. 382, it was held that several vacant lots marked on the same plan "15 x 60" were not dedicated to the public.

In the case of Re Lorne Park, 33 Ont. L. Rep. 51, 7 Ont. W. N. 558, affirming 30 Ont. L. Rep. 289, 5 Ont. W. N. 626, it appeared that the deed which, it was admitted, was common to all the purchasers of lots within the park, contained a covenant in favor of the purchaser, that he, "his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and his or their families, subject to the by-laws of the company, shall have free access to the streets, avenues, terraces, and commons of the said park," and free ingress and egress to and from the said park at any wharf or wharves thereof. In construing the covenant the court said: "The learned referee finds that inducements were held out to the purchasers that they would have the benefit of public recreation grounds provided by the company, and facilities would be offered for holding picnics to all who chose to patronize, the park for that purpose, and were willing to pay the charges which the ferry company saw fit to impose. For this branch of their business the company mainly devoted block Y. Here was provided a place for taking meals and refreshments, and hot water and other facilities were furnished picnic parties, for their enjoyment, and a dining-hall and seats and tables; 'the rest of the place being, as I understand it, enclosed.' I agree with the learned referee that blocks X and Z were used as a common playground open to all the cottagers, and were two of the places intended by the word 'commons,' and that the lot owners have a right to free access thereto, which ought not to be interfered with by the petitioner; but I cannot agree with him that a different consideration should apply to block Y. As he very truly points out, it was equally open and accessible to all as the other two blocks; and while it was not used as frequently as the other two, it was used at the will and pleasure of the cottagers as a common and place of resort, and the evidence shows that the owners of the cottages could and did resort thereto and make use of the seats and tables there provided; and I agree with my brother Middleton that no distinction ought to be made between the three blocks as to the rights of the cottagers in respect of the same. . . . Here, no doubt, the dedication was not to the public, but was of a quasi-public nature, limited to the general use of those who became owners of lots and residents within the park and their friends who might visit them, and others to whom the company gave, for the time being, the privilege of user. . . . I agree with the learned referee and my brother Middleton that the word 'commons,' as used in the deeds to the purchasers of lots, was not intended to have any strict or technical meaning, but to signify certain places in the park which were to be open and free to all for the purposes of general enjoyment and amusement, and I have nothing to add in that respect to the view so clearly expressed in the court below. The covenant being thus in favor of the purchasers, and having relation to a building scheme of lots known as Lorne Park, it thereby became restrictive in its effect as against the vendor of those lots, and those claiming under him. It could not operate in favor of the purchasers giving them the right to use the spaces referred to as commons without impliedly restricting the vendors from doing any act or thing, whether by sale or otherwise, which would preclude the purchasers from the enjoyment of the right which they had purchased and paid for."

However, in Adoue v. La Porte (Tex.) 124 S. W. 134, it was held that a mere reference, in deeds by a grantor, to a recorded map which was a map of an addition to a town showing it subdivided into lots, and on which in the center there was a circular plat of ground marked "Park," was not a dedication of that plat of ground to the public as a park in the absence of other evidence on the map that the land had been set aside for a public park or for any public use.

In Stover v. Steffey, 115 Md. 524, 81 Atl. 33, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 856, the court said: "The appellant's land, consisting of lots Nos. 9 and 10, as well as the designated park lot, is located on the East side of North Potomac street, but the said land of the appellant is not adjacent or contiguous to the park lot, but is separated therefrom by lots Nos. 11 to 17, both inclusive, and Park avenue or Dewey Street. The lots of the appellant at the nearest point are over four hundred feet from the park lot. If, therefore, the reasoning of the restrictive principle or rule of law, in force in this state, 'That the sale of a lot of land calling to bind on an unopened street works a dedication to public use of the street, if it is of the land of the grantor, only until it reaches the next opened or unopened street,' were applied, as we think it should be, in cases of this sort where the alleged dedication is for park purposes, we do not think from the facts of this case a dedication of this lot to the public for use as a park should be presumed."

MYAKKA COMPANY

v.

EDWARDS.

Florida Supreme Court—November 24, 1914.

68 Fla. 372; 67 So. 217.

Process — Publication — Scope of Statute — Citation to Rule Day.

The publication provisions of chapter 4129, Acts of 1893, authorizing constructive service of initial process in chancery, have reference to the appearance day stated in the act, and not to rule days on which defaults for failure to plead or demur may be entered under the statute and chancery rules.

Sufficiency of Publication — Once Each Week — When Service Complete.

Under chapter 4129, Acts of 1893, authorizing constructive service by publication of initial process to acquire jurisdiction of a nonresident defendant in a chancery case, where the first publication is less than four weeks or twenty-eight days prior to the appearance day fixed in the order of publication, the requirement that such publication shall be "once each week, for four consecutive weeks," is not complied with, and jurisdiction of the person is not acquired.

[See note at end of this case.]

Process — Decree on Insufficient Service.

Where jurisdiction of a defendant has not been acquired, a decree rendered against him in the cause is not binding upon him.

Quieting Title — Jurisdiction — Constructive Service.

A court of equity has power to proceed in rem in a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud on title to lands in this state, upon the proper publication of an order against a nonresident defendant.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914D 677.]

Judgments — Sufficiency of Record — Affirmative Showing of Jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction must be affirmatively shown by the record, where the parties defendant are shown to be nonresidents and constructive service is depended on for jurisdiction.

Collateral Attack — Judgment on Constructive Service.

The jurisdiction of the court may be attacked collaterally when it is dependent upon constructive service.

Process — Sufficiency of Publication — Once Each Week for Stated Number of Weeks.

The orders for publication required by chapter 4129, Laws of 1893, to be published once a week for four consecutive weeks if the defendant be stated to be a resident of the United States, are required to be published once a week for four weeks of seven days each, or at least twenty-eight days from the date of the first publication to the day fixed in the order for the defendant to appear.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The word "for," in chapter 4129, Laws 1893, requiring that publication of process against nonresidents shall be had "once a week for four consecutive weeks," means "throughout" or "during the continuance of" such period.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Manatee county: WHITNEY, Judge.

Action by Robert J. Edwards, plaintiff, against Myakka Company, defendant. From judgment rendered, defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

James F. Glen for appellant.

Arthur F. Odlin for appellee.

[372] WHITFIELD, J.—On December 4, 1913, Robert J. Edwards filed a bill in equity against Myakka Company, a corporation under the laws of South Carolina, and Janius Beebe, in which it is alleged that Edwards is the owner in [373] fee of certain real estate in Manatee County, Florida, and that such real estate is wild, unoccupied and unimproved; that the said defendant Myakka Company, a corporation as aforesaid, claims to have some title to, or interest in, or claim upon said land, the exact nature of which is unknown to your orator, but the same constitutes a cloud upon the title of your orator, deprives him of his right to sell or mortgage his said real estate, depreciates the value thereof, and that as against said Myakka Company your orator is without remedy at law. And your orator further says that the defendant Junius Beebe claims some title to, interest in or lien upon said land of your orator, the exact nature of which claim, title or interest your orator is unable to state, yet the same constitutes a cloud upon the title of your orator, deprives him of his right to sell or mortgage his said real estate, depreciates the value thereof, and that as against said Beebe your orator has no remedy at law.

Therefore your orator prays that by a decree of this Honorable Court, the title of your orator may be quieted as against said defendants, each and both of them, so far as said real estate of your orator may be concerned; that said defendants be declared possessed of no title to, interest in, or claim upon said lands, and that the same may be decreed to belong absolutely to your orator.

And your orator prays for such other and further relief in the premises as equity may require and as to your Honor may seem meet. Also that said defendants may be required to answer this bill and to stand to and abide by all orders and decrees which may be entered herein."

The defendant Myakka Company filed the following plea: "That this defendant heretofore, to wit, on the 4th day of January, A. D. 1906, filed in the Circuit Court of [374] Manatee County, Florida, its bill of complaint against the present complainant (Robert J. Edwards) and the unknown heirs of George B. Nichols and Weston Lewis, deceased, and such other persons whose names were unknown as might be interested in the property described in the present bill of complaint, which was particularly described in the said bill of complaint filed by this defendant, for the purpose of quieting the title of this defendant to the premises described in the present bill of complaint, as against the present complainant as well as against the unknown heirs of George B. Nichols and Weston Lewis, deceased, and such other persons as might be interested in the said premises, whose names were unknown to this defendant, and such proceedings were had in said cause that, to wit, on the said 4th day of January, A. D. 1906, an order of publication was duly made requiring the present complainant to appear to the said bill of complaint on the 5th day of February, A. D. 1906, it being alleged in the affidavit appended to the said bill of complaint that the said Robert J. Edwards was a resident of a State other than the State of Florida, and that the place of residence of the said Robert J. Edwards as particularly as the same was known to affiant was in Boston in the State of Massachusetts, and that in the belief of the affiant the said Robert J. Edwards was over the age of twenty-one years, and an order of publication was also duly made requiring the unknown defendants to the said bill to appear thereto on the 2nd day of April, A. D. 1906, and the said order of publication requiring the said Robert J. Edwards to appear to the said bill was duly published once each week for four consecutive weeks in a newspaper published in Manatee County, Florida, designated in the said order, to wit, the Bradentown Herald, and appeared in the issues of said paper on January 11th, January 18th, [375] January 25th and February 1st, A. D. 1906, and the order of publication directed to the unknown defendants was duly published once each week for twelve consecutive weeks in a newspaper published in Manatee County, Florida, designated in the said order, to wit, the Bradentown Herald, and appeared in the issues of said paper of January 11th, January 18th, January 25th, February 1st, February 8th, February 15th, February 22nd, March 1st, March 8th, March 15th, March 22nd and March 29th, 1906, and such proceedings were thereafter had in said cause that upon a certificate being duly made and filed by the Clerk of the Circuit Court of Manatee County, Florida, showing the publication of the notices aforesaid in the manner aforesaid and in the issues of the said newspaper aforesaid, and the posting of copies of the said orders in front of the courthouse door of Manatee county and the mailing of a copy of the said order directed to the defendant, Robert J. Edwards, to him at Boston in the State of Massachusetts, upon default of the said Robert J. Edwards and the unknown defendants to the said bill of complaint to appear thereto or to file any plea, answer or demurrer thereto, the Judge of the said Circuit Court, to wit, on the 26th day of June, A. D. 1906, ordered, adjudged and decreed that there had been due and legal service by publication in the said cause in all respects in the manner prescribed by law, and that all and singular the allegations of the said bill of complaint should be taken as confessed by the defendants and entered a decree pro confesso against the said defendants to the said bill of complaint, including the said Robert J. Edwards, and thereupon on the said day by the decree of the said court in the said proceeding it was ordered, adjudged and decreed that this defendant be quieted in its title to the premises described in the said bill of complaint, and in the [376] present bill, as against the said Robert J. Edwards, as well as against the unknown defendants thereto, and that any and all claims on the part of the said Robert J. Edwards to the said lands or any part or parcel thereof be removed as a cloud upon the title of this defendant thereto, and that he the said Robert J. Edwards, be required, within ten days from the date of the said decree, to wit, within ten days from the said 26th day of June, A. D., 1906, to make, execute and deliver to this defendant a proper release of any and all right, title and interest in and to the said lands and each and every part and parcel thereof, all of which more fully appears by the record of the proceedings in the suit aforesaid, a certified transcript of which is hereto annexed as 'Exhibit A' hereto, and hereby made by reference a part of this plea as fully as if the same were herein incorporated in hæc verba.

All of which matters and things this defendant doth aver and plead in bar of the entire bill of complaint of the complainant, and prays judgment of this Honorable Court whether it should make any further or other answer to the said bill of complaint."

On this plea the following order was made: "This cause coming on to be heard upon the argument of the plea of the defendant to the bill of complaint filed herein, it being stipulated by counsel for the respective parties that the plea correctly states the facts in reference to the service of process in the former chancery suit, and should be considered with the same force it would have in case a transcript of the record of the former cause were attached thereto, the former record not being found at the present time, upon consideration thereof, the court being of the opinion that the publication of process in the former suit was insufficient, and that no jurisdiction was acquired thereby to render a decree binding Robert J. Edwards, [377] it is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plea shall be deemed and held insufficient and disallowed and overruled as a plea to the said bill of complaint, and that the defendant, Myakka Company, a corporation, be required to answer the said bill of complaint, and the said defendant having announced its appeal from the decree to the Supreme Court of Florida, it is by consent of the respective parties ordered that no answer shall be required until the determination of said appeal, or the further order of the court."

The defendant Myakka Company appealed and assigns error as follows:

"1. The court erred in and by the decree appealed from in holding and deciding that jurisdiction was not obtained of Robert J. Edwards to render a decree binding on him in the suit mentioned in the plea of this defendant.

"2. The court erred in holding and deciding that the decree in the former suit mentioned in the plea of this defendant could be collaterally attacked in this proceeding on the ground of the alleged insufficiency of service of publication in the said suit."

The statute under which the asserted constructive service was made is as follows:

"CHAPTER 4129—(No. 15).

An Act to Provide for the Service of Non-Resident Defendants and Others in Chancery Causes, being an Act to Amend Section 1413 of the Revised Statutes.

Be It Enacted by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

Section 1. That Section 1413 of the Revised Statutes [378] of the State of Florida be amended so as to read as follows:

1413. Constructive Service.

1. Obtaining order for publication. Whenever the complainant or his agent or attorney shall state in a sworn bill or affidavit, duly filed, the belief of the affiant that the defendant is a resident of a State or county other than this State specifying as particularly as may be known to affiant, such residence, or that his residence is unknown, or that, if a resident, he has been absent more than sixty days next preceding the application for the order of publication, and that there is no person in the State the service of a subpoena upon whom would bind such defendant, or that he conceals himself so that the process cannot be served upon him, and further states the belief of the affiant as to the age of the defendant being over, or under, twenty-one years, or that his age is unknown, the judge or clerk of the court in which such bill shall have been filed shall make an order against the defendant requiring him to appear to the bill upon a day to be fixed by the order, not less than thirty nor more than fifty days from the time of the making of the order, if he be stated therein to be a resident of the United States; and not less than fifty nor more than eighty days if he be stated to be a non-resident of the United States, or if his residence be stated as unknown.

2. Publication of order.—The clerk shall have all orders of publication against an absent defendant, whether made by the judge or himself, published with as little delay as may be, in such newspaper as may be designated in the order, once each week, for four consecutive weeks, if the defendant be stated to be a resident of the United States, and once each week for eight consecutive weeks, if [379] he be stated to be a non-resident of the United States, or if his residence be stated to be unknown; he shall also within twenty days of the making of the order post a copy of the said order at the door of the court-house of the county, and send by mail a copy to the defendant, if his residence be shown by the bill or affidavit.

Sec. 2. This Act shall take effect immediately upon its approval by the Governor.

Approved May 31, 1893."

To accomplish the purpose designed by this statute it should be so construed and applied as to afford due process of law and effectually protect individual rights of non-residents who are not only permitted but encouraged to acquire property in this State, as well as to give ample remedy to those having rights in the property of non-residents situated in this State.

The question to be determined is whether the publication of constructive service, as stated in the above plea, gives the court jurisdiction of Edwards, who was a defendant in the former suit involving the property in controversy here. The publication here considered was to make constructive service of initial process to acquire jurisdiction of a non-resident defendant in a suit in equity—not as notice of proceedings in a cause where jurisdiction of the defendant has been duly acquired, or as notice of legislative proceedings as in Ex p. Lower, 178 Ala. 87, 59 So. 611.

The above quoted statute contemplates that when the defendant is a resident of the United States, as in this case, the publication shall begin four weeks before the appearance day. The manifest purpose of the provision requiring the appearance day to be fixed by the order, and, in a case like this, that such appearance day be not less than [380] thirty nor more than fifty days from the making of the order of publication, is to give ample opportunity for the required publication to begin not less than four weeks before the appearance day. The publication provisions of the statute have reference to the appearance day stated in the statute, and not to rule days on which defaults for failure to plead or demur may be entered under the statute and chancery rules. This statute is designed to secure a lawful constructive service of initial process to acquire jurisdiction of a defendant who resides beyond the State, for the purposes of an equity suit affecting the rights of such defendant in lands within the jurisdiction of the court; and the provision that the publication shall be "for four consecutive weeks" means a publication once each week during four weeks, the first publication to be four weeks from the appearance day fixed in the publication. See 3 Words & Phrases, p. 2858; 2nd Series, p. 594. The first publication was on January 11th, and the appearance day was February 5th.

The requirement here that the publication shall be "once each week, for four consecutive weeks," is not complied with when the publication is made once in each week, where the beginning of the publication period or the first publication is less than four weeks or twenty-eight days from the appearance day to which the publication has reference. See Knowles v. Summey, 52 Miss. 377; Morse v. U. S. 29 App. Cas. (D. C.) 433; Early v. Doe, 16 How. 610, 14 U. S. (L. ed.) 1079; State v. Cherry County, 58 Neb. 734, 79 N. W. 825.

The statute also provides that the appearance day of the defendant shall be fixed by the order to be "not less than fifty nor more than eighty days if he be stated to be a non-resident of the United States, or if his residence be stated as unknown," and that the publication shall be [381] "once each week for eight successive weeks if he be stated to be a non-resident of the United States, or if his residence be stated to be unknown." These particular provisions of the statute are not involved here, but it is argued that these provisions should be considered in construing the provision in question here since all the quoted provisions are contained in the same section.

Where the publication is required to be "once each week for eight successive weeks," such publication cannot be fully made when the appearance day is less than eight weeks from the date of the order. The statute permits the appearance day to be fixed "not less than fifty nor more than eighty days" from the date of the order. In applying the statute any real or apparent conflict in it when the defendant is a non-resident of the United States or his residence is unknown, may be avoided by making the appearance in such cases not less than eight weeks but not more than eighty days from the date of the order. This practice is doubtless pursued for convenience if not to make the statute serve the purpose for which it was enacted.

The order of the judge in the former case, that due and legal service had been made by publication, is not effectual when contradicted by the facts shown.

If the court does not acquire jurisdiction of the defendant sought to be brought in by constructive service where there is not a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute, both as to the publication and as to fixing the appearance day; and where jurisdiction of the defendant has not been acquired, a default cannot be lawfully entered against him for failure to respond to the bill of complaint by plea, answer or demurrer, as required by the statute and rules of court. Nor will a decree rendered, where jurisdiction of the defendant has not been acquired by proper actual or constructive service or appearance, be [382] binding upon the defendant. See Guaranty Trust, etc. Co. v. Green Cove Springs, etc. R. Co. 139 U. S. 137, 11 S. Ct. 512, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 116; Shrader v. Shrader, 36 Fla. 502, 18 So. 672.

In Lafin v. Gato, 52 Fla. 529, 42 So. 387, it was held that where the order for publication fixes the appearance day more than fifty days from the making of the order, when the defendant is a resident of the United States, the constructive service is ineffectual. For stronger reasons, where the defendant is a resident of the United States a publication for a period beginning less than four weeks from the designated appearance day, is ineffectual to give the court jurisdiction of the defendant for the purpose of adjudicating his rights in property within the jurisdiction of the court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Shackleford, C.J., and Taylor, Cockrell and Hocker, JJ., concur.

[383] ON REHEARING.

ELLIS, J.—This cause was considered by this court during the June Term, A. D. 1914, and the decree of the court below was affirmed.

Upon petition filed by appellant a rehearing was ordered.

The bill of complaint, the plea of the defendant Myakka Company and the order of the court from which this appeal was taken are fully set out in the former opinion by this court.

The Act of the Legislature which was under consideration by this court and which was quoted in full in the opinion written by Justice Whitfield, was intended as its title and provisions recite to provide generally for constructive service of original process to acquire jurisdiction of non-resident defendants or defendants whose places of residence are unknown, in chancery causes.

The first section of the act directs the judge or clerk of the court in which a bill shall have been filed, upon [384] proper showing made in a sworn bill or affidavit duly filed, to make an order against the defendant requiring him to appear to the bill upon a day to be fixed by the order not less than thirty nor more than fifty days from the time of the making of the order if the defendant be stated therein to be a resident of the United States, and not less than fifty nor more than eighty days if he be stated to be a non-resident of the United States or if his residence be stated as unknown.

The second paragraph of the section deals with the publication of the orders so made by the judge or the clerk and directs the clerk to have all orders of publication against an absent defendant, whether made by the judge or himself, published with as little delay as may be in such newspaper as may be designated in the order, once a week for four consecutive weeks, if the defendant be stated to be a resident of the United States, and once each week for eight consecutive weeks if he be stated to be a non-resident of the United States, or if his residence be stated to be unknown. The clerk was also required, within twenty days of the making of the order, to post a copy of the order at the door of the court-house of the county, and send by mail a copy to the defendant if his residence be shown by the bill or affidavit.

The suit in which the decree was adjudged to be void by the court below, was according to the plea in this cause brought by the appellant in January, 1906, in the Circuit Court for Manatee County against Robert J. Edwards, the appellee in this cause, and the unknown heirs of George B. Nichols and Weston Lewis, deceased, and such other persons whose names were unknown as might be interested in the property described in the bill, for the purpose of quieting the title of appellant to the same lands described in the bill of complaint in this cause as [385] against the said Edwards as well as against the unknown heirs of the said Nichols and Lewis and such other persons as might be interested in the premises whose names were unknown to the appellant. An affidavit appended to the bill in that cause contained the statements that the said Robert J. Edwards was a resident of a State other than the State of Florida; that the place of residence of the said Edwards as particularly as the same was known to the affiant was in Boston, Massachusetts, and that in the belief of the affiant the said Edwards was over the age of twenty-one years.

According to the plea on the 4th day of January, 1906, an order was made requiring the said Robert J. Edwards to appear to the bill of complaint on the 5th day of February, 1906, thirty-two days from the time of making the order counting the last day. The order was published in the newspaper in Manatee County designated in the order and appeared in four consecutive weekly issues of that paper, as follows: on January 11th, 18th, 25th and February 1st, 1906. From the date of the first publication of the order to and including the day fixed in the order for the appearance of the defendant Edwards, there were twenty-five days. There was a certificate by the clerk showing the publication of the order in the newspaper designated therein and at the times mentioned, also the posting of copies of the order at the court house door of Manatee County, and the mailing of a copy of the order directed to the said Edwards at Boston, Massachusetts.

Edwards failed to appear to the bill, and on June 28th, 1906, the Judge of the Circuit Court made an order that the bill of complaint be taken as confessed against the said Edwards, and reciting that there had been due and legal service by publication, and on the same day made [386] the final decree against Edwards, which the court below in this cause held to be void.

We hold that the pro confesso order made by the Judge of the Circuit Court on June 26, 1906, reciting that there had been due and legal service by publication, was equivalent to a finding by the court that the order requiring the defendant to appear to the bill, had been published by the clerk with as little delay as might have been in the newspaper designated in the order.

A Court of Equity has power to proceed in rem in a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud on title to lands in this State, upon the proper publication of an order against a non-resident defendant. Gen. Stats. § 1950; Chap. 4129 Acts of 1893, Gen. Stats. § 1866; 1 Pomeroy Eq. Jur. § 135; Tennant v. Fretts, 67 W. Va. 569, 68 S. E. 387, 140 Am. St. Rep. 979, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 625; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 S. Ct. 557, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 918.

The jurisdiction of the court, therefore, to proceed in rem or quasi in rem to quiet title or remove a cloud on title to land in this State, as against non-resident defendants depends upon the statute providing for constructive service upon such defendants; in this case upon Chapter 4129 Acts of 1893. By such statutes the power is given the court to remove a cloud from the title to lands without having actual jurisdiction over the person of the defendant by means of personal service. It is true that the State can deal with the property within its limits even though owned by non-residents. The limitation upon this power of the State said Judge Shiras, in Bennett v. Fenton, 41 Fed. 283, is as to the mode of procedure.

In Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 959, the court announced the principle that when by legislation of a State constructive service of process by publication is substituted [387] in place of personal service the statutory provision must be strictly pursued in order to bind a citizen of another State not personally served. "Every principle of justice exacts a strict and literal compliance with the statutory provisions."

Mr. Justice Brown in Guaranty Trust, etc. Co. v. Green Cove Springs, etc. R. Co. 139 U. S. 137, 11 S. Ct. 512, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 116, said there is scarcely a State in the Union in which the same principle has not been announced and re-affirmed.

Jurisdiction must be affirmatively shown by the record where the parties are shown to be non-residents, and constructive service is depended upon for jurisdiction. This is the rule even where the jurisdiction is attacked collaterally. Guaranty Trust, etc. Co. v. Buddington, 27 Fla. 215, 9 So. 246, 12 L.R.A. 770.

In the latter case the court held that the term "months" as used in the Act of November 7, 1828, Sec. 8, page 154 McClellan's Digest, providing for the publication of orders in chancery causes against defendants to appear and plead and for decrees pro confesso in default thereof, means calendar month, and that no jurisdiction was obtained of the absent defendant, as it appeared that there had not been four months "publication prior to appearance day."

The term "week" is as certain, clear and definite a designation of time according to our division of it as it is possible to make.

It was the evident purpose of the Legislature in the enactment of Chapter 4129, Laws of 1893, to require the judge or the clerk in making the order against the absent defendant to regard the facilities for publication which might exist in the county in which the bill was filed and [388] the order made. The judge or clerk in the order designated the newspaper in which it was to be published; but the statute prescribed the duration of such publication. Its language is "once a week for four consecutive weeks" or "once each week for eight consecutive weeks." The language is not that the order shall be published four times or eight times. It specifies the number of weeks, not the number of times. The evident purpose in providing that the publication should be "once a week" or "once each week" was to avoid a construction that a daily publication could have been contemplated. If the Legislature had intended otherwise, it could very easily have used language to so indicate. Therefore it was deemed proper by the Legislature to leave a margin of time between thirty and fifty days in one case, and fifty and eighty in the other, in which the judge or clerk could adjust the time for appearance to the period of publication which the statute requires. It is true that in cases where the residence of defendants is unknown, the statute requires the appearance day to be not less than fifty nor more than eighty days from the time of making the order, and that full eight weeks publication of the order could not be secured in cases where the order required the defendant to appear on the fiftieth day from the time of making the order; but it by no means follows that a period of less than eight weeks publication was thereby required or permitted by the act. At the time the Act was passed it is doubtful if in six counties in the State daily newspapers were published. So that in counties where there were published weekly newspapers an order might have been made, as contended by appellant's counsel, requiring an absent defendant whose residence was unknown to appear on a day fifty days from the time of making the order; yet if the first publication could not [389] be made in the week the order was made, the clerk could not by publishing the order "with as little delay as may be," secure more than seven publications before the appearance day. It could not be contended that such a publication would be valid under the act. There is no dispute that there must be at least eight publications in cases where the residence of the defendant is stated to be unknown. It would seem to follow, therefore, that it was the purpose of the statute to require the judge or clerk in making the order, to consider the facilities existing in the particular county for the publication of the order, and adjust the time for appearance to the period during which the statute requires the order to be published.

In the former opinion in this case the court held, in effect, that the use of the word "for" in the statute in connection with the word "weeks" prescribing the period of publication of the order, signified duration of time; and that the requirement of the statute that the publication shall be "once a week for four consecutive weeks" is not complied with when the publication is made once in each week when the first publication is less than four weeks or twenty-eight days from the appearance day to which the publication has reference.

Our re-investigation of this case has not led us to a different conclusion. We do not find, as the learned counsel for appellant contends, that the weight of recent authority is against the view of this court, as expressed in the former opinion.

The opinion expressed by the court in State v. Cherry County, 58 Neb. 734, 79 N. W. 825, has not been overruled, according to our reading of the decisions of that court. The court construed the word "for" to mean "during" when applied to time. In the case of State [390] v. Hanson, 80 Neb. 724, 115 N. W. 294, cited by appellant's counsel to show that the Nebraska Court had receded from the view expressed in State v. Cherry County, it was said that where the "time mentioned in the statute expressed the duration of the notice the same must be published for and during the time mentioned, when, however, the time mentioned indicates the number of times the notice is required to be published it is satisfied if the notice is published the number of times mentioned." The court was construing an act providing for the publication of a notice for holding an election to determine whether a drainage district should be established, in our view quite a different matter from the one under consideration in this court where the State is exercising the power through a court to adjudicate on constructive service merely the rights, interest or claims of a non-resident defendant to property in this State.

In the case of Burr v. Finch, 91 Neb. 417, 136 N. W. 72, a still later Nebraska case, the statute construed omitted the word "for." The question being whether publication of a notice on Thursday, September 14th, Thursday, September 21st, Thursday, September 28th and Friday, October 6th, constituted four consecutive publications, it being insisted that the last publication was a day late. The court held this publication sufficient, relying on Davis v. Huston, 15 Neb. 28, 16 N. W. 820, and Medland v. Linton, 60 Neb. 249, 82 N. W. 866. The court in State v. Cherry County, supra, pointed out that the word "for" was omitted from the statute construed in the Davis case, and in the Midland case the court defined a "week" as a period of time commencing Sunday morning and ending Saturday night. The effect of the decision in the Finch case seems to be that where two certain dates [391] fall upon days of the same week a publication upon either of those days is a publication in that week.

In the case of McDonald v. Nordyke Marmion Co. 9 N. D. 290, 83 N. W. 6, the court referred approvingly to its former opinion in the case of Finlayson v. Peterson, 5 N. D. 587, 67 N. W. 953, 57 Am. St. Rep. 584, 33 L.R.A. 532, in which it was held that where a statute requiring a notice to be given "by publishing the same for six successive weeks at least once in each week" meant that such notice must be published weekly "for" and "throughout" a period of six full and consecutive weeks and embrace an aggregate of 42 days time and nothing short of 42 days time would satisfy the statutory mandate. The court held that the earlier statute has been superseded by Section 5848 of the Revised Code, providing that publication must be made "Six times, once in each week for six successive weeks;" that the period of duration of the publication which was the decisive test under the earlier law had ceased to be controlling under the existing statute, and that the number of publications was one of the controlling factors. In Grandin v. Emmons, 10 N. D. 223, 86 N. W. 723, 88 Am. St. Rep. 684, 54 L.R.A. 610, the court reaffirmed the construction placed upon the later statute in McDonald v. Nordyke Marmion Co.

There is a great deal of apparent conflict of opinion between the decisions of the various States on this question of publication of notice, but that contrariety of opinion arises upon the construction of the various statutes of the different States. We have found no case in which the statute construed was couched in precisely the same language as ours. Similar language occurs in many statutes. In some States the statute contains additional provisions that control or influence the construction. Some of the statutes relate to tax sales, sheriff's sale, probate proceedings, attachment, notice in elections, leg-relative [392] proceedings, etc., but in each case some word or phrase contained in the particular statute, or the character of the proceedings leads the court to its particular conclusion.

In Banta v. Wood, 32 Ia. 469, the court considered the notice published in an attachment proceeding. The statute under which the order of publication was made directed that it be published "for such length of time as may be deemed reasonable" "not less than once a week for four weeks" and "that service shall be deemed complete at the expiration of the time prescribed in the order of publication." It also provided that the defendant against whom publication is ordered or his representative on application and sufficient cause shown at any time before judgment must be allowed to defend the action, and except in an action for divorce the defendant or his representative may in like manner, upon good cause shown, be allowed to defend after judgment at any time within one year after notice thereof and within seven years after its rendition on such terms as may be just. The order of publication directed that it be made for four weeks. The court held the service complete at the last publication.

So in Morrow v. Weed, 4 Ia. 77, 66 Am. Dec. 122, the question was as to the validity of an administrator's sale of realty upon the order of a Probate Court. The act authorized the court to order notice of sale, in lieu of another notice, to be published "three weeks successively in any newspaper." The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter by sufficient petition of the administrator to sell the lands to pay debts. The order directed notice to be published "three successive weeks." The court held publication one day in each week sufficient.

The case of Marling v. Robrecht, 13 W. Va. 440, was one in which the court ordered an account to be taken. It was a notice of subsequent proceedings in a case in [393] which the party complaining had been served with process and was apprised of the institution of the suit.

In Savings, etc. Soc. v. Thompson, 32 Cal. 347, the summons required the defendant to answer within a given number of days after service of the summons. The day for the defendant to act was left open by the summons depending on the time when the service was made complete. The act required the summons to be published "once a week" not less than "three months." The first publication was January 10th, and the last April 9th, 1865, there was publication each week during that period. The court said the month contemplated by the statute meant calendar month, that the time defendant was required to answer did not commence to run until April 10th.

In Knowlton v. Knowlton, 155 Ill. 158, 39 N. E. 595, the court was considering the validity of a decree of divorce granted in Connecticut. The statute of that State provided that in petitions for divorce, when the adverse party resides out of or is absent from the State, the court or clerk may make such order as he shall deem reasonable, relative to notice. The order required that notice be given to respondent of the pendency of the petition by publishing a copy of the order for "two weeks successively before the term of the court." The order was published once in each of two successive weeks. The Illinois court held the publication sufficient.

In Tidd v. Grimes, 66 Kan. 401, 71 Pac. 844, the question was the validity of a deed based on a tax sale. The statute required publication of the notice "once in each week for four consecutive weeks prior to the sale."

In Alexander v. Alexander, 26 Neb. 68, 41 N. W. 1065, in the matter of the probate of a will, the statute provided that the court having jurisdiction should appoint [394] a time and place for proving the will when all concerned may appear, it provided for personal service on all persons interested or by publication under an order in a newspaper "three weeks successively." The court held that the words meant three weekly publications.

In Smith v. Collis, 42 Mont. 350, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1158, 112 Pac. 1070, the statute required "Summons by publication to be published" "once a week for four successive weeks." The court said the statute furnished the key to its own interpretation. The statute expressly provided that "the service of summons is complete on the day of the fourth publication." The court said that was a legislative declaration that only four publications were required if there was once in each of four successive weeks.

Our conclusion that the word "for" in our statute means "throughout" or "during the continuance of" and that "for four weeks" means twenty-eight days, and "eight weeks" fifty-six days, is supported by the following authority: Finlayson v. Peterson, 5 N. D. 587, 67 N. W. 953, 57 Am. St. Rep. 584, 33 L.R.A. 532; Market Nat. Bank v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 89 N. Y. 397; Dever v. Cornwell, 10 N. D. 123, 86 N. W. 227; Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 65 Fed. 38, 27 U. S. App. 526, 12 C. C. A. 505; Wilson v. Thompson, 26 Minn. 299, 3 N. W. 699; State v. Tucker, 32 Mo. App. 620; Parsons v. Lanning, 27 N. J. Eq. 70; Wade on Notice, § 1105; Foster v. Vehmeyer, 133 Cal. 459, 65 Pac. 974; 32 Cyc. 490; Guaranty Trust, etc. Co. v. Buddington, 27 Fla. 215, 9 So. 246, 12 L.R.A. 770.

As to the second proposition of appellant that the jurisdiction cannot be attacked collaterally, we think the law is settled in this State contrary to that view. Guaranty Trust, etc. Co. Buddington, supra.

[395] The former opinion of the court is sustained and the order appealed from is affirmed.

Day of Publication, 212.

Duration of Time Required between First and Last Publication.

According to the weight of authority, a provision that a publication shall be made once a week for a specified number of weeks requires only the specified number of weekly publications, and does not require that the full number of days in so many weeks shall elapse between the first and last publication. Calvert v. Calvert, 15 Colo. 390, 24 Pac. 1043 (publication of summons); Bentley v. Shingler, 111 Ga. 780, 36 S. E. 935 (advertisement to taxpayers); Griffing v. Mills, 40 Miss. 611 (notice of attachment); Knowles v. Summey, 52 Miss. 377 ("citation notice" to nonresident); Smith v. Collis, 42 Mont. 350, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1158, 112 Pac. 1070; State v. Hanson, 80 Neb. 724, 115 N. W. 294 (notice of election); State v. Superior Ct. 6 Wash. 352, 33 Pac. 827 (publication of summons); Cox v. North Wisconsin Lumber Co. 82 Wis. 141, 51 N. W. 1130 (publication of summons); Bouchier v. Hammer, 140 Wis. 648, 123 N. W. 132 (notice of tax sale). See also State v. Georgia Co. 109 N. C. 310, 13 S. E. 861. Thus in State v. Hanson, supra, the court said: "Where the time mentioned by the statute expresses the duration of the notice, the same must be published for and during the time mentioned. Where, however, the time mentioned indicates only the number of times the notice is required to be published, it is satisfied if the notice is published the number of times mentioned. It is apparent that the phrases, 'shall publish a notice once each week for three weeks,' and 'a notice shall be given for three weeks by publication,' have different meanings." Ann. Cas. 1917B.—14.

ings. In the first 'for three weeks' limits the number of publications, and in the other phrase 'for three weeks' fixes the period of time during which the publication must be made." And in Bouchier v. Hammer, 140 Wis. 648, 123 N. W. 132, it was said: "Another defect asserted is that the printer's affidavit of publication showed that the notices were published only three weeks instead of four. The sale of 1903 took place on May 19th, that of 1904 on May 17th. The affidavit in each case declared that the notice 'was printed and published in such newspaper once in each week for four successive weeks, commencing on the 15th of April and terminating on the 6th of May.' Of course there is confusion of terms between the affidavit and the statute. The latter requires that the notice shall be published once in each week for four successive weeks prior to the day of the sale. This of course requires a period of twenty-eight days of publication before the sale, but that publication is accomplished by issue of the paper containing the notice on four distinct days, one only in each week; so 'publication of notice' may apply to the term of notice, but it may also apply to the physical fact of printing the notice in a published newspaper, and clearly that is the significance in which it is used in this affidavit, and indeed is the meaning given to the expression by this court in Chippewa River Land Co. v. J. L. Gates Land Co. 118 Wis. 345, 357, 94 N. W. 37, 95 N. W. 954. The joining with the word 'published' the word 'printed' in this affidavit emphasizes and renders sure the meaning in the mind of the affiant. So read, it establishes four printings, and the dates are entirely consistent with that assertion; May 6th being the day upon which a weekly paper would be issued which also was issued on the 15th of April. We think there is no ambiguity in this affidavit, but that it declares that on four specific days in separate successive weeks this notice was printed, and that more than one complete week after its last printing elapsed before the day of sale, and that constitutes in law a publication for four weeks, although the printing terminated in twenty-two days."

The Montana statute was construed as follows in Smith v. Collins, 42 Mont. 350, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1158, 112 Pac. 1070; "Section 6521, Revised Codes, provides that the summons shall be published 'once a week for four successive weeks.' . . . If our code section, above, contained no other provision than the one quoted, we might experience some difficulty in determining its meaning. But to our minds the section itself furnishes the key to its own proper interpretation, in the last sentence which reads: 'The service of summons is complete on the day of the fourth publication.' This is a legislative declaration that only four publications are required, if there is one in each of four successive weeks. 'A week consists of seven consecutive days.' (Revised Codes, sec. 2030.) 'The time in which any act provided by law is to be done is completed by excluding the first day and including the last, unless the last is a holiday, and then it is also excluded.' (Sections 6219, 8067.) Every Sunday is a holiday. (Section 8065.) For the purpose of illustrating our view, let us assume that publication is made on the same day in each of four successive weeks, as, for instance, on the 3d, 10th, 17th and 24th. The greatest period of time which can elapse between the first and fourth publications is twenty-one days, under the rule of computation prescribed by the code above. Or assume the most extreme case which we can imagine: that the publication occurred on the 4th (although that day is Sunday), 13th, 22d, and 31st of the present month of December, 1910. The greatest period of time which can elapse between the first and fourth publications is twenty-seven days, according to the same rule. Since section 6521 requires only four publications, and requires that there shall be at least one in each of four successive weeks, it is self-evident that the statute does not contemplate that there shall be a period of four weeks or twenty-eight days elapse between the first and fourth publications, as such a thing is absolutely impossible. Since, then, the statute cannot mean that a full period of four weeks or twenty-eight days must be covered by the publication, there remains but one other interpretation to be given to the language employed, viz., the publication must occur four times, once in each of four successive weeks, using the term 'week' as defined in the code."

On the contrary it has been held that under a statute providing for a publication once a week for three successive weeks, three weekly publications were insufficient, as being only for fifteen days and not for three weeks, or twenty-one days. Morse v. U. S. 29 App. Cas. (D. C.) 433 (constructive service of process on nonresident defendant).

When Publication Is Complete.

VIEW REQUIRING FULL NUMBER OF DAYS.

The view in some jurisdictions is that a provision for the publication of a notice once a week for a certain number of weeks requires that the full number of days in the number of weeks designated shall elapse before the publication becomes effectual and before the act to which the publication relates can be validly performed. Bacon v. Kennedy, 56 Mich. 329, 22 N. W. 824 (notice of statutory foreclosure sale); Davis v. Robinson, 70 Tex. 394, 7 S. W. 749 (citation of nonresident defendant); Irion v. Bexar County, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 527, 63 S. W. 550 (citation of nonresident defendant); Odorn v. Crews (Tex.) 163 S. W. 366 (citation of nonresident defendant). See also Bouchier v. Hammer, 140 Wis. 648, 123 N. W. 132. And see the reported case.

A statute providing for a publication once in each week for "at least" a certain number of weeks requires that the duration of the time in days in the number of weeks designated shall elapse between the date of the first publication and the date on which the publication becomes effectual. The provision for the publication "once a week" in such a case does not qualify the requirement of notice "for at least" the number of weeks. Early v. Doe, 16 How. 610, 14 U. S. (L. ed.) 1079 (notice of sale for taxes); Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 65 Fed. 38, 27 U. S. App. 526, 12 C. C. A. 505 (sale of mortgaged property). "The publication of a notice of sale once a week for only twenty-seven days before the day of sale is not a 'previous publication' of such a notice 'once a week for at least four weeks prior to such sale,' as required." Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra.

VIEW NOT REQUIRING FULL NUMBER OF DAYS.

Apparently the weight of authority supports the proposition that a provision for the publication of a notice once a week for a certain number of weeks is complied with when the successive weekly publications have been made; and it is not required that the full number of days in the number of weeks designated shall elapse before the publication becomes effectual. Lower v. State, 3 Ala. 122, 57 So. 500 (notice of intention to apply to legislature for local law); Decker v. Myles, 4 Colo. 558 (notice to lien claimants); State v. Yellow Jacket Silver Min. Co. 5 Nev. 415 (notice of tax election); Dewitz v. Joyce-Pruitt Co. 20 N. M. 572, 151 Pac. 237 (notice of sale under mortgage foreclosure; statute provided that last publication must be at least three days prior to sale); Marling v. Robrecht 13 W. Va. 440 (notice of time and place of taking account). Thus in State v. Yellow Jacket Silver Min. Co. supra, the court said: "This second point made by counsel for defendant is, that the notice which the law requires to be published 'once a week for three weeks' was advertised only for seventeen days, which, it is argued, was not in compliance with the requirements of the law. The language of the statute, it is claimed, makes it necessary that the first publication should be twenty-one days prior to the election. But, in my opinion, the statute admits of no such construction. The purpose of the advertisement is to give notice to the legal voters of the school district. When there have been three insertions of such notice upon three successive weeks the object of the publication, so far as it can be, is accomplished. The statute certainly requires but three publications of the notice; why then is not its full purpose accomplished upon the expiration of the third day of publication. Some statutes require a publication for a definite period of time, or a certain number of days, and in such case of course the advertisement must be for the full period, but where it is required to be published once a week for a certain number of weeks, it is generally held that the number of insertions and not the days comprised in such weeks is to be regarded."

This view also finds support in Davis v. Huston, 15 Neb. 28, 16 N. W. 820, wherein the court said: "The statute . . . provides that: 'The publication must be made four consecutive weeks in some newspaper. . . . While I do not find any case in which this language has been construed by this court, or indeed by a court of last resort in any state, yet it is well known to the profession that it has uniformly been understood in this state, the same as though the language were that the notice should be printed or inserted in a weekly newspaper once in each week for four weeks successively, etc., and that the publication is deemed complete upon the distribution of the newspaper containing its fourth successive weekly insertion."

In Pennsylvania the statute requiring that notice of a sheriff's sale of realty shall be advertised "once a week during three successive weeks previous to such sale," has been held not to require the first notice to be published twenty-one days before the day of the sale. Hollister v. Vanderlin, 165 Pa. St. 248, 30 Atl. 1002, 44 Am. St. Rep. 657; McKee v. Kerr, 192 Pa. St. 164, 43 Atl. 953. But the statute does require that the advertisement shall be made "during three successive weeks previous to" the sale, and therefore it has been held that a sale, which took place on Saturday of the same week in which the last publication of the advertisement was made, was invalid. Currens v. Blocher, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 30, wherein the court said: "While the act does not require that the first advertisement shall be published three full weeks before the sale, it does require that the publication shall be during three successive weeks previous to such sale; the notice of sale in this instance is the fact which must precede the time of sale. The period during which the notice must be given must have expired before the sale can be made. The officer has the whole of the last calendar week previous to the sale in which to publish his last advertisement, but he cannot cut short the period of notice required by the statute, by publishing that last notice upon the first day of the last week. The last publication is for the whole of the last calendar week, and until that week has expired the demands of the statute have not been met."

VIEW UNDER NEW YORK STATUTES.

In New York a statute relating to the sale of realty under execution and requiring advertisement once a week for six successive weeks has been held not to require the first advertisement to be made six weeks before the sale. Olcott v. Robinson, 21 N. Y. 150, 78 Am. Dec. 126; Wood v. Morehouse, 45 N. Y. 369.

But under a statute providing for the service of summons by publication "for a specified time, which the judge deems reasonable, not less than once a week for six successive weeks," it has been held that the service is not complete until the expiration of the full six weeks. Market Nat. Bank v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 89 N. Y. 397, 11 Abb. N. Cas. 104; Waters v. Waters, 7 Misc. 519, 27 N. Y. S. 1004; Koch's Estate, 19 Civ. Pro. 165, 12 N. Y. S. 94. See also Herbert v. Smith, 6 Lans. 493. See also Richardson v. Bates, 23 How. Pr. 516 (under similar provision in earlier code). In Market Nat. Bank v. Pacific Nat. Bank, supra, the court said: "Section 440 provides for publication for a specified time, not less than once a week for six successive weeks. The number of weeks is specified and not the number of times. Section 441 declares that the time shall be complete upon the day of the last publication, and section 787 that the period of publication must be computed so as to include the day which completes the full period of publication. It will be perceived that the publication must be made for a specified period of time, and when the statute provides for six weeks it is obvious that this period will not elapse prior to its expiration. It does not provide for a publication six times within six weeks, but for a time not less than once a week for six successive weeks. The publication evidently means rather more than printing the notice. Its object is to give notice by means of the newspapers, and it cannot be claimed that such notice is given for six weeks before that time expires. Looking at the various provisions referred to, it is a reasonable construction that the law intended a full six weeks' publication and not six times in six different weeks. If it were otherwise the time would vary and lead to confusion, and the defendant might not at all times know when it would expire as the summons need not be published on the same day in each week."

Day of Publication.

The general rule is that a requirement that a publication shall be made once a week does not limit the publication to the same day on each week. Steinle v. Bell, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 171 (publication of summons); Raunn v. Leach, 53 Minn. 84, 54 N. W. 1058 (service of summons on nonresident); Hollister v. Vanderlin, 165 Pa. St. 248, 30 Atl. 1002, 44 Am. St. Rep. 657 (advertisement of sheriff's sale); McKee v. Kerr, 192 Pa. St. 164, 43 Atl. 953 (following Hollister v. Vanderlin). See also Herbert v. Smith, 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 493; Doheny v. Worden, 75 App. Div. 47, 77 N. Y. S. 959. In Raunn v. Leach, supra, the court said: "A week is defined by all lexicographers as a period of time commencing with Sunday and ending with Saturday night, and also as a period of seven days' duration, without reference to the time such period commences. Therefore it need not commence, necessarily, on the morning of the first day of what has been denominated as the biblical week, but on a later day. In the case at bar the summons was published for the first and second times on the third day of the biblical week, and thereafter it appeared upon either the fourth or fifth day of such week, a Sunday intervening between each publication. It was also published once in each of the six consecutive weeks commencing on the day of its first appearance in the paper, Tuesday, February 7th. We are unable to hold that the statute was not complied with. The summons appeared once in each of the six periods of seven days' duration beginning upon and which followed consecutively the date just mentioned. We construe the statute as authorizing just such a publication. The statutory week must commence upon the day of the first publication, and there is nothing in the language used which would justify the conclusion that because the publication must be 'once in each week' the day of the first publication must determine the day on which each subsequent publication is to be made, and that exactly seven days must intervene between each."

This rule is furthermore supported by the decision rendered in Ronkendorff v. Taylor, 4 Pet. 340, 7 U. S. (L. ed.) 882, concerning the notice of a sale for taxes which was required to be given once a week for three months. That case is not strictly within the scope of this note, but inasmuch as the decision turned on the construction of the words "once a week" and not on the phrase "for three months," the following excerpt from the opinion is given: "In examining the dates of the publications, it appears that eleven days at one time transpired between them, and at another time ten days, at another eight. These omissions, it is contended, are fatal: that the publication being once made, it was essential to the validity of the notice that it should be published every seventh day thereafter. The words of the law are, 'once a week.' Does this limit the publication to a particular day of the week? If the notice be published on Monday, is it fatal to omit the publication until the Tuesday week succeeding? The object of the notice is as well answered by such publication, as if it had been made on the following Monday. A week is a definite period of time, commencing on Sunday and ending on Saturday. By this construction the notice in this case must be held sufficient. It was published, Monday, January the 6th, and omitted until Saturday, January the 18th, leaving an interval of eleven days; still the publication on Saturday was within the week succeeding the notice of the sixth. It would be a most rigid construction of the act of Congress, justified neither by its spirit nor its language, to say that this notice must be published on any particular day of a week. If published once a week, for three months, the law is complied with, and its object effectuated."

On the contrary, in the case of In re King, 5 Ben. 453, 7 N. B. R. 279, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,779, concerning the notice of dissolution of a limited partnership which was required to be published "once in each week for four weeks," it was said that when any day of the week was taken for the first publication, that same day of the week must be taken for each succeeding publication; and it was held that a publication was insufficient which was published five times in January and February, 1869, namely, on the 11th, 21st, and 27th days of January, and on the 1st and 10th days of February. The court said: "It is contended that the publication in the state paper was a publication once in each week for five successive weeks, in this way: The first week was from January 11th to January 17th, both inclusive, and the publication in that week was on January 11th; the second week was from January 18th to January 24th, both inclusive, and the publication in that week was on January 21st; the third week was from January 25th to January 31st, both inclusive, and the publication in that week was on January 27th; the fourth week was from February 1st to February 7th, both inclusive, and the publication in that week was on February 1st; the fifth week was from February 8th to February 14th, both inclusive, and the publication in that week was on February 10th. . . . There was not one publication in the state paper, in each of three consecutive weeks of seven days each, ensuing the 11th of January. The first of such weeks of seven days each comprised the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th and 18th.

days of January, and there was no publication on any one of those days."

Under a statute providing for a publication "at least" once a week for a certain number of weeks, it has been held that the words "at least" relate as well to the frequency of the publication as to the period during which it is to continue, and that the requirement is not satisfied by a publication during each of the number of weeks if more than seven days elapse between two publications. Hernandez v. His Creditors, 57 Cal. 333 (notice to creditors in proceedings in insolvency).

Under a statute providing for service on nonresidents by publication not less than once a week for six successive weeks, it has been held that a publication which is made twice in one week and not at all in another is insufficient. Doheny v. Worden, 75 App. Div. 47, 77 N. Y. S. 959, wherein the court said: "There was an order for the publication, made under section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which directed that it be made in two newspapers not less than once a week for six successive weeks. One of the newspapers designated was the Syracuse Evening Journal. The publication in this newspaper was made December 12, 19, 24, 1898, and January 2, 9, and 16, 1899, so that it was made twice during the week commencing Monday, December 19th, and was not published at all during the week commencing Monday, December 26th. There was a full week after the publication on December 24th, during which there was no publication at all. The publication was commenced on a Monday, and was continued on each Monday thereafter, except Monday, December 28th. Christmas, December 25th, falling on Sunday, Monday, the 26th, was the legal holiday under Laws 1892, c. 677, sec. 24. The newspaper was not published on that day by reason of its being a holiday. The mistake was made in publishing the summons in that paper on Saturday, the 24th, instead of Tuesday, the 27th. Two publications were thus made in one week, and none at all in the following week. This mistake rendered the service of summons by publication insufficient. There was no legal service of the summons. The provision in the Code is definite, and must be complied with. Very likely it is not necessary that all the publications shall be made on any one day of the week, but there must be one in each seven days. The court therefore was correct in holding that there was no legal service of the summons upon the defendant in the appellant's action."

MATTER OF ESTATE OF MUNGER.

Iowa Supreme Court—January 15, 1916.

168 Iowa 372; 150 N. W. 447.

Executors and Administrators — Contracts — Compensation of Attorney.

The contract of an administratrix employing an attorney to prosecute an action, though approved ex parte by the judge or court, is of no validity as against those entitled to the estate.

[See note at end of this case.]

Implied Powers.

The powers and obligations of an executor or administrator are defined and limited by the will or statute, and he has no implied powers beyond those necessary to effectuate the powers expressly conferred.

Power to Charge Assets.

The rule that an administrator or executor is without power to impose a charge on the assets by any new and independent contract, unless expressly authorized by statute or will, even though for the benefit of the estate, applies to the employment of an attorney.

Allowance for Expenditures — Burden of Proof.

Under Code § 3415, entitling executors and administrators to compensation for all ordinary services and "such further allowances as are just and reasonable . . . for actual, necessary, and extraordinary expenses or services," allowances claimed thereunder must be specifically stated; there being no presumption that they are reasonable and just, but the burden being on the administrator.

Same.

Where a widow was administratrix, her claims for expenses in the employment of an attorney, stated as for "consultation with Mrs. A. on the death of her husband and in relation to estate matters," and another item relating to consultation with her and another person, without stating what it was about, did not on their face appear to involve matters necessarily of concern to the estate, and, the burden being on the administratrix to show that fact, the court did not err in rejecting such items.

Expenditure for Attorney's Fee — Reasonableness.

Where an administratrix, seeking to be compensated for money paid to an attorney, showed a contract employing the attorney to collect a claim for the death of the decedent, and agreeing to pay him one-third of the amount collected without suit, and in the event of suit one-half the amount collected, and that a suit begun was settled by payment of $199 funeral expenses and $1,875 as damages, and she claimed to have paid the attorney $937, but on objections waived offering any evidence, the court erred in allowing her more than one-third of the amount recovered.

[See generally, Ann. Cas. 1916B 263.]

Appeal from District Court, Polk county:
DE GRAFF, Judge.

[373] The administratrix of the estate of Travers D. Munger asked to be allowed certain attorney fees she had paid and that she be permitted to pay others and be directed to distribute the remaining funds of the estate. The guardian of deceased's minor children objected. On hearing, she was allowed the fees she had paid, denied permission to pay others, and ordered to distribute as prayed. Both guardian and administratrix appeal. MODIFIED.

H. L. Bump for appellant.
Strock & Wallace for appellee.

LADD, J.—Travers D. Munger, was killed in a collision on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad, September 10, 1912, leaving him surviving a widow, Ada K. Munger, the administratrix, and two minor children, by a former wife, Mary Munger, from whom he was divorced, August 23, 1912, the day of his second marriage, and who is guardian of the children. The administratrix entered into a contract with W. C. Strock "to take charge of the collection of the claim of first party against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company or others, arising out of the injury and death of the decedent, Travers D. Munger, said second party to have the exclusive charge of the settlement of litigating of said claim.

"In consideration of the services rendered and to be rendered herein, the first party agrees to pay to the second party a sum equal to one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of the amount collected, in the event such collection is without suit commenced, and, in the event of suit commenced, a sum equal to one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of the amount collected.

"It is agreed by and between the parties hereto that all the necessary costs incident to the preparation and trial shall be first paid from the amount realized on said claim.

[374] "Second party agrees for the above consideration to take charge of said claim and conduct same to determination in the Courts, if necessary."

This was duly signed by the parties and an ex parte order entered by the court being signed by a judge, directing the attorney to proceed to collect the damages by suit or otherwise according to the contract and approving the same. Suit was begun December 23, 1912, and on June 7, 1913, was settled by the payment of $199.65 funeral expenses, including the undertaker's charge, and $1,875.35 as damages. Of this, the administratrix claims to have paid the attorney $937.68, and she prayed that such payment be approved and that she be directed to pay $57.50 for services of such attorney rendered in connection with the administration of the estate. The guardian resisted by asserting that the order of the court approving the contract, being ex parte, was not binding on the estate or those entitled thereto, that the amount agreed upon and alleged to have been paid was excessive, unreasonable and unconscionable, and objection was made to payment for services incident to the administration because of no showing of services having been rendered and for that such services were not in behalf of the administratrix as such. A demurrer on the ground that the facts alleged in the resistance were not sufficient to obviate the contract as approved by the court was overruled and, the cause coming on for trial, the administratrix waived offering any evidence in support of her application. The guardian adduced the evidence of three witnesses and the administratrix called three in rebuttal. The decree denied payment of $57.50 because of the services not being rendered for the administratrix as such and "ordered that as to the Contract of Employment by the Administratrix of W. C. Strock to prosecute the claim of the Estate against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, and the Order authorizing and approving the same, which was entered on the 19th day of October, 1912, remain as it is entered, and not [375] be disturbed or modified. And Administratrix is allowed credits for fee paid to said W. C. Strock paid thereunder to wit: Nine Hundred Thirty-Seven and 50-100 Dollars ($937.50)."

I. In her resistance, the guardian asked that the order approving the contract "be set aside and cancelled and held for naught." Appellee seems to think this was essential to the consideration of the issue as to the reasonableness of the expenses incurred for services of counsel, and the language of the decree indicates that such may have been the view of the district court. The vice of such an order is that, without being effective other than as advisory to the administratrix individually, it may and often does serve the purpose of deceiving those entitled to an estate into believing that the compensation thereby approved has been adjudicated against them. The administratrix's contract employing Strock as attorney to prosecute the action, even though approved ex parte by the judge or court, was of no validity as against those entitled to the estate.

The powers, duties and obligations of the executor or administrator with respect to the estate are defined and limited by the will or statute. He has no implied powers beyond those necessary to effectuate the powers expressly conferred. In the absence of testamentary provisions to the contrary, he is entitled to the possession of all personal property of the estate in trust for the purpose of settling all contracts, claims and obligations of decedent. Without interest in the assets, he is without power of imposing a charge on them by any new and independent contract, unless expressly authorized by statute or will, even though it be for the benefit of the estate. Hayes v. Shirk, 167 Ind. 569, 78 N. E. 653; May v. May, 7 Fla. 207, 68 Am. Dec. 431; Pike v. Thomas, 62 Ark. 223, 35 S. W. 212, 54 Am. St. Rep. 292; Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 162, 5 Am. Dec. 83; Davis v. French, 20 Me. 21, 37 Am. Dec. 36; Smith v. Brennan, 62 Mich. 349, 28 N. W. 892, 4 Am. St. Rep. 867; Fletcher v. American Trust, etc. Co. 111 [376] Ga. 300, 36 S. E. 767, 78 Am. St. Rep. 164, 201, and notes in which cases are collected. And such is the rule with respect to the employment of an attorney in this state. Clark v. Sayre, 122 Ia. 591, 98 N. W. 484.

Of course, the executor or administrator may at his discretion contract with reference to necessary matters relating to the estate, but he does so on his personal responsibility, even though he may be entitled to be reimbursed out of the funds of the estate. Being without power as administrator to enter into a new or independent contract in behalf of the estate, such a contract, though possibly obligatory on her individually, was a mere nullity as against the estate and the order of court was ineffectual to vitalize it. Such was our conclusion in Rickel v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 112 Ia. 148, 83 N. W. 957. The order should have been disregarded and the contract accorded consideration only as showing the employment of counsel by the administratrix individually, and this on terms that compensation should be contingent on recovery.

II. Section 3415 of the Code specifies precisely the compensation an executor or administrator shall receive "for all the ordinary services" rendered by them. In addition thereto, "such further allowances as are just and reasonable may be made by the court for actual, necessary and extraordinary expenses or services." When allowances of this character are claimed, these should be specifically stated to the end that the court may know the services for which compensation is sought. In re Carmody, 163 Ia. 463, 145 N. W. 16. The bare fact that the executor or administrator has expended money for legal services for which he requests reimbursement alone does not entitle him thereto. Nor is it enough that he may have acted in good faith in the employment of counsel. The expense incurred must appear to have been "reasonable and just." There is no presumption that they are such and as the executor or administrator is likely [377] to be more familiar therewith than those taking exception thereto, the burden of proof is upon him, whenever the right to such allowances is put in issue by objections interposed, to show that the expenses incurred, as in employing counsel, were necessary for the protection of the estate and also were reasonable and just. St. John v. McKee, 2 Dem. (N. Y.) 236; Munden v. Bailey, 70 Ala. 63, 70. Only reasonable compensation for the services rendered will be allowed in accounting with the administrator or executor, regardless of what he may have paid. Moore's Estate, 72 Cal. 335, 13 Pac. 880; Fairbairn v. Fisher, 58 N. C. 385; Porche v. Creditors of Succession of Banks, 8 La. Ann. 65; Macarty's Succession, 3 La. Ann. 517; Thomas v. Moore, 52 Ohio St. 200, 39 N. E. 803; Filbeck v. Davies, 8 Colo. App. 320, 46 Pac. 214.

III. The items making up the claim for $57.50 were specifically stated, but many of them on their face did not appear to involve matters necessarily of concern to the estate and none were self-explanatory. To illustrate, the first was for "consultation with Mrs. Ada Munger on the death of her husband and in relation to estate matters." She had not been appointed administratrix and for all that appears, the consultation may have pertained to her individual interests only. The next item relates to consultation with her and a Mr. Sinon, but about what? Therein is included the preparation of petition for letters of administration and a talk with counsel for the former administrator.

These and other items may have been sufficiently specific to meet the requirements of good bookkeeping, but did not of themselves indicate either their necessity to the estate or the reasonableness or justness of the charges. The burden was on the administratrix to so prove, and having failed to adduce any evidence thereon, the district court did not err in rejecting these items.

IV. The necessity of employing counsel to prosecute the claim for damages consequent on the wrongful death of decedent [378] was conceded, the only issue being reasonableness of the compensation to be allowed counsel. The record disclosed that an action was begun, issues joined and a settlement effected as previously stated. On hearing, the administratrix "waived offering any evidence in support of the application." The guardian objecting might very well have rested here, but she did not. She introduced the testimony of three attorneys, reciting to each the naked facts mentioned above, together with the terms of settlement, and that compensation was to be contingent on recovery in some amount, and eliciting the estimate of each as to reasonable value of the services rendered. The administratrix objected on the ground that the recital did not include the terms of the contract, the fact of its approval by the court and the latter had not been set aside.

Of course, these matters were immaterial, but the first witness was permitted to take them into consideration. His answer, however, was without reference thereto, as was that of each of the others, and each testified that reasonable compensation would be one-third of the amount recovered. The administratrix then called three witnesses in rebuttal, each of whom testified that the contract entered into was the usual contingent fee contract and two of them that it was fair and reasonable. On cross-examination, one of the witnesses, by including facts not appearing of record, thought one-half of the recovery reasonable. Such is the record, and we are of opinion that it discloses no controversy, but that one-third of the recovery would be reasonable compensation for the services actually rendered in the circumstances disclosed. It may be that such a contract is usual, but the matter for the court to determine was the reasonable value of the services actually rendered in behalf of the estate in view of the circumstance that compensation was contingent on success, regardless of other conditions of the agreement between counsel and client. The administratrix made no showing of what services were rendered save the bare recital [379] above or as to the reasonable value thereof except as stated, and we necessarily must rely on the proof thereon adduced by the objecting guardian. It follows that the court erred in allowing to the administratrix for services of counsel more than one-third of the amount recovered from the railroad company. With this modification, the order of the court will be affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

All the justices concur.

NOTE.

Power of Executor or Administrator to Employ Attorney under Express Contract as to Amount of Compensation.

General Rule.

An executor or administrator has no power to make a contract with an attorney, binding on the estate, for the transfer or conveyance of a certain interest in any of the assets of the estate, or for the payment of a contingent fee out of the assets of the estate, as compensation for his services in a suit against or on behalf of the estate. Tucker v. Grace, 61 Ark. 410, 33 S. W. 530; Pike v. Thomas, 62 Ark. 223, 35 S. W. 212, 54 Am. St. Rep. 292; Bryan v. Craig, 64 Ark. 438, 44 S. W. 348; Pike v. Thomas, 65 Ark. 437, 47 S. W. 110; In re Page, 57 Cal. 238; Lester v. Mathews, 56 Ga. 655; Richey v. Cleet, 46 Ind. App. 326, 92 N. E. 175; Rickel v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 112 Ia. 148, 83 N. W. 957; Macarty's Suc- cession, 3 La. Ann. 517; Platt v. Platt, 105 N. Y. 488, 12 N. E. 22. And see the reported case. See also Lusk v. Patterson, 2 Colo. App. 306, 30 Pac. 253.

"An administrator has no power to enlarge, by his contract, the liability of the estate that he represents. Whether he contracts as an administrator or not, it is his own undertaking, and not that of the decedent, and he incurs a personal liability. An attorney employed by the administrator of an estate has no claim against the estate, although his services may have inured to the benefit of the estate. He must look for compensation to the administrator who employed him." Tucker v. Grace, 61 Ark. 410, 33 S. W. 530. See to the same effect Pike v. Thomas, 62 Ark. 223, 35 S. W. 212, 54 Am. St. Rep. 292; 65 Ark. 437, 47 S. W. 110. In Rickel v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 112 Ia. 148, 83 N. W. 957, the court said: "It is the general holding that an estate cannot be bound by the contract of an executor or administrator, and that no action at law can be maintained against him thereon in his representative capacity. . . . While it is entirely proper to employ attorneys to counsel and assist in the settlement of an estate, 'the duty of compensating them rests primarily on the executor or administrator.' . . . Nor does the fact that the services are beneficial to the estate change the rule. . . . The compensation of an attorney cannot, therefore, be fixed as against the estate by an express contract with the administrator. Consequently the contract in this case, which provides for a contingent fee, cannot be enforced against the estate." To the same effect, see the reported case. In Matter of Meng, 96 Misc. 126, 159 N. Y. S. 535, it was said: "The executor claims on this accounting an allowance of $27,345.56—that is, 33½ per cent of the whole recovery—for the fees, disbursements, and expenses of his attorneys, who instituted the action and brought it to a successful issue. While no written contingent retainer agreement for a one-third is asserted to have been made by the executor, it is claimed on his behalf that immediately upon the death of his testator he employed these attorneys upon some such agreement. While contingent fees are not unusual in this jurisdiction yet in view of the position of the decedent and the amount of the recovery, it may be that 33½ per cent of the total amount recovered is more than should be allowed the executor for the reasonable expenses of the action—that is, for the services and time of the attorneys—unless the proof of the nature and amount of the services shows that this is a reasonable and proper amount to be allowed by the surrogate. In view of the amendment of 1911, providing that the surrogate has power to fix the reasonable amount of the expenses, the agreement of the executor with the attorneys who instituted and prosecuted the action ought not, I think, to control the surrogate, if, in his judgment, such amount is unreasonable. The executor cannot, I think, in law make an agreement for unreasonable compensation payable out of damages so as to bind the fund in court. The fact that the fee is contingent makes no difference." In Platt v. Platt, 105 N. Y. 488, 12 N. E. 22, the court said: "Before the executors were removed, they brought an action against George W. Platt, a brother of the testator, in the supreme court to set aside certain transfers and conveyances of property made to him by the testator and to recover from him certain claims and demands. While that action was pending the executors entered into a contract with William R. Martin, who was their attorney, by which it was agreed that in consideration of the services to be rendered by him in the action then pending and in such other actions and proceedings as might be brought against George W. Platt, he should have, as compensation for his services and expenditures, in addition to the costs and disbursements he should recover, an equal one-half of the whole recovery against George W. Platt; and to give effect to the agreement they assigned to him all the one equal half of all their claims and demands against Platt, and in any recovery that might be had against him. It is claimed by and on behalf of Martin's assignee that by virtue of that agreement he has a lien upon this fund which should be paid out of the same. His claim has been under adjudication so many times in the courts below, and has been so thoroughly considered by various judges, that a brief examination of it now is all that is needed. The executors under the will of the testator had no power to make the agreement with Martin and they could not create any lien upon the estate, or assign the same to him. They could bind themselves personally but not the estate which they represented."

In Macarty's Succession, 3 La. Ann. 517, it appeared that each of two executors selected his own attorney and contracted to pay him $3,000, it being understood that this fee was to be for the full compensation of the attorneys in conducting and finally winding up the succession, without regard to whether there should be any suits, and that the attorneys were to superintend personally the suits pending for and against the deceased. The court said: "It will be understood that we are not called upon to impugn the reasonableness of such a contract. That rests exclusively with those who made it, and it may be binding between the parties personally, and still not constitute a charge on the succession. Executors receive commissions, and in this case their compensation amounted to a large sum. If they choose to perform no duties, but to devolve the whole labor and responsibility of the administration upon attorneys, we know of no reasons why they should not pay them. But their neglect or choice creates no charge on the succession. We have to determine the value of the professional services for which the succession is bound on the facts before us. If the gentlemen have been retained in any suits left undetermined by the deceased, we see no reason why the succession should not pay them for their professional services; and it is to be understood that our adjudication relates only to the matters before us, to wit, the services up to the rendition of this judgment. The executors had a right to retain counsel to superintend suits; but we have no means of ascertaining the value of those services, and presume none of any consequence have been rendered up to the present time. As the matter is not fully before us, we will not, however, preclude the executors from hereafter establishing against the succession their claim for any amount lawfully paid for that purpose."

In Lester v. Mathews, 56 Ga. 655, it was held that a temporary administrator had no power to make, in connection with a part of the heirs or all of them, a contract with counsel to resist the probate of a will so as to bind the estate and compel the permanent administrator to pay the fee agreed on.

Qualification of Rule.

Since an executor or administrator has the power to employ an attorney and is entitled to be credited with the amount of a just and reasonable fee paid to an attorney employed by him (see 11 R. C. L. tit. Executors and Administrators, p. 233) his agreement for attorney's fees if fair and reasonable will ordinarily be taken as fixing the amount to be allowed, though it is not binding on the court and creates no charge against the estate. Filbeck v. Davies, 8 Colo. App. 320, 46 Pac. 214; MacKie v. Howland, 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 461; Stansell v. Lindsay, 50 Ga. 360; Pennebaker v. Williams, 136 Ky. 120, 120 S. W. 321, opinion modified 136 Ky. 143, 123 S. W. 672; Baldwin v. Barber, 148 Ky. 370, 146 S. W. 1124; Noel v. Harvey, 29 Miss. 72; Rapp v. Elgutter, 77 Neb. 574, 110 N. W. 661; In re Ullman, 31 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 370; Thompson v. Nowlin, 51 W. Va. 346, 41 S. E. 178. In Filbeck v. Davies, supra, it was said: "It may be laid down as a general proposition that administrators are entitled to proper credits in their account for all disbursements made in good faith on behalf of the estate in the course of the administration, whether they concern its necessary expenses, or what may be laid out in recovering assets. This proposition is accepted by all the authorities. The rule extends so far as to justify the representative in making contracts with counsel for fees contingent on the recovery of assets, and therefore estimated at a larger figure than would be proper where the compensation was certain and dependent on a contract which was enforceable in any event as against the representative. . . . This proposition is conceded by the attorneys for the appellee, with only the limitation that the power does not extend to the making of a special contract, or a contract for a contingent fee. We do not understand the rule to be subject to any such limitation, except as, of course, it must be always subject to the supervision and control of the court charged with the duty of passing on the accounts of personal representatives. As a general proposition, it is doubtless true the administrator is without the right to pay debts or disburse the funds of the estate, except upon allowance by the court, which must determine the manner and the extent of the payments as well as the distribution of the general funds to the heirs of the persons entitled. If the administrator pays out money without the direct authority of the court, the account is subject to examination, and it may be surcharged or falsified as circumstances may require or the court deems proper. We do not undertake to say what the general rule is with respect to accounts of this description, or whether the administratrix had a right to pay and present the account for allowance, or whether the account should have been first presented, and paid after allowance. In reality, it makes very little difference in the present case, for the result would be the same in either. Whichever course was pursued, the ultimate approval of the court must be obtained before the account is passed and allowed, and the administrator relieved from any further responsibility. When the administratrix took the responsibility of paying the bills, she likewise took chances on ultimate disapproval, if the court should disagree with her respecting the justness of the accounts paid. All we are called upon to determine is whether the accounts as presented were reasonable in their sums, calculated on a just basis, and should have been allowed as they were filed. This was the only question litigated. We cannot conclude otherwise. All agree the charges were less than the ordinary fees charged in such cases, and to this the trial court assented." In Noel v. Harvey, supra, the court said: "It is in the first place insisted that the executors improperly credited themselves with the sum of five thousand dollars paid to

William R. Miles for professional services rendered in a suit commenced in the superior court of chancery by Dulany in his lifetime, against John S. Gooch and others. It appears from the testimony that Prior Lea was originally retained as Dulany's counsel in the cause; that he removed from the state before the cause was prepared for trial: that it was pending in court at Dulany's death; that the executors, being wholly unacquainted with the facts of the case, and not knowing where the testimony could be obtained to sustain the bill, employed Mr. Miles at a contingent fee of five thousand dollars, he undertaking to take the testimony, to incur all the expenses necessary to take the same, and his fee to depend upon the result of the suit. It further appears that the amount in controversy was about $48,000; that the services were performed by Mr. Miles, and the case gained. It further appears that the contract was made in good faith. Under this state of facts, we are of opinion that the court below committed no error in allowing the credit. The only question in such case to be considered is, whether the services were necessary for the protection and interest of the estate, and whether the contract, under all the circumstances, was such as a prudent and cautious man would have entered into for himself. The proof brings the case within this rule." In Rapp v. Elgutter, supra, the court said: "And, while it is true that he was not authorized in his trust relations to bind the estate by an unreasonable contract for legal services, it is equally true that, in any one of them, he was entitled to a just and reasonable compensation for legal services procured for the benefit of the estate. So that the question of the legality or illegality of the contract at issue depended upon its being reasonable and beneficial to the estate. McCoy v. Lane, 66 Neb. 847, 92 N. W. 1010. The fact that an executor or administrator cannot bind the assets of his estate for the payment of an exorbitant or unreasonable fee for legal services does not prevent an attorney at law from binding himself in a reasonable and beneficial contract for services to be rendered in behalf of such executor or administrator. And we think that, in sound reasoning and good morals, an attorney, who has induced an administrator, executor, or guardian to employ him to represent the interests of an estate by the use of language that would reasonably lead such executor, administrator, or guardian to believe that such services would not exceed a sum named, is, and should be, estopped from demanding of the estate a greater sum than that suggested as an inducement to his employment."

In several instances the courts have allowed executors and administrators credit for the payment of an attorney's fee of a percentage ranging from one-half to one-third of the recovery in the event of his conducting suits for the estate successfully, without passing on the power of the executor or administrator to employ him under such a contract. In re McFarland, 4 Pa. St. 149; In re Shoenberger, 211 Pa. St. 99, 60 Atl. 502; Baker v. Baker, 87 Va. 180, 12 S. E. 346. See also Leahart v. Deedmeyer, 158 Ala. 295, 48 So. 371.

In James v. Turner, 78 Tex. 241, 14 S. W. 574, it was held that a surviving wife who qualified to administer the community estate of her deceased husband and herself, had the power to employ an attorney to collect a claim due the estate on a contingent fee of one-half the sum which might be collected. The court said: "The court below held that as qualified survivor Mrs. Boone had authority to make the contract with appellant and that he would not review her action. We are of opinion that after having qualified as survivor to administer the community estate of her deceased husband and herself that she had the power to make the contract sued upon and thereby to bind the estate, and that the limitation as to the reasonableness of the compensation agreed to be paid which would apply in case of a contract made by an ordinary administrator does not apply. There is no pretense that the contract was brought about by fraud nor that the survivor was not acting in the utmost good faith in making it. The court found that the claim to which the contract related was one doubtful when the contract was made, and there was much evidence tending to show that the compensation agreed to be paid to appellee, contingent on recovery as it was, was not unreasonable. That a suit on the claim was proper and necessary is shown by the fact that the only responsible defendant refused to pay without suit, and resisted payment until the affirmance of the judgment against him by this court, and by the further fact that the final judgment evidences that the claim was one which it was the duty of Mrs. Boone as the representative of the community estate to enforce. The power possessed by a surviving husband or wife who qualifies to administer a community estate is much broader than that possessed by an ordinary administrator, and what such a survivor may legally do in the exercise of that power will bind the estate. If such a survivor should fraudulently or in bad faith make contracts binding on the estate, some question might arise as to the liability of such a survivor to account to others interested in the estate for money diverted by such a contract, but other parties to such contracts not affected by such fraud or bad faith would be entitled to protection. The estate represented by appellant received the services rendered by appellee in pursuance of a contract made with Mrs. Boone which she had lawful power to make, and we see no good reason why it should not be held bound to comply with that contract."

v.

SCHEUERMAN.

Canada Supreme Court—February 1, 1916.

52 Can. Sup. Ct. 625.

Trusts — Resulting Trust — Purchase by Husband in Name of Wife — Intent to Defraud Creditors.

Equity will not decree a resulting trust in favor of a husband with respect to property purchased by him in the name of his wife when his purpose in thus taking the title was to hinder and delay his creditors.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court of Alberta.

Action by John Scheuerman, plaintiff, against Anna Scheuerman, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court: SCOTT, Judge. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court on equal division of opinion among judges. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinions. REVERSED.

F. Ford, K. C., for appellant.

O. M. Biggar, K. C., for respondent.

Emery, Newell, Ford, Botton & Mount, solicitors for appellant.

Short, Cross, Biggar, Sherry & Field, solicitors for respondent.

[626] THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—I think the appeal should be allowed.

The trial judge has found that the evidence does not establish a valid agreement between the parties for the reconveyance of the property to the respondent. The respondent in such a case as this can, of course, ask nothing from the court but his strict rights. There seems to me nothing necessarily inconsistent between the idea of his making an absolute gift to his wife and the fact of his having given her the property to keep it from his creditors. The appellant says that the reason for the gift was "because he lose it anyhow." I think that, as between themselves, the presumption of law that the gift to the wife was an absolute one is not rebutted.

But if it were necessary to hold that there was a resulting trust, in favour of the respondent, I do not think he is in a position to ask the court to enforce it. He can only make out his case by alleging his own unlawful intentions in making the conveyance to his wife.

[627] In the case of Muckleston v. Brown, 6 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 52, at page 68, the Lord Chancellor said:—

"Cottington v. Fletcher, 2 Atk. (Eng.) 155, does not affect this case. That case was upon the grant of an advowson contrary to the policy of the law, by a Roman catholic in trust for himself. Afterwards he turns protestant; and desires a discovery as to his own act. The defendant put in a plea of the Statute of Frauds; but by answer admitted the trust. Lord Hardwicke is made to say, that upon the admission he would act. I do not know whether he did act upon it; but it is questionable whether he should; for there is a great difference between the case of an heir coming to be relieved against the act of his ancestor, in fraud of the law, and of a man coming upon his own act under such circumstances.

"It is there said it might be different if it had come on upon demurrer. The reason given is that, as this assignment was done in fraud of the law, and merely in order to evade the statutes, it was doubtful whether at the hearing the plaintiff could be relieved. Lord Hardwicke means to say that, if the defendant admits the trust, though against the policy of the law, he would relieve, but if he does not admit the trust, but demurs, he would do what does not apply in the least to this case. The plaintiff stating he had been guilty of a fraud upon the law to evade, to disappoint, the provision of the legislature, to which he is bound to submit, and coming to equity to be relieved against his own act, and the defence being dishonest, between the two species of dishonesty the court would not act; but would say, 'Let the estate lie, where it falls.' That is not this case."

It will be observed that the Lord Chancellor considered it questionable whether the plaintiff ought to have relief even in a case where the defendant admits the trust. In the present case the appellant has denied the trust.

I am prepared to hold that a plaintiff is not entitled to come into court and ask to be relieved of the consequences of his actions done with intent to violate the law, and that though they did not and even could not succeed in such purpose.

I think the maxim quoted by Lord Eldon applies [628] in this case and that the court should say "Let the estate lie, where it falls."

IDDINGTON, J.—The respondent, as plaintiff, alleges in his statement of claim that the defendant, now appellant, who is his wife, was the registered owner of lands described therein but held the same as trustee for him, the plaintiff.

He proceeds in said statement of claim to allege that she, in breach of her said trust, sold the lands and he seeks a declaration of the trust and judgment for the part of the purchase-money she got and other relief.

The lands I will assume, as the learned trial judge has found as a fact, were bought with respondent's money, but the conveyance taken to the appellant when his wife.

Under such a naked state of facts the presumption of law would be that she received same by way of advancement. In short she, in law, thereby became the owner unless proven by other facts she was a trustee.

There was no writing or other evidence of a legal trust upon which he could rely. Therefore, he was of necessity, in order to establish his claim that she was his trustee, driven to prove that he had procured the conveyance to be made to his wife lest a creditor or creditors should reach the land if in his name and that the like reason had obtained for the vesting in her of other property out of the proceeds of the sale of which the land in question was paid for or improved.

Many authorities have been cited which I have, in deference to the argument and divided opinions below, [629] fully considered. But from none of them can I extract authority for the proposition of law that when a man has, out of the sheer necessity to prove anything upon which he can hope to rest the alleged claim of trust, to tell of an illegal purpose as the very basis of his claim, that he may yet be entitled to succeed. I find cases where the man has, accidentally as it were, or incidentally, to the relation of his story told that which he might if skillfully directed both in pleading and in giving evidence have avoided telling, yet has told enough to disclose that he was far from being always guided by the law or morality in his intentions, and still entitled to succeed because he had in fact established, by the untainted part of his story as it were, enough to entitle him to succeed without reliance upon that which was either illegal or immoral.

This is not respondent's case, but the other kind of case I have just referred to is.

Out of the many cases on the subject Taylor v. Chester, L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 309, furnishes the law applicable to this case, and the case of Taylor v. Bowers, 1 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 291, furnishes an apt illustration of the other kind of case.

In this latter all Taylor need have done was to prove that the goods in question were his and they were found in the possession of the defendant who had never bought them or acquired any honest title thereto.

The plaintiff there had never executed the intended assignment in fraud of creditors or any other and if the defendant had set up the facts he relied upon his defence would have been held illegal. That [630] much is got from an examination of the facts noted and judgments in the case and especially from those in appeal.

The more recent case of Kearley v. Thomson, 24 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 742, shews some things said by even eminent authority in the case I have just referred to may not be law.

Had the conveyance been made to a stranger, under such facts and circumstances as might have enabled the respondent to present and rely upon the naked fact of his purchase and payment of the price as producing a resulting trust which the law would imply, the respondent might thereby have escaped telling of his own illegal purpose and succeeded. Here he has to tell the facts disclosing the illegal purpose as his chief, and indeed only, motive for constituting the trust he claims to have existed, and rely thereon, and cannot, as I view the law, successfully do so.

The cases of Sims v. Thomas, 12 Ad. & El. 536, 40 E. C. L. 117, and Symes v. Hughes L. R. 9 Eq. (Eng.) 475, certainly fall far short of covering this. The real question of law involved and decided in the former was the non-exigibility of the asset in question and the right to sue in such case upon the bond in question despite the provision of an insolvency Act not framed to reach it.

The latter case certainly is not to be extended and it needs extension to cover this case even if binding us, as it does not.

All that was argued and well presented as to the operation of the "Exemptions Ordinance" seems, from my view of the law, as applicable to the facts herein [631] irrelevant. On the law and facts the property was hers and the exemption relative thereto hers also.

The appeal should be allowed with costs throughout, and the action dismissed with costs.

DUFF, J.—In 1908, the respondent, who was the husband of the appellant, purchased land in Edmonton for which he agreed to pay $700. Shortly afterwards he built a house at a cost of $600 and, from that time until 1912, the appellant and the respondent occupied the property as their home with their children. On the completion of the purchase, in 1907, the transfer was taken in the name of the appellant and, in 1912, during the respondent's absence in the United States the appellant sold the property at the price of $3,500; $2,000 having been paid in cash and the respondent, on discovering the sale, brought the action out of which this appeal arises claiming the property was his and consequently the residue of the purchase price, $1,500 still in the vendee's hands.

The respondent puts his case in this way. He says that the purchase money was paid by him under the agreement of 1907; that the house was built partly by his own labour and partly by labour and materials provided by him; that the transfer was taken to his wife by arrangement between them, the effect of which was that she should hold the property as trustee for him.

On behalf of the appellant it is not disputed that she was to hold the property as trustee for the respondent; but it is said that the explicit arrangement was that the property was to be held by her until a certain debt for the payment of which the respondent was then being pressed had been discharged [632] and that the intention of both parties in making the transfer to the wife instead of to the husband was to conceal the fact that the husband was the owner and in that way to protect the property from proceedings by a creditor who, at the time the transfer was taken, had recovered judgment.

The appellant denies that the property was paid for with the respondent's money, but on that point the finding is against the appellant and this appeal must, I think, be decided on the footing that the finding is right.

It is not, I think, seriously open to question that the respondent could only succeed by producing evidence shewing that in directing the transfer to be made to his wife an advancement to her was not intended and the evidence which establishes this is precisely the evidence which shews that the title vested in the wife was intended as a cloak to protect the property from the creditor mentioned. The respondent's case, therefore, rests upon a transaction which if it had in fact the effect contemplated, namely, of delaying or hindering the creditor, would undoubtedly be a transfer void under the Statute of Elizabeth at the instance of the creditor; and in that case the respondent must obviously fail on the principle that a plaintiff cannot recover who is obliged to make out his case through the medium and by the aid of an illegal transaction to which he was himself a party. Taylor v. Chester, L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 309, at p. 314.

The respondent, however, has succeeded, the Appellate Division of Alberta being equally divided on the ground that the rule has no application where [633] nothing has been done in execution of the unlawful purpose beyond payment or delivery of the property itself and that in point of fact the creditor whose debt has since been paid was not defeated, hindered or delayed. By the law of Alberta a house and building occupied by an execution debtor and the lot or lots on which they are situate are exempt from execution to the extent of $1,500. The view which has prevailed is that the evidence appearing to shew the property to have been of no greater value than $1,500, at the time the transfer was taken, the transaction could not be a fraudulent one and impeachable as such under the Statute of Elizabeth because of the well settled rule that the statute only applies to dealings with property which creditors are entitled by law to have applied in the payment of their claims.

The judgment of Lord Justice Mellish concurred in by Lord Justice Baggallay in Taylor v. Bowers, 1 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 291, is relied upon as establishing the proposition that the general principle gives to persons making a payment or delivering goods for an illegal purpose a locus poenitentiae so long as no part of the illegal purpose has been carried out, and that so long as that has not happened the restitution of the property transferred under such an agreement as that disclosed by the evidence in this case can be enforced. Taylor v. Bowers, 1 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 291, was in point of fact not decided upon the principle invoked, Lord Justice James proceeding upon the ground that it was the defendant in that case who was obliged to set up the illegal transaction in order to justify his possession of the goods. Two very eminent judges, however, Lord Justice [634] Mellish and Lord Justice Baggallay do seem to have put their judgment upon the ground that where goods are delivered under a fictitious assignment, the object of which is to defraud creditors, the delivery and assignment of the goods are not to be regarded as execution in part of the illegal purpose so long as no creditor is in fact prejudiced. It has been seriously doubted whether the general principle stated by Lord Justice Mellish in his judgment was correctly applied to the facts of that case; and the subsequent decisions of Kearley v. Thomson, 24 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 742, and Herman v. Jeuchner, 15 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 561, afford considerable justification for such doubts.

I do not find it necessary for the purpose of deciding this appeal to pass upon the question whether a proper application of the principle stated above to the facts of this case would be to hold that no part of the illegal purpose had been carried out notwithstanding the fact that the conveyance had been taken in the name of the wife. This case must, I think, be approached from a slightly different point of view. The object, as I have said, of taking the transfer in the name of the wife was that her ex facie title should protect the property from pursuit by the husband's creditor, the design being that so long as the debt remained unpaid she should hold the title. Whether or not they had in mind a possible advance in value the scheme necessarily involved the hindering of the creditor in the exercise of his rights in the event of the value of the property reaching a point at which the surplus would become properly exigible. We know that, in 1912, the property had acquired a value of $3,500. It is conceded apparently that some time [635] before the trial the debt was paid; when, does not appear. If any part of the debt was still unpaid after the value of the property rose beyond $1,500 the presumption would be that the creditor was prejudiced. In these circumstances it is impossible to say that the creditor was not prejudiced. Indeed, having regard to the fact that the respondent must have known the precise date when the debt was paid and offered no information about it there is some presumption of fact the other way. The conclusion I have come to, however, is this: Accepting the rule in the form in which it is stated in Symes v. Hughes, L. R. 9 Eq. (Eng.) 475, and Taylor v. Bowers, 1 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 291, I think the onus in the circumstances of this case was on the respondent to shew that the creditor had not been delayed.

It is true that as the respondent in this case does not ask to recover back the property on the ground only that it was property transferred for an illegal purpose which has not been carried out his position is not entirely the same as the position of the plaintiffs referred to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Scott. His case may be put in the alternative. First, the transfer was taken in the name of the appellant, the consideration having been paid, the presumption of advancement is rebutted by the evidence of the agreement between the husband and wife that the property was to be held for the husband for the purpose of protecting him against a creditor. In point of law he rests upon the position that the wife is trustee for him by reason of the fact that the purchase money was paid by him. But while that is his legal position he is obliged, in order to make out that case, to prove [636] an agreement fraudulent in the purpose under which the transfer was taken, which agreement he does not shew that he repudiated before part of its purpose took effect in the delaying of his creditor.

Secondly. He may allege an express trust arising out of the oral agreement that the property was to be held for him with the object stated. The breach of this express trust, the failure on the part of the wife to carry out the agreement under which she acquired the property being treated in equity as a fraud, constitutes the wife trustee ex maleficio, a trustee, that is to say, who is not entitled to invoke the Statute of Frauds as a protection against her own fraud. Rochefoucauld v. Boustead [1897] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 196. The respondent does not (be it observed with reference to an argument of Mr. Ford) in this way of putting his case seek to enforce the express oral trust, although the result in this particular case might be the same in the event of success as if he had succeeded in enforcing the express trust. The respondent's right and remedy would have been precisely the same if the arrangement had been that the wife instead of holding the property in trust for him had bound herself to hold it in trust for a third person, orally; to any proceeding by such third person as cestui que trust for the enforcement of the express oral trust the 7th section of the Statute of Frauds would have been an effectual answer, but there is no answer to an action on the part of the respondent for restitutio in integrum on the ground that the wife's fraudulent refusal to effectuate the express trust under which she acquired the property constitutes her a trustee for the person from whom she [637] received it. Put in this way, nevertheless, the respondent's case still necessarily rests upon an arrangement which when it is fully disclosed appears to be a fraudulent arrangement, and that arrangement the respondent has not shewn to have failed in effectuating its purpose.

In the result the appeal should be allowed and the action dismissed.

ANGLIN, J. (dissenting).—The plaintiff sues to recover from his wife the proceeds of property admittedly placed in her name with the intent that it should be held by her in order to defeat the claim of one of his creditors. When placed in the name of the defendant the property was occupied by the husband and family and was not worth more than $1,500. It was, therefore, exempt from execution under sub-section 10 of section 2 of chapter 27 of the "North-West Territories Consolidated Ordinances, 1898."

In answer to the plaintiff's claim the defendant sets up:—

(a) That the purchase money of the property in question was wholly or in great part hers;

(b) That the property subsequently ceased to be occupied by the plaintiff and became worth more than $1,500 and the surplus would then have been exigible.

(c) That the plaintiff's admitted fraudulent intent debars his recovery;

(d) That the plaintiff, in order to succeed, is obliged to establish an express trust which section 7 of the Statute of Frauds renders incapable of proof by parol evidence.

The learned trial judge found explicitly that the [638] purchase money all belonged to the plaintiff. He saw the plaintiff in the witness box and believed his story as against that of the defendant whose evidence was taken on commission. This finding was not disturbed on appeal and we are not in a position to say that it is wrong and that the defendant should have been believed rather than the plaintiff.

It is the value and condition of the property at the date of the transfer which must determine its exigibility. To hold that a subsequent change in occupation or increase in value should be taken into account would introduce an element quite too speculative, would unsettle titles and would defeat the purpose of the statute. Sims v. Thomas, 12 Ad. & El. 536, 40 E. C. L. 117; Willoughby v. Pope, 101 Miss. 808, 58 So. 705.

The law condemns and penalizes the fraudulent act, not the fraudulent intent. The act must be one which at least may be injurious to persons whom the law protects against it. In Mundell v. Tinkis, 6 Ont. 625, the transfer dealt with was of this character. However wrongful the intent with which it is done, an act in se lawfully subjects the person who commits it neither to criminal nor to civil responsibility. The transfer by a debtor of property exempt from seizure is lawful and cannot harm his creditor and, therefore, cannot be fraudulent against him. Mathews v. Feaver, 1 Cox Ch. (Eng.) 278; Story's Equity, sec. 367; Rider v. Kidder, 10 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 360; Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 254, at p. 726. However evil the mind and intent of such a debtor may be, he is amenable only in foro conscientiae. The plaintiff's intent [639] was fraudulent; his act was not. Day v. Day, 17 Ont. App. 157, at pp. 166, 167, 172; Symes v. Hughes, L. R. 9 Eq. (Eng.) 475; Taylor v. Bowers, 1 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 291; Cloud v. Meyers, 136 Ill. App. 45; Palmer v. Bray, 136 Mich. 85, 98 N. W. 849; 20 Cyc. pages 381-4.

Were it not for the presumption of an intention to make a gift by way of an advancement, which ordinarily arises where property belonging to a husband is without consideration transferred to or placed in the name of a wife, proof of the absence of consideration would establish a resulting trust in favour of the plaintiff. The presumption of advancement is, however, readily rebuttable, the sole question being the intent with which the transaction took place (Marshal v. Crutwell, L. R. 20 Eq. (Eng.) 328; In re Young, 28 Ch. D. (Eng.) 705), and but for the objection to its admissibility, based on section 7 of the Statute of Frauds, the evidence of the understanding of both husband and wife that the latter should hold as trustee for the former would clearly establish such a trust. That objection cannot prevail, for equity deems it a fraud on the part of a trustee to attempt to withhold trust property from his cestui que trust for his own benefit, and will not permit the statute to be made the instrument for committing such a fraud. McCormick v. Grogan, L. R. 4 H. L. (Eng.) 82, at p. 97 per Lord Westbury; Roche-foucauld v. Boustead [1897] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 196; In re Marlborough; Davis v. Whitehead [1894] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 133; Haigh v. Kaye, 7 Ch. App. (Eng.) 469; Davies v. Otty, 35 Beav. (Eng.) 208.

I am for these reasons of the opinion that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

[640] BRODEUR, J.—The main point to be decided in this case is whether the property in question having been transferred to the appellant for a fraudulent purpose, the respondent could recover that property.

The plaintiff and the defendant are husband and wife.

The husband was very heavily indebted. He owned a homestead for which he had agreed to pay a little over $1,000, and which according to the laws of Alberta was exempt from seizure to the extent of $1,500.

In order to prevent his creditors from seizing that homestead and in order to defeat them the husband (the plaintiff respondent) had that property conveyed to his wife, the appellant.

The husband seeks to recover the property and claims that the wife was holding it as trustee for him.

In order to enable him to recover he had to give evidence of the fraudulent scheme; otherwise the wife would have been presumed to have received an advancement. They both admit that the transfer was made for the purpose of defeating creditors. So the presumption of advancement was successfully rebutted provided it involves no other illegality.

But the Statute of Frauds is pleaded by the wife who claims that the husband will have to adduce written evidence of the alleged trust.

The Statute of Frauds was not made to cover fraud; it does not prevent the proof of a fraud.

It is a fraud on the part of a person to whom land is conveyed as trustee to deny the trust and claim the land herself. It is competent to prove by parol evidence that the property was conveyed upon trust for the plaintiff and that the wife is denying the [641] trust and relying upon the form of conveyance in order to keep the land herself. Roche-foucauld v. Boustead [1897] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 206.

The question then is whether the plaintiff can invoke his own fraudulent intent to recover the property from his wife.

In general principle fraud vitiates all contracts. The courts never assist a person who has placed his property in the name of another to defraud his creditors, and some decisions go so far as to state that it is of no consequence whether any creditor has been actually defeated or delayed.

Mundell v. Tinkis, 6 Ont. 625; Rosenburgher v. Thomas, in 1852, 3 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 635; Kearley v. Thomson, in 1890, 24 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 742.

In the case of a trust the same principle applies and the settlor is prevented from recovering the estate if the trust has been created for a fraudulent purpose. Lewin on Trusts (12 ed.) p. 120.

But the trial judge relying on the case of Symes v. Hughes, L. R. 9 Eq. (Eng.) 475, says that, where the purpose is not carried into execution, the mere intention to effect an illegal object does not deprive the assignor from recovering the property from the assignee and he says also that it was not necessary, in the present case, for the husband to have the property conveyed to his wife at the time in order to protect the lands in question against his creditors because they were exempt from seizure.

By the exemption ordinance, which I have already mentioned, the homestead was exempt from seizure if [642] it did not exceed in value $1,500. We have no positive evidence as to the value of the property at the time it was conveyed to the wife; but we have the evidence that, a short time after, the property was sold for a much larger price. The intent of the husband, then, was to defeat the creditors when the property would become of a value sufficient to become liable to seizure.

Cases of the same kind with regard to homesteads have been decided in the United States. I find a case of Kettleschlager v. Ferriek, 12 S. D. 455, 81 N. W. 889, 76 Am. St. Rep. 623, where it was held that a transfer of the homestead from husband to wife without consideration to prevent creditors from subjecting such premises to the satisfaction of their claims in case the debtor should remove therefrom is fraudulent as to creditors.

Similar decisions have been rendered in Texas: Taylor v. Ferguson, 20 S. W. 46; Baines v. Baker, 60 Tex. 139.

We have also Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367, which was decided in the Wisconsin courts.

The plaintiff in having the homestead conveyed to his wife never ceased to be the real owner of the property. If the property had remained in his hands it could have been seized by his creditors for the payment of his debts. During all the time his wife was in possession of that property, the creditors, if it was a homestead exceeding in value $1,500, could claim the payment of their debt upon the property.

The courts should never help any person who has acted with a fraudulent intent, and the same rule should apply whether a transfer is made for the purpose of defeating subsequent creditors or when it is [643] made with the purpose of defeating existing creditors who may exercise their right upon the increased value of the property.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff cannot recover the property from his wife and that his action should have been dismissed.

The appeal is allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that where a husband, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, purchases property in the name of his wife, equity will not aid him by declaring that she holds it subject to a resulting trust in his favor. Whether a resulting trust arises from a purchase by a husband in the name of his wife is discussed, with special reference to the effect of a design to defraud creditors, in the note to Ferguson v. Booth, Ann. Cas. 1915C 1079. As to whether equity will aid a grantor to recover property conveyed in fraud of creditors, see the note to Jayne v. Jayne, Ann. Cas. 1913E 540.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Butler county: ATRES, Judge.

Action by Mattie Marney, plaintiff, against J. D. Joseph, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

C. L. Aikman for appellant.

W. H. Von der Heiden, A. E. Morgan, George J. Benson and T. A. Kramer for appellee.

[18] JOHNSTON, C. J.—Mattie Marney brought this action against J. D. Joseph to recover damages resulting from an alleged libel. In her petition she set forth a number of written statements made and published by the defendant imputing misconduct, fraud and crime [19] the defendant then answered, admitting the writing to her. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and publication of the alleged libels and averring that his statements were true. He also alleged that the statements were written in good faith and were such as are privileged under the law. Plaintiff demurred to the answer, claiming that it failed to state a defense, and upon this demurrer the court determined that it should be carried back to the petition, and upon a reconsideration of the averments of the petition decided that a cause of action against the defendant was not alleged and accordingly gave judgment for defendant.

The fact that the court had previously overruled the demurrer to plaintiff's petition did not preclude a re-examination of its averments upon the demurrer to defendant's answer. It was competent for the court to carry the demurrer back to the petition, thus searching the entire record, and to decide whether or not the averments of the petition, supplemented as they may have been by admissions recited in the answer, stated a cause of action. There is a contention that plaintiff by her demurrer to the answer admitted the averments contained in it to be true, and that these admissions should be held to qualify the averments of the petition, and that so regarded the petition failed to state a cause of action. Ordinarily a demurrer admits the facts stated in the pleading to which it is addressed, and while it is true that the sufficiency of the petition may be tested on a demurrer to an answer and that in testing it any defects in the petition may be regarded as cured by admissions made in the answer (Sill v. Sill, 31 Kan. 248, 1 Pac. 556), yet on such consideration the averments of the petition cannot be regarded to be overturned and destroyed by inconsistent and contradictory averments in the answer. The demurrer does not admit allegations of the answer which are contradictory to the averments in the petition. (6 Standard Proc. 952.) In passing upon the sufficiency [20] of the petition the court could not regard the averments in the answer which were wholly antagonistic to those of the petition, to the effect that the charges of misconduct and crime made against plaintiff were true, nor that any other of the averments in the answer which were inconsistent with or contradictory to the allegations of the petition were admitted.

We still have the question whether a cause of action is stated in the petition. The contention of the defendant is that the defamatory communications, about the writing and publication of which there is no dispute, are privileged. As the statements imputed to the plaintiff were those which rendered her liable to punishment and were calculated to make her odious and infamous, they were deemed to be actionable and malicious, unless they come within the exception of privileged communications. This exception includes what are termed absolute and qualified privileges. It is first contended that the defamatory statements in question belong in the class called absolute privilege. This privilege is founded on public policy and provides immunity for those engaged in the public service and in the enactment and administration of law. It is not intended so much for the protection of those engaged in that service as it is for the promotion of the public welfare, the purpose being that members of the legislature, judges of courts, jurors, lawyers and witnesses may speak their minds freely and exercise their respective functions without incurring the risk of a criminal prosecution or an action for recovery of damages. The statements in question, as we have seen, were not made in any judicial proceeding nor did the occasion bring them within the rule of absolute privilege. (Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge No. 32, 26 Kan. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 316; Redgate v. Roush, 61 Kan. 480, 59 Pac. 1050, 48 L.R.A. 236; Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 130 Am. St. Rep. 390, 98 Pac. 281, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 361; Note, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 163.) True, the defendant was a guardian of the insane man and his duty required him to protect the [21] estate of his ward, but it did not require him to write and publish charges of misconduct, immorality and crime against those who claimed an interest in the estate of his ward nor those who contemplated the presentation of a claim against it. His statements, as will be observed, were not made to the probate or any other court in any judicial proceeding, but were voluntarily written to relatives of his ward, and some of the statements could not have had any relevancy to any duty owed to the ward. Even if the defamatory statements had been made in a pleading or proceeding in court, they must have been pertinent to the subject of inquiry in order to come within the rule of absolute privilege. (Townsend on Slander and Libel, 4th ed. § 222; Newell, Slander and Libel, 3d ed. §§ 518, 519.)

It is next contended that the communications come within the class of qualified or conditional privilege. Where a confidential relationship exists between parties so as to put upon one making the communication the duty of protecting the interests of others, and a statement containing no impertinent or unnecessary libelous matter is made in good faith and in the belief that it comes within the discharge of his duty, it may be within the rule of qualified or conditional privilege. In such a case the protection of privilege is not extended to defamatory statements made with bad intent. A confidential relation cannot be used by a party to give expression to his personal spite or ill will, nor can he use the occasion as a cloak to indulge in a malicious publication of an unfounded charge of dishonesty and crime. If he publishes the statement not in the bona fide performance of a duty but in furtherance of a malignant design, the conditional privilege is destroyed. (Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge No. 32, supra; Redgate v. Roush, supra; Coleman v. MacLennan, supra; Richardson v. Gunby, 88 Kan. 47, 127 Pac. 533, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 520; Newell, Slander and Libel, 3d ed. § 568 et seq.) In the plaintiff's petition it is expressly [22] alleged that the defamatory statements were not written or published in good faith, but that in writing and publishing them the defendant was actuated by a malicious purpose, and hence it must be held that the petition did state a good cause of action against the defendant. While it will devolve upon the plaintiff to prove the malice alleged in order to overcome the privilege claimed, still the questions of the good faith of defendant in an effort to perform a duty owed by him to the family of his ward, his belief in the truth of the defamatory statements, and whether they were made with actual malice, are all for the determination of a jury upon the proof that may be produced. (Richardson v. Gunby, supra.)

The ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer to plaintiff's petition cannot be upheld, and hence its judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

NOTE.

Statement by Fiduciary with Respect to Subject-matter of Trust as Privileged within Law of Libel and Slander.

In the reported case the court says that while a guardian of an insane person is required to protect the estate of his ward no requirement is placed on him to write and publish charges of misconduct, immorality and crime against anyone who may claim an interest in the estate. False statements of such kind do not come within the rule of absolute privilege and when written and published in bad faith and for a malicious purpose are not conditionally privileged. In Rielle v. Benning, 4 Montreal Super. Ct. 219, 11 Montreal L. N. 415, it was held that executors were personally liable for libels published by them in that capacity.

But in Kemper v. Fort, 219 Pa. St. 85, 12 Ann. Cas. 1022, 67 Atl. 991, 123 Am. St. Rep. 623, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 820, it was held that an action for libel for matter set up in an answer to a petition for a review of their accounts could not be maintained against executors of an estate, the privilege invoked being apparently that which attaches to proceedings in court. In that case it appeared that a guardian filed a petition for a review of the accounts of the executors and to set aside a sale by them. The executors having received information that the ward was illegitimate and hence without interest in the estate so alleged in their answer. Affirming a judgment on a verdict directed for the defendants the court said: "In the present case the averment of illegitimacy was clearly pertinent. The testator, Thomas W. Price, directed that upon the death of his daughter the income for awhile, and ultimately the principal, should go to her 'issue,' to her 'children.' That under the common law these words mean legitimate issue and children cannot be questioned, and the testator is presumed to have so used them: . . . The averments of illegitimacy would not be pertinent if the question was as to the right of Jesse C. Claggett to take or inherit from his mother, for under the Act of 1855 illegitimates take from their mothers; but appellant's children will take nothing from her under the will of her father. They take under it directly from him and, when he designated the issue or children of his daughter as his legatees, he must be understood as having meant legitimate issue or children. When notified by Thomas Claggett that the right of Jesse C. Claggett to participate in the estate of the father of the appellant was questioned, the appellee properly questioned it in the answers filed. The assignments of error are all overruled and the judgment is affirmed."

v.

PECK.

IN RE PECK.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—July 13, 1914.

88 Conn. 447; 91 Atl. 274.

Attorneys — Disbarment — Misconduct of Judge.

Misconduct on the part of an attorney, who was judge of the probate court, in the course of the settlement of an estate of a deceased person in such court, justifies his disbarment, since it directly involves a misuse of his professional privilege and is misconduct as a member of the bar, and moreover any misconduct, professional or nonprofessional, disclosing a moral unfitness for the enjoyment of the professional privilege, justifies disbarment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That an attorney sought to be disbarred is judge of the probate court does not prevent his disbarment, since the judge of the probate court need not be an attorney, and his disbarment can have no effect upon his official status.

[See note at end of this case.]

Disbarment Proceedings — Sufficiency of Complaint.

The sufficiency of the complaint in a proceeding to disbar an attorney must be determined upon an examination of the complaint as a whole.

Nature of Disbarment Proceedings.

A disbarment proceeding is not a criminal prosecution, nor is it a civil action, though section 11 of the rules regulating the admission, suspension, and displacement of attorneys requires complaints for misconduct to be proceeded with as civil actions, and the complaint need not have the same technical precision of statement or conformity to recognized formalities required in criminal prosecutions or civil actions; it being sufficient if it is sufficiently intelligible and informing to advise the court of the matter complained of in order that it may determine whether it shall institute an inquiry and properly conduct it if instituted, and to advise the attorney of the accusation in order that he may be prepared to meet the charges.

Ground for Disbarment — Misconduct as Judge.

Where an attorney who was judge of the probate court procured the payment of $750 to him from the assets of an estate as compensation for pretended services as an attorney on behalf of the estate which were never rendered, and exerted his authority as such judge to secure such payment, resorted to deception and concealment in his efforts to secure such payment, and made use in his official position of threats calculated to produce the end desired, for the purpose of coercing payment, he is properly suspended indefinitely from practicing law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Disbarment Proceedings — Right of State's Attorney to Institute.

Acts 1907, c. 120, authorizing the appointment of a grievance committee in each county whose duty it shall be to inquire into and present to the court offenses involving the character, professional standing, etc., of members of the bar, does not provide an exclusive mode of instituting such inquiries, and does not restrict the inherent power of the court to inquire into the conduct of its own officers on its own motion or on the complaint of any party, and hence the state's attorney can present a complaint against an attorney as authorized by section 10 of the rules of court.

[See 2 R. C. L. tit. Attorneys at Law, p. 1105.]

Same.

The state's attorney is not disqualified to present a complaint of professional misconduct against an attorney by reason of his bitter enmity to the accused attorney or his prejudice against him, since he does not appear as a prosecuting officer and has no power to control the proceeding, and his only duty is to call the attention of the court to the alleged misconduct; the duty thereafter resting upon the court to see that the interests of justice are preserved and the rights of the accused attorney protected.

Findings in Disbarment Proceeding — Facts Outside of Charges.

It is immaterial in a disbarment proceeding that the court found facts outside of the charges contained in the complaint, where its judgment was not based upon such findings, but upon matters alleged in the complaint and unquestionably sufficient to support the judgment.

Discretion of Court — Determining Fitness of Accused to Practice.

The question for determination in a disbarment proceeding is whether the defendant by reason of his past conduct evidencing his qualities of character and uprightness was a fit person to exercise longer the functions of an attorney, and in determining this question a large measure of judicial discretion was to be exercised reasonably, fairly, and dispassionately.

Rights of Accused.

An attorney accused of professional misconduct is entitled to notice of the charge against him, an opportunity to be heard, a fair and dispassionate investigation, and a reasonable exercise of the judicial discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fairfield county: BENNETT, Judge.

Complaint by State of Connecticut, plaintiff, against Charles H. Peck, defendant, for misconduct as attorney. From judgment rendered, defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Robert E. DeForest for appellant.

J. Moss Ives for appellee.

[449] PRENTICE, C. J.—The acts, which in the complaint are charged as misconduct calling for the respondent's disbarment, and for which, as appears by the judgment-file, he was disbarred, were all done by him in the course of the settlement of an estate of a deceased person in the Court of Probate over which he presided. The misconduct alleged, and made the basis of the judgment, [450] was misconduct connected with the performance of his judicial office. The claim made upon demurrer to the complaint, and renewed at the hearing, that such misconduct was not misconduct as a member of the bar, and, therefore, not of a kind to justify discipline as such member, is, for a double reason, wholly without foundation. In the first place it did directly involve a misuse of the professional privilege. In the second it disclosed a moral unfitness for the enjoyment of that privilege, and it matters not whether the disclosure came through professional channels or not.

An attorney at law admitted to practice, and in the exercise of the right thus conferred to act as an officer of the court in the administration of justice, is continually accountable to it for the manner in which he exercises the privilege which has been accorded him. His admission is upon the implied condition that his continued enjoyment of the right conferred is dependent upon his remaining a fit and safe person to exercise it, so that when he, by misconduct in any capacity, discloses that he has become or is an unfit or unsafe person to be entrusted with the responsibilities and obligations of an attorney, his right to continue in the enjoyment of his professional privilege may and ought to be declared forfeited. As important as it is that an attorney be competent to deal with the oftentimes intricate matters which may be entrusted to him, it is infinitely more so that he be upright and trustworthy. Unfortunately it is not easy to limit membership in the profession to those who satisfy the standard test of fitness. But scant progress in that direction can be hoped for if, in the determination of the qualification of professional fitness, nonprofessional dishonor and dishonesty in whatever path of life is to be ignored. Professional honesty and honor are not to be expected as the accompaniment of dishonesty and dishonor in [451] other relations. So it is that we, in common with other courts, hold, as did Lord Mansfield more than a century ago, that misconduct, indicative of moral unfitness for the profession, whether it be professional or nonprofessional, justifies dismissal as well as exclusion from the bar. In re Durant, 80 Conn. 140, 147, 67 Atl. 497; Fairfield County Bar v. Taylor, 60 Conn. 11, 17, 22 Atl. 441, 13 L.R.A. 767; Ex p. Brounsall, 2 Cowp. (Eng.) 829; Boston Bar Assoc. v. Greenwood, 168 Mass. 169, 183, 46 N. E. 568; Sanborn v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140, 148; In re Delano, 58 N. H. 5, 42 Am. Rep. 555; In re Percy, 36 N. Y. 651, 654.

The demurrer suggests in this connection that disbarment proceedings so far partake of the character of official impeachment that they are not to be permitted in the case of a judicial officer. This objection is not well taken. Since a judge of probate need not be an attorney, his disbarment can have no effect upon his official status. The courts cannot be held responsible for the character of elective officers, but they can and ought to be for the fitness of those who enjoy the privileges of the legal profession under their authority and sanction.

The demurrer asserts, further, that the complaint addressed to the court fails to set out misconduct, either professional or judicial, on the part of the accused. This general charge is elaborated by reference to specified disassociated allegations, of each of which it is said that it does not charge misconduct. The complaint, however, is to be looked at as a whole, and the question of sufficiency attempted to be presented by the demurrer must be determined upon the result of such an examination. The demurrer, and counsel's argument in support of it, proceed upon the assumption, or rather assertion, that the same tests are to be applied to a charge of misconduct on the part of an attorney, addressed to a court for investigation and appropriate [452] action, as to a complaint in a civil suit between parties.

This assumption mistakes the true character of a complaint of the former sort. It has been contended in other jurisdictions that disbarment proceedings partake of the nature of criminal prosecutions, and, accordingly, require an observance in the preparation of complaints of the formalities and technicalities prevailing in such procedure. This contention, however, has not met with other than occasional approval by the courts. The most have been made emphatic and sound reply that the proceeding was in no sense criminal, but one undertaken "for the purpose of preserving the courts of justice from the official ministration of persons unfit to practice in them." Ex p. Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 288, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 552; Sanborn v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140, 147; Easton Bar Assoc. v. Greenwood, 168 Mass. 169, 183, 46 N. E. 568; In re Bowman, 7 Mo. App. 569.

Neither are they civil actions. A civil action is one between parties. Here, an attorney is called to answer to the court of his appointment for his conduct as an officer of that court. The inquiry is directed solely to his continued fitness. There is no plaintiff. The State is not a party, as would appear by the title mistakenly given upon the record, to these proceedings. No person is a plaintiff. There may be, indeed, as in this case there is, one who has called the court's attention to alleged misconduct, but he is in no sense a party, and has no interest in the outcome save as all good citizens or worthy members of the bar may have. The complaint made, the court controls the situation and procedure, in its discretion, as the interests of justice may seem to it to require. It may even act upon its own motion without complaint, and thus be the initiator of proceedings. "It [the hearing] was an investigation by the court into the conduct of one of its own officers, not the trial of an action or suit." Fairfield County Bar [453] v. Taylor, 60 Conn. 11, 15, 22 Atl. 441, 13 L.R.A. 767. "The proceeding to disbar an attorney is neither a civil action nor a criminal proceeding, but is a proceeding sui generis, the object of which is not the punishment of the offender, but the protection of the court." In re Bowman, 7 Mo. App. 569.

Section 11 of our rules regulating the admission, suspension and displacement of attorneys, indeed provides that complaints for misconduct shall be proceeded with as civil actions, but this does not either make the proceeding a civil action, or necessitate that the complaint be marked by the same precision of statement, or conformity to the recognized formalities or technicalities of pleading, which are expected in complaints in civil actions. The one supreme requisite is that it be sufficiently intelligible and informing to advise the court of the matter complained of, and the attorney of the accusation or accusations made against him, to the end that the former may determine whether or not it shall institute an inquiry, and, if one is ordered, properly conduct it, and that the latter may prepare to meet the charges against him, if inquiry shall be made. If this condition is satisfied, so that the accused is fully and fairly apprised of the charge or charges made, the complaint is sufficient to give him an opportunity to be fully and fairly heard, and therefore to entitle the court to entertain it, and proceed thereon to an investigation.

In Randall v. Brigham, 7 Wall. 523, 530, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 285, where the foundation of the proceeding was nothing more formal than a letter, the court used this language: "The information imparted by the letter was sufficient to put in motion the authority of the court, and the notice to the plaintiff was sufficient to bring him before it to explain the transactions to which the letter referred. The informality of the notice, or of the complaint by [454] the letter, did not touch the question of jurisdiction." "No formal or technical description of the act complained of is deemed requisite to the validity of such a proceeding." In re Randall, 11 Allen (Mass.) 473, 479; In re Bowman, 7 Mo. App. 569; Sanborn v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140, 147. "We entertain no doubt that a court has jurisdiction without any formal complaint or petition, upon its own motion, to strike the name of an attorney from the roll in a proper case, provided he has had reasonable notice, and been afforded an opportunity to be heard in his defence." Ex p. Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 272, 2 S. Ct. 569, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 552.

Turning now to the complaint, we find that it is confined to a simple narrative of alleged facts and occurrences touching the accused's conduct in the course of the settlement in his court of the estate of a deceased person. There is no such distinct and precise specification and characterization of acts of misconduct as would be incorporated into a criminal indictment, or even a well-drafted civil complaint. But the charges of misconduct are there. They are untakably involved in the narrative, and could scarcely be made more apparent by a more scientific pleading. The accused could not have failed to appreciate the charges involved, and be thereby supplied with all the information requisite for adequate preparation for the court's inquiry. That he was not misled or inadequately informed is apparent from an examination of the quite voluminous transcript of the evidence presented upon the hearing, which is before us in the record.

The story told in the complaint embodies the charge that the accused was guilty of misconduct, in that he obtained from the assets of the estate the payment to himself of $750 as compensation for pretended services rendered by him as an attorney on behalf of the estate, but never in fact rendered; that he exerted his influence [455] and authority, as the presiding judge of the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate, to secure such payment; that in his efforts to secure it he resorted to deception, misrepresentation and concealment, and that in those efforts he made use, in his official position, of threats calculated to produce the end desired for the purpose of coercing and compelling the payment and consent thereto on the part of the persons in interest.

These charges certainly are of misconduct unfitting one to continue to exercise the functions of an attorney, and they are all apparent upon the face of the complaint. The court did not err in accepting it as embodying charges deserving of investigation, or in calling upon the accused to answer to them. Inartificial as the complaint may be, it is no pointless story that it tells. The following language, used by the court in In re Lowenthal, 78 Cal. 427, 429, 21 Pac. 7, under somewhat similar conditions, is quite appropriate to it, and for the most part might well be borrowed by us in commenting upon it: "We must say that the accusation is not a model pleading in this respect. The facts stated, as we have said, are set out in narrative form, without any allegations connecting them with one or the other of the general charges of misconduct, and are unnecessarily long, but we think they are such as to show misconduct on the part of the respondent, as an attorney of this court, sufficient to put him upon his trial."

Before filing his demurrer to the complaint, counsel for the accused pleaded in abatement for two reasons, to wit: (1) that the proceedings were improperly begun by a presentment by a State's Attorney, and (2) that the State's Attorney, who began them by the presentation of the complaint, acted in the premises without legal right or authority, by reason of his bitter enmity to the accused and his bias and prejudice against him, [456] rendering him incapable of fair and impartial action as an inquiring and complaining officer.

The first of these reasons rests upon the provisions of chapter 120 of the Public Acts of 1907, p. 673, wherein the appointment of a grievance committee in each county is provided for, their duties defined, and certain powers conferred upon them. Among the duties enumerated in the first section is that of presentment to the court for offenses by attorneys not occurring in its presence. Section 10 of the rules of court (Practice Book, 1908, p. 206), subsequently passed under authority of § 458 of the General Statutes and chapter 256 of the Special Laws of 1907 (15 Special Laws, p. 220), provides that presentment may be made by the grievance committee or the State's Attorney or any member of the bar by direction of the court. The respondent's contention is that the provisions of the public act are controlling and exclusive, so that complaint can now be made by grievance committees only.

The effect of the adoption of the rule after the enactment of the statute aside, it is apparent that the statute did not intend to provide an exclusive mode of instituting inquiries into the conduct of attorneys. The manifest purpose of the statute was to equip grievance committees with powers adequate for the effective performance of their duties. These committees, already existing under judicial authority, were given statutory recognition, and powers adequate to the performance of the duties assigned them were conferred upon them. But there the Act stopped. Neither by expression or by implication does it contain a restriction of the right of complaint to these committees, or a prohibition to the courts of the right to entertain complaints not thus presented. Such an apparent invasion of the power inherent in courts to supervise the conduct of [457] their own officers is not to be presumed, and the provisions of the statute give no countenance to the existence of a legislative intention to that end. See Grievance v. Ennis, 84 Conn. 594, 603, 80 Atl. 767.

But that particular consideration aside, it is quite apparent that neither the statute nor the rule, save as the latter comprehends most, if not all, practicable methods of procedure, undertakes to frame exclusive provisions. Each provides methods of procedure, but neither exclusive methods. The courts are, as they should be, left free to act as may in each case seem best in this matter of most important concern to them and to the administration of justice. They may of their own initiative, and without complaint, set on foot inquiries as to professional conduct and fitness, or they may, in their discretion, entertain a complaint received from any source within or without the profession. Statute and rule provide orderly methods of procedure possessing the advantage of uniformity, thoroughness, and the promise of efficiency. But the power of the courts is left unfettered to act as situations, as they may arise, may seem to require, for efficient discipline of misconduct and the purging of the bar from the taint of unfit membership. Such statutes as ours are not restrictive of the inherent powers which reside in courts to inquire into the conduct of their own officers, and to discipline them for misconduct. Boston Bar Assoc. v. Greenhood, 168 Mass. 169, 183, 46 N. E. 568.

The second ground of abatement finds its justification in the qualification of impartiality required of grand jurors in the performance of their duties in presenting for criminal prosecution. The argument is that the same qualification is, under our system, required of a State's Attorney in the filing of informations by him, and further, by assumption rather than assertion, that it attaches to a State's Attorney's action when [458] he undertakes to act under the provision in our rules which names him as one who may present to the court complaint of misconduct on the part of the attorney.

It is unnecessary to follow the course of this argument, or to examine its premises. It is enough for present purposes to observe that proceedings looking to inquiry into the conduct of an attorney are in no sense, as we have already had occasion to notice, criminal prosecutions; that the State's Attorney, if he acts, does not appear as a prosecuting officer, and that his only duty in such case is to do what others might in calling the attention of the court to alleged misconduct on the part of one of its officers, and thereafter to conform to the behests of the court, in whose hands the proceeding rests. The duty which he performs, from first to last, is one which he owes as a member of the bar and an officer of the court, to whose orders in the premises he is subject, and not as a criminal prosecutor. He has no power to direct or control the proceeding. The complaint being made, the duty rests upon the court to see that the interests of justice are preserved and the rights of an accused attorney protected, and when that duty is performed, as it was in this case by the transfer of the management of the proceeding and the conduct of the hearing to confessedly impartial hands, the accused can have no just cause for complaint.

Beyond question the facts found, as a result of the court's inquiry, furnish ample justification for the order of disbarment. It is, however, asserted on behalf of the respondent, that some of these facts lie outside of the charges contained in the complaint. It is true that two features of the finding, involving serious matters of misconduct and possibly others of less importance, are not touched upon in the complaint. One of these, the most serious of all, could not be, since it related to the presentation upon the hearing of written testimony [459] falsified by the accused. But no one of these matters is made the basis of the judgment. Whether the one referred to as the most serious might not have been made a cause of disbarment, as having occurred in the presence of the court, we need not inquire. It is enough that it was not. The matters which in a sense lay outside of the field of the charges of the complaint, are related in the finding as incidental to its story and as having a bearing upon the charges made and the conclusions reached with respect to them; but the misconduct, for which judgment of disbarment was entered, as appears by the memorandum of decision, the judgment-file, and the finding, is limited to matters clearly within the complaint. The judgment-file, following the memorandum of decision, beyond finding the allegations of the complaint true, confines its finding of misconduct to three particulars: (1) that the respondent, "as an attorney, deliberately planned to obtain possession of, from an estate before him as judge of probate, a fee for services as attorney which he had not rendered, and to which he was in no manner entitled;" (2) that "he did collect and receive from said estate such fee as attorney, knowing that he was obtaining and receiving it without right and with intent to deprive the owners of the sum so received;" and (3) that he, "in order to retain to himself as attorney the sum so obtained, did, by threats to make use of his power as judge of probate to deprive the heirs of the testatrix of the immediate possession of the estate, extort from them, against their will, a waiver of objection to the allowance by him as judge of the fee received by him as attorney."

These matters were all within the complaint, and it cannot reasonably be contended that they do not amount to misconduct justifying the judgment. An examination of this statement of misconduct, furnishing the basis for the judgment, clearly shows that the court [460] understood its duty, and was careful to recognize the limitations which the complaint imposed upon it. This is further shown by its distinct ruling in favor of the respondent's claim of law, that it "could not legally find, consider or regard as a basis of judgment against the defendant in this case any operative fact not directly and positively alleged in the information." The story told in the finding furnishes more incidental details than does that in the complaint, and it is more precise in its statement of ultimate conclusions, and more direct in its characterization of wrongdoing; but it is, after all, the same story in essence, and leads to the establishment of the same operative facts in so far as they influenced the judgment.

It is further contended that the finding of the court, in its significant details and ultimate conclusions of misconduct, is not supported by the evidence, and should be corrected; and the evidence is before us to secure such correction. If it be assumed that our jurisdiction in proceedings of this character extends to the point of reviewing the conclusions of the investigating court upon matters of fact, as in civil actions, it nevertheless appears to us, upon an examination of the transcript of testimony, that the evidence is such that the court could not well have arrived at other conclusions than those upon which its judgment was based. See In re Durant, 80 Conn. 140, 149, 10 Ann. Cas. 539, 67 Atl. 497.

The question for the court's determination was whether the respondent, by reason of his past conduct evidencing his qualities of character and uprightness, was a fit person to be longer allowed to exercise the functions of an attorney and to act as an officer of the court in the administration of justice. Fairfield County Bar v. Taylor, 60 Conn. 11, 16, 22 Atl. 441, 13 L.R.A. 767. Into the determination of this question there entered a large measure of judicial discretion, to be exercised not arbitrarily, [461] impulsively, or under the influence of hatred or prejudice, but reasonably, fairly and dispassionately. The accused attorney was entitled to notice of the charge against him and opportunity to be heard, to a fair and dispassionate investigation, and to a reasonable exercise of the judicial discretion. In re Durant, 80 Conn. 140, 148, 150, 10 Ann. Cas. 539, 67 Atl. 497. We fail to discover wherein he has not been accorded all these rights.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

Misconduct in Fiduciary Capacity, 236.

Misconduct as Judicial Officer.

The rule that seems to obtain in the greater number of jurisdictions is that an attorney holding a judicial office may be disbarred for misconduct in his judicial capacity. In re Breen, 30 Nev. 164, 93 Pac.

997, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 572; In re Hobb, 75 N. H. 285, 73 Atl. 303. See also Matter of Davis, 15 Hawaii 377. And see the reported case. Compare State v. Martin, 45 Wash. 76, 87 Pac. 1054. Thus an attorney has been suspended for observations and intimations reflecting on the honor, integrity and dignity of the supreme court made while acting as a district judge. Re Breen, 30 Nev. 164, 93 Pac. 997, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 572. And in the case of In re Hobb, 75 N. H. 285, 73 Atl. 303, wherein it appeared that an attorney acting in his capacity as a justice of the peace conducted the judicial duties of his office in such a manner as to indicate a wilful disregard of the ordinary mode of procedure in criminal cases and grossly neglected to account for fines imposed by him on offenders, it was held that he should be suspended. In the Matter of Davis, 15 Hawaii 377, it was held that the fact that an attorney was a district magistrate at the time an order of disbarment was made, did not constitute a defense to any of the charges made against him or limit the authority or duty of the court in passing on his conduct as an attorney. In State v. Martin, 45 Wash. 76, 87 Pac. 1054, it seems to have been conceded by the parties that the act of a person as judge could not be examined in a proceeding for his disbarment, but it was held that where the misconduct charged not only involved his conduct as a judge but also involved him as a man, it was sufficient to sustain a judgment of suspension. The court said: "Such a conception of the moral responsibilities and proprieties, and such a manifestation attending the conduct of a lawyer when acting as judge cannot well be divorced from the man himself, when his character and acts as a lawyer are under investigation."

In the case of In re Condon, 166 Ia. 265, 147 N. W. 769, it was held that irregularity in omitting to itemize the costs in a justice's entry did not justify the institution of proceedings against him for his disbarment as an attorney.

In People v. Phipps, 261 Ill. 576, 104 N. E. 144, it appeared that an attorney had about ten years before converted to his personal use money in his hands as a master in chancery. It was held that this was not sufficient to justify his disbarment, but that it would be considered in connection with other and later professional misconduct. The court also said that if the matter had been brought to its attention at the time, a disbarment would have been inevitable.

It has been held that a judge who is guilty of misconduct or malfeasance in office cannot on that account be proceeded against by disbarment proceedings, the proper remedy being impeachment. People v. Goddard, 11 Colo. 259, 18 Pac. 338. See also Baird v. Justices' Ct. 11 Cal. App. 439, 105 Pac. 259; Matter of Silkman, 88 App. Div. 102, 84 N. Y. S. 1025. Compare Matter of Dellenbaugh, 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 325, 380, 17 Ohio Cir. Ct. 106, 302. Thus in People v. Goddard, supra, it appeared that an attorney while a candidate for judge made a written promise to appoint another as clerk of court in the event of his election. The agreement was deposited with a third person, who was, however, instructed to receive no money from the promisee. Subsequently the attorney on the advice of friends accepted a sum of money from the promisee but after the election the money was returned. The promisee was not appointed as clerk, but the agreement between him and the attorney was compromised. It was held that the conduct of the attorney did not warrant his disbarment, the appropriate remedy for his misconduct being impeachment. In the Matter of Dellenbaugh, 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 380, 17 Ohio Cir. Ct. 302, the rule that an attorney cannot be disbarred for offenses committed in his character and capacity as a judge was recognized. But in that case it appeared that while on the bench a judge had corruptly heard a case and after leaving the bench falsely represented that he had granted a decree in order to have it entered of record and it was held that he should be disbarred as an attorney.

It has been held that where one occupying a judicial position engages in the practice of law in violation of a statute he cannot be disbarred or suspended on that account. Baird v. Justice's Ct. 11 Cal. App. 439, 105 Pac. 259; Matter of Silkman, 88 App. Div. 102, 84 N. Y. S. 1025. In the case first cited, the court said: "Section 287, Code of Civil Procedure, designates the courts having power to remove or suspend attorneys, and the causes for which such removal or suspension may be made. A justice of the peace is not a court which, under that section, has power to remove or suspend an attorney, and the practicing of law by one occupying a judicial position is not one of the causes for removal or suspension. If, as a matter of fact, French violated the law by thus engaging in the practice of his profession before a justice of the peace, when at the same time he was occupying a judicial position, his offense is that of a judicial officer and not that of an attorney (In re Silkman, 88 App. Div. 102, 84 N. Y. S. 1027); and if he subjected himself to any penalty by reason of misconduct, the punishment therefor is provided by section 758, Penal Code. As said in the case last cited: Courts which have inherent power to discipline lawyers are confined in its exercise to such acts exhibiting turpitude, or loss of that good character which was es-essential to admission in the first instance, and when misconduct is made by statute ground for removal from office for transgression as a judicial officer, the same, in the absence of expressions to the contrary, must be deemed exclusive."

Misconduct as State or Prosecuting Attorney.

It is the prevailing rule that an attorney may be disbarred for misconduct in his capacity as a prosecuting or state's attorney. In re Cowdery, 69 Cal. 32, 10 Pac. 47, 58 Am. Rep. 545; People v. Anglim, 33 Colo. 40, 78 Pac. 687; In re Lyons, 162 Mo. App. 688, 145 S. W. 844; In re Simpson, 9 N. D. 379, 83 N. W. 541; In re Voss, 11 N. D. 540, 90 N. W. 15; In re Johnson, 27 S. D. 386, 131 N. W. 453; In re Norris, 60 Kan. 649, 57 Pac. 528; In re Jones, 70 Vt. 71, 39 Atl. 1087. Thus in the case of In re Norris, supra, it was held that the fact that some of the acts charged against an attorney in a proceeding for his disbarment were acts of official malfeasance committed in his capacity as county attorney was no defense. The court said: "He performed them as an attorney at law—as an official of the court as well as an officer of the county. While we have previously held that a county attorney need not be a duly admitted and licensed member of the bar (State v. Swan, 60 Kan. 461, 56 Pac. 750), yet, if he be such, he must, in representing the interests of his quasi-corporate client, be governed by those rules of professional conduct under which justice must needs be administered to public as well as to private litigants." And in the case of In re Voss, 11 N. D. 540, 90 N. W. 15, it was said: "It cannot be successfully maintained that criminal conduct on his part as state's attorney cannot be used as evidence to take from him the authority under which he practices law, and under which he exercises the functions of state's attorney, whereas a person may commit some offenses not connected with his duties as an attorney at law, when such offenses do not unfit him for the practice of his profession, and render him unworthy of the confidence of clients, and no ground exists for disbarring him. In such cases the man and the attorney at law are deemed separate, and an act that may reflect seriously upon the character of the man will not be grounds for disbarment or suspension. But it is not true that corrupt conduct on the part of a state's attorney in his professional capacity will not constitute cause for disbarment or suspension as an attorney and counselor at law. Our conclusion is that the misconduct shown would justify disbarment."

The act of a prosecuting attorney in refusing improperly to prosecute offenders constitutes a ground for his disbarment as an attorney. People v. Anglim, 33 Colo. 40, 78 Pac. 687; In re Simpson, 9 N. D. 379, 83 N. W. 541; In re Voss, 11 N. D. 540, 90 N. W. 15; State v. Hays, 64 W. Va. 45, 61 S. E. 355. In the case last cited, it was said: "The mere fact that he is liable to indictment for malfeasance in office, and to removal therefrom, does in no way affect the power and duty of the court to strike his name from the roll of attorneys for the same misconduct for which he could be, also, both indicted and removed. It is all the more reason why his name should be stricken from the roll that the misconduct which unfits him is a breach of fidelity to the public, whose welfare he is sworn to maintain. Is not such infidelity even worse than breach of trust to a single client? No one will deny the power and duty of a court to strike from the roll the name of one who fails to maintain fidelity to the personal trust of a single client's interest. How much more important is the duty to exercise this power when the infidelity or misconduct relates to an attorney charged, not only by the honor and oath of an attorney at the bar, but also by the dignity and oath of a public official, in an office calling for the exercise of highest qualities as an attorney! . . . Yet we are, by reason, compelled to say that defendant's duties as such public official in the main, and particularly in the instance for which he is accused, related to professional conduct as an attorney. It is impossible to say that what one does as prosecuting attorney is not done as an attorney. It is done in his professional relation to the people, as well as in his official relation. The office of prosecuting attorney is one of the exercise of the same professional attainments and fitness as pertain to a lawyer of private clientage only. As prosecuting attorney, he was acting in his character of an attorney nevertheless." In People v. Anglim, 33 Colo. 40, 78 Pac. 687, it appeared that certain gamblers and keepers of saloons had paid to a prosecuting attorney large sums of money to prevent prosecutions against them for violations of the law, and that he refused to prosecute a larceny case, unless the prosecuting witness would advance a large sum of money. It was held that his conduct was such as to require his name to be stricken from the roll of attorneys.

In the case of In re Cowdery, 69 Cal. 32, 10 Pac. 47, 58 Am. Rep. 545, it appeared that an attorney while occupying the office of city and county attorney took appeals in several cases in which judgments had been rendered against the city and county. At the expiration of his term of office the appeals were still pending and several months later he accepted a sum of money from the attorney of the parties in favor of whom the judgments had been rendered on the agreement that he would not accept any further employment from the city and county in relation to the cases. It was held that he should be suspended from acting as an attorney for a period of six months. But in the case of In re Johnson, 27 S. D. 386, 131 N. W. 453, it appeared that an action was brought to disbar an attorney who was also attorney general, for acting as an attorney in an action connected with a prosecution started by him. The court in holding that the facts of the case did not justify a disbarment said: "It will be observed that the accused admits the criminal proceedings in the circuit court resulting in the conviction of Frank Brandell and Fred Cline of the offense of grand larceny, with the commission of which they were charged, and also the commencement of the civil actions during the pendency of such criminal proceeding to recover the damages resulting in the alleged conversion of the property so alleged to have been stolen, instituted by James Buchan and W. L. Thompson against Charles Bowman, Fred Cline, Frank Brandell, and George McCarthy, resulting in judgments in favor of the plaintiffs, that they remained such attorneys of record until on or about April 23, 1910, when they filed notice of withdrawal as attorneys in said action. And it is disclosed by the evidence that the actions were subsequently tried in the circuit court by Mr. Bushfield of Miller, and that neither O'Brien nor the accused took any part in said trial, nor received any remuneration from the plaintiffs other than $15 and some cents, fees paid out by them in the actions. . . . Assuming, therefore, that the accused honestly believed that the only question involved in the civil suit was as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiffs in the civil actions, and that evidence tending to prove the larceny would not be necessary, it is quite clear that the accused, in his connection with the civil actions, acted in good faith, and had no intention of violating the provisions of the section above quoted. We are inclined to take the view, therefore, that the institution of the civil actions by the accused and his partner was the result of an honest misconception as to the facts that might be necessary to be proven on the trial of the civil actions under the circumstances connected with the case, as then understood by them, and that no intentional wrong or violation of the statute was intended."

In Matter of Lyons, 162 Mo. App. 688, 145 S. W. 844, it was said that if a United States district attorney had a secret partner who was regularly defending persons in the United States court and dividing fees with the district attorney, it would justify his disbarment from practice on common principles of honesty and morality regardless of an affirmative statutory condemnation.

In Underwood v. Com. 105 S. W. 151, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 32, the disbarment of an attorney who had been convicted several times of the illegal selling of intoxicating liquors while he was the county attorney was affirmed. The court said: "Selling of liquor is not per se immoral. But selling liquor in known violation of law, is wrong. It is not good demeanor. One so engaged would not be admitted to the bar, no matter how learned in the law. On the same ground, he ought not to be allowed to remain on the court's roll. Furthermore, appellant, as an officer of the law, was required by the statute and the duties of his office to prosecute offenses against the liquor laws of his county. The duty devolved upon him officially as the county's official attorney. Himself habitually violating the liquor laws was his assuming an attitude contrary to his professional and official duty to the county and was incompatible with his official and professional duties as the county's legal representative and prosecutor. Manifestly appellant could not and would not prosecute himself for violating the liquor laws. It was in a sense the equivalent to becoming interested in a controversy adversely to his professional duty to his client. It was a gross breach of professional duty and merited the punishment received."

In the case of In re Jones, 70 Vt. 71, 39 Atl. 1087, it appeared that a state's attorney intentionally withheld material facts when applying to a judge for a certificate required by statute to entitle him to draw his salary and it was held that he should be disbarred. The court said: "The respondent and his counsel claimed before the commissioners, and now contend, that because the misconduct found relates to the respondent's duties as state's attorney for the county of Rutland, for which he is answerable to the voters of the county and to the state, and for which he might be impeached, this court has no jurisdiction over him in regard to the same. While acting in the county court in the prosecution of cases in which the state was a party, and in all his relations to parties, counsel and court, in such prosecutions, he was also acting in his official capacity as an attorney of this court, and under the obligations assumed by him when he became such attorney. Notwithstanding he might be liable to impeachment or might be rejected by the voters, if a candidate for reelection, his conduct when acting in his office of attorney, and sometimes when acting in a private or other capacity, was open to investigation by this court, and if found to be such that the court, to protect itself and the public, and to keep the administration of justice pure, ought to withdraw the protection and credit under the law which it accorded him by admitting him to the office of an attorney at law and solicitor in chancery, it is, beyond question, the right and duty of this court to deal with him as justice demands. It may suspend or disbar him."

In Matter of Cooper, 12 Hawaii 124, 128, it was held that acts of an attorney general in his official capacity which were not of such a nature as to show moral turpitude or unfitness, could not be passed on by the court in a proceeding on a complaint charging him with unprofessional conduct.

Misconduct as Ministerial Officer.

The act of an attorney in executing false jurats and certificates to affidavits and acknowledgments purporting to be taken before him as a notary public justifies his disbarment. People v. Hahn, 197 Ill. 137, 64 N. E. 342; In re Arcander, 26 Minn. 25, 1 N. W. 43; Ex p. Finn, 32 Ore. 519, 52 Pac. 756, 67 Am. St. Rep. 550; In re Hopkins, 54 Wash. 509, 103 Pac. 805. See also Matter of Barnard, 151 App. Div. 580, 136 N. Y. S. 185. Thus in the case of In re Arcander, supra, it appeared that an attorney in administering as a notary public the oath of office to a justice of the peace and taking the acknowledgments on his official bond antedated both the jurat and the acknowledgment. It was held that he should be suspended. The court said: "The false appearance in this case was produced by what was, in its essential nature, a falsification of a record. No argument can be required to show that the act done was wrong, and that it was done for a wrong purpose. It is of no avail to say that the respondent did it, not in his professional capacity, but as notary public. His admission to practice was an admission to practice in all the courts of this state. This includes justice's courts, our statutes repeatedly recognizing attorney-at-law in courts of that grade. See Gen. St. c. 65, sections 3, 18, 104, and c. 88, sections 1, 4, 30. What the respondent did as notary public, he, as an attorney at law conducting the prosecution in which he was engaged, procured himself to do. As respects the point that this procurement was in his professional capacity, the case in principle is in no respect different from what it would have been if he had procured some other notary public to do what he procured himself to do." In People v. Hahn, 197 Ill. 137, 64 N. E. 342, it appeared that an attorney was admitted to practice on a certified copy of a license granted to him in another state, the application being accompanied by an affidavit sworn to before himself under another name as notary public. He had been disbarred from practicing as an attorney in the other state, but did not reveal that fact in his application. In his practice in the courts after his admission he signed affidavits made on behalf of his clients in his proper name and swore to them before himself as a notary under another name. It was held that these facts together with others were sufficient to justify an order striking his name from the roll of attorneys. In Matter of Barnard, 151 App. Div. 580, 136 N. Y. S. 185, it appeared that an attorney as a notary public certified to acknowledgments which were not made before him, but no person in interest was harmed by his acts and no advantage accrued to the attorney by reason of his acts. The court severely censured the attorney but in view of the circumstances of the case took no further action.

In Matter of Gotthein, 153 App. Div. 779, 138 N. Y. S. 636, the court in disbarring an attorney for falsely certifying acknowledgments as a commissioner of deeds said: "Upon the faith of these acknowledgments rests the title of real property, and the only security of such titles is in the fidelity with which notaries and commissioners of deeds perform their duty in requiring the appearance of parties to such instruments before them and always refusing to execute a certificate unless the parties are actually known to them or the identity of the parties executing the instruments is satisfactorily proved. We cannot overlook this offense and cannot allow a person guilty of it to remain a member of the profession. The respondent is, therefore, disbarred."

In the case of In re Delano, 58 N. H. 5, 42 Am. Rep. 555, it appeared that an attorney used in a business venture money received by him as a collector of taxes and he was disbarred although he had made a partial restitution of the loss. The court said: "The temptation to which Delano yielded is one to which he would be constantly exposed in the practice of his profession. The money he misapplied was not the money of a client: but his situation as collector of taxes was, in substance, the situation of an attorney receiving money for a client. And when it appears that he could not be safely trusted in the former case, it thereby appears that he cannot be safely trusted in the latter. If his defalcation had occurred before he was admitted to the office of attorney, that fault should have prevented his admission; and, being enough to prevent his admission, it is enough to require his removal."

Misconduct in Fiduciary Capacity.

It is generally held that an attorney will be disbarred for misconduct in a fiduciary capacity. Thorndike v. Hunt, 5 Jur. (N. S.)

(Eng.) 879; Matter of Chandler, 22 Beav. (Eng.) 253, 25 L. J. Ch. 396, 2 Jur. N. S. 366; Matter of Hoffecker (Del.) 60 Atl. 981; New York Bar Assoc. v. Chappell, 131 App. Div. 69, 115 N. Y. S. 868; Matter of Lichtenberg, 169 App. Div. 505, 155 N. Y. S. 482. See also In re Wilson, 79 Kan. 674, 17 Ann. Cas. 690, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 517. In re O—, 73 Wis. 602, 42 N. W. 221. Thus in the Matter of Hoffecker, supra, the court in holding that an attorney should be disbarred for his maladministration of a trust said: "A father desires by his will to protect his daughters, ignorant of business and unversed in the practical management of affairs, from the dangers that attend improvidence and rashness or credulity and inaptitude in the control and investment of the estate he leaves behind him. His estate is perhaps the accumulation of a lifetime of industry and self-denial, and the principal reward of his life's labors consists in the confidence he feels that, by putting his accumulations in the custody of a trustee to act as their financial safeguard and protector, he will be able to insure his daughters against want while they live, and provide for their children after them. The responsibilities of such a trust are among the most sacred that a man can assume, and upon this court, upon the chancellor, is imposed the duty, the heavy responsibility, of bringing to severe account any solicitor of the court who is clearly shown to have fallen below the standard required of him by the obligations of such a position. It is his duty to see to it that any solicitor who has shown his unfitness for the office of solicitor which he holds, by such maladministration of a trust as is disclosed by the testimony in this case, shall not remain in a situation to do injury to others who might be induced to trust him. It may be proper for me also to say that, by permitting the respondent to remain a solicitor of this court under such circumstances, I would be wronging his fellow solicitors, and would bring upon them the evil consequences that must certainly ensue from a decision that would amount to nothing less than a judicial determination that such administration of a trust as has been disclosed in this case is not inconsistent with the duties and obligations of a solicitor—is not misconduct that should deprive a solicitor of his office and its attendant privileges. A new standard would thus be established for the officers of this court. Painful as the duty is, I am constrained to make the rule absolute, and order that the name of James H. Hoffecker, Jr., be struck from the rolls of the court of chancery." And in New York Bar Assoc. v. Chappell, 131 App. Div. 69, 115 N. Y. S. 868, the court in disbarring an attorney under the facts stated in the opinion said: "The respondent was an attorney at law and notary public, and had taken the acknowledgment of these women to a deed. He received from them checks, which they indorsed and delivered to him; he giving a receipt upon his office paper, which stated that he was an attorney and counselor at law and that he received this check for collection, the proceeds, when collected, to be turned over to the owners of the checks. He received the proceeds, appropriated it to his own use, and has never accounted for or paid it over. His own testimony shows that there never was an agreement that he could use this money until the 1st of October, but that there was a constant demand for the payment of the money. The mere statement of facts is sufficient to show that this respondent has been guilty of such an offense that he should no longer remain a member of the profession." So in the Matter of Lichtenberg, 169 App. Div. 505, 155 N. Y. S. 482, an attorney was disbarred for converting to his own use funds of a bankrupt estate of which he was receiver, and making a false affidavit as to the amount of the funds remaining in his hands. Similarly, in the Matter of Chandler, 22 Beav. (Eng.) 253, 25 L. J. Ch. 396, 2 Jur. N. S. 366, wherein it appeared that a solicitor who was also a trustee falsely represented to a person interested in the trust fund that he had invested the fund, his name was stricken from the roll of solicitors. Likewise in Thorndike v. Hunt, 3 De G & J. (Eng.) 563, 5 Jur. N. S. 879, 28 L. J. Ch. 417, 7 W. R. 246, it appeared that a suit was instituted against a trustee to enforce his liability. The trustee admitted his liability and to meet it turned over another fund in his hands as trustee. The trustee being a solicitor his name was stricken from the rolls.

But in People v. Appleton, 105 Ill. 474, 44 Am. Rep. 812, the court in refusing to disbar an attorney for misconduct relating to his duties as a trustee said: "From an examination of all the testimony, we can come to no other conclusion than that respondent accepted this trust, not as an attorney at law, but simply as an individual, and that whatever of wrongful conduct there may have been, it was but that of any ordinary trustee, and not professional misconduct in the office of an attorney at law."

BELCHER ET AL.

v.

COMMONWEALTH.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—June 18, 1915.

165 Ky. 649; 177 S. W. 455.

Homicide — Evidence Sufficient.

Evidence considered and held to be sufficient to sustain a conviction for murder.

Witnesses — Examination — Leading Questions — Prejudice.

Where in some instances the prosecuting attorney led the witnesses, but in only one such instance was the evidence material, and in that instance there was no objection, the judgment will not be reversed.

Trial — Continuance for Absent Witness — Facts Otherwise Proved.

Where the affidavit on application for continuance was read as the depositions of the absent witnesses, and other witnesses testified to the same facts which it was claimed the absent witnesses would have testified to, there is no error in refusing the continuance.

Homicide — Instructions — Mental Capacity as Affecting Degree.

Where the jury were instructed that defendant, a deaf mute, could not be convicted unless he was of sound mind and had sufficient reason to know what he was doing, thus authorizing acquittal for mental incapacity, it is not error prejudicial to defendant that the court did not instruct on voluntary manslaughter in relation to mental incapacity.

Criminal Law — Capacity to Commit Crime — Deaf Mute.

It is not error for the court to refuse to hold that a deaf mute was incapable of committing a murder.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Whether a deaf mute was mentally incapable of committing a murder is, on conflicting evidence, a question peculiarly for the jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike county.

Criminal action. George Belcher et al., convicted of murder and appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Staton & Pinson, J. M. Bowling and Childers & Childers for appellants.

James Garnett and Charles H. Morris for appellee.

[649] CLAY, C.—The defendants, George Belcher, Harrison Belcher and Bart Belcher were convicted of the murder of John Belcher, and each given a life sentence in the penitentiary. They appeal.

[650] The facts are these: The defendants are brothers. At the time of the alleged homicide Bart Belcher was 19 years of age, George, 22 years of age and Harrison, 24 years of age. When George was four years of age he had fever. From that time on he was deaf and dumb. John Belcher, the man who was killed, was about 20 years of age and was the first cousin of the three defendants. On the day before the homicide George, the deaf mute, and John, the deceased, had a difficulty. Some of the witnesses say that George struck John without provocation, whereupon John knocked him down. Other witnesses say that John, without provocation, cut George with a knife. According to the evidence for the Commonwealth, John Belcher, the deceased, was employed by a man by the name of Keaton, a railroad section foreman. On the day of the homicide, he, Keaton and others were on a hand car and were engaged in "lining up" the track. As they approached the end of a cut, Keaton, looked up and saw George and Bart Belcher coming down the railroad. Keaton had heard of the difficulty between John and George. Realizing that John was in danger, Keaton shoved him off the car, gave him a water bucket and told him to go to Riley Mullin's house and remain until called for. When John left the car and started towards Mullin's house, George Belcher, the deaf mute, threw up his pistol and shot at him. John was not struck and immediately began to run. George fired again, and Bart, the other brother, stepped across the track, so as to get sight of John, and also fired. At this point Harrison Belcher appeared on the scene. He was coming down the county road on a mule. He jumped off the mule and came to the car. Keaton told him not to go down there and kill John, whereupon Harrison threw up his pistol and threatened to kill the whole party. There is testimony to the effect that Harrison fired one shot towards John. Some witnesses say that while they were standing near the car and after John had fled, Harrison said: "God damn him, he cut my brother and we are going to kill him." Bart also said: "God damn him, he stuck a knife in my brother and we are going to kill him." Harrison and George then started after John and Bart went through the cut. John went on to Riley Mullin's house. After getting in the house John went to the door and looked towards George and Harrison, who were together. [651] George fired his pistol and the shot took effect in John's abdomen. John died about a half hour later from the effects of the wound.

Harrison Belcher testified that he spent part of the night before with Morg Killen. On the morning of the homicide he started to the Potter Fork of Boone, where he had been "logging." On the way he stopped at John Adams' place, where he found his father very drunk. He stayed around a while looking after his father and finally started home with him. He could not get his father to go home, so he started back the other way to John Davis Bentley's. When he got there he found George. He sent George for a mule to help carry his father home. George brought the mule and they started down the creek. As they proceeded down the creek they heard some shots on the railroad. Harrison then ran over to the railroad and found George and Bart there. He saw John Belcher, the deceased, run towards Riley Mullin's house, but didn't see George follow John. He and Bart started through the cut and someone told them to go and get George to come back. Harrison insisted on Bart's going and Bart insisted on Harrison's going. Harrison claims that he went and on catching up with George tried to get him to come back. He says that when they got near Mullin's house, John was standing in the doorway with a pistol pointed in George's direction, and that before he could stop George, George fired. Bart explains his presence at the homicide in the following way: He had been working for Shack Steele. On the day of the killing, he had broken a skein on his wagon and he and Steele agreed to go to Mr. Adams' and get a skein. In going back from Adams' place he came across the party who had charge of his father, who was drunk. He assisted in getting the old man on the mule and then he and George and two smaller brothers started down the railroad. Pretty soon they saw the section crew approaching. When they pulled to the upper end of the cut the hand car stopped. John Belcher got off, put the water bucket over his left arm, got out his pistol and started towards Riley Mullin's house. As he stepped over the knoll, George shot two shots. Then John Belcher threw his pistol towards George and witness. George then shot again. After proceeding a little further down, John put his elbows on his knees and fired one or two shots. One of these shots grazed witness' hair. As soon as this happened he shot [652] four shots at John. Thereupon John dropped his pistol and again started for Mullin's. He claims that he didn't go with Harrison and George, but admits that he joined Harrison on the railroad a very short time after the killing. After the homicide George fled, but Harrison and Bart were arrested together. There is some evidence to the effect that Bart showed signs of glee on learning that John had been shot and killed. It also appears that Harrison and Bart knew of the assault made upon their brother by the deceased.

Defendants insist that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. Each of the defendants was indicted as principal and as aider and abettor. While the defendants account for their presence at the place of the homicide in a very plausible way, the facts to which they testify are not very convincing. George had been injured by the deceased. Bart and Harrison knew of this fact. Each of the defendants was armed. That they accidentally happened to meet in the cut where deceased was employed does not appear at all reasonable. Considering the fact that they all appeared about the same time; that Bart and Harrison announced their purpose to kill the deceased; that Bart did fire four shots at him and Harrison probably one shot; that George pursued the deceased to the home of Riley Mullins; that Harrison accompanied George, though claiming that he tried to stop him, it was clearly within the province of the jury to conclude that the homicide was not one committed in sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion, but was the result of premeditated design on the part of all three of the defendants.

Our attention is called to two or three instances where it is claimed that the Commonwealth's Attorney led the witnesses for the Commonwealth. In the only instance where the evidence elicited by that method of examination was material, there was no objection on the part of defendants. In the other instances, the evidence was not only not material but the Commonwealth's Attorney was merely recapitulating what the witness had already testified to. We see no reason, therefore, for reversing the judgment on the ground that the Commonwealth's Attorney led the witnesses for the Commonwealth.

Another reason urged for reversal is the refusal of the trial court to grant a continuance, on the ground of absent witnesses. The trial did not take place at the [653] indictment term but at a subsequent term. The affidavit was read as the depositions of the absent witnesses. Not only so, but other witnesses testified to the same facts which it is claimed the absent witnesses would have testified to. Under these circumstances, there was no error in refusing the continuance. Williams v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 753, 18 S. W. 364; Simmons v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 839, 18 S. W. 534; Trabune v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 343, 17 S. W. 186; Roberts v. Com. 94 Ky. 499, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 341, 22 S. W. 845.

We deem it unnecessary to set out at length the instructions. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, they accurately and clearly present the law of the case. Under this heading it is claimed that the jury should have been told that if they believed that defendant, George Belcher, was guilty under either the first or second instruction, but further believed he was of a feeble mind, they should find him guilty of the lesser offense of voluntary manslaughter. It is true that in the case of Mangrum v. Com. 39 S. W. 703, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 94, this court held that an instruction which gave the jury the right to consider the defendant's mental condition in fixing the degree of his guilt was as favorable as the accused was entitled to, yet the instruction given in this case was more favorable to the accused than the one approved of in the case cited. In the present case the court told the jury that the defendant, George Belcher, being a deaf mute, he could not be convicted unless the jury believed from all the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time mentioned in the evidence the defendant was of sound mind, had sufficient reason to know what he was doing, and to know right from wrong, and had sufficient will power to govern his action. In other words, the instruction authorized an acquittal for mental incapacity, instead of a conviction of manslaughter. Under these circumstances, the refusal to give the suggested instruction was not prejudicial error.

It is further insisted that the trial court should have held that defendant, George Belcher, being a deaf mute, was incapable of committing the crime in question. We are not aware that such a doctrine has ever been announced by the courts. The fact that the defendant is a deaf mute is simply a circumstance to be considered in connection with the other evidence in determining whether or not he was mentally capable of committing [654] the crime. On this phase of the case the evidence was conflicting and the question was one peculiarly for the jury.

A careful reading of the record convinces us that no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendants was committed on the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Responsibility of Deaf and Dumb Persons for Crime.

The reported case which appears to be the only case passing on the question since the decision in Rex v. Stafford [1909] 2 K. B. 81, 16 Ann. Cas. 442, holds that the fact that a person charged with the commission of a crime is deaf and dumb is merely a circumstance to be considered in connection with other evidence in determining whether he was mentally competent at the time of the alleged offense.

STATE EX REL. LANNG

v.

LONG.

IN RE LANNG.

Louisiana Supreme Court—November 4, 1914.

136 La. 1; 66 So. 377.

Courts-martial — Legislative Power to Create.

The provisions of the state constitution, establishing the judiciary department of the state government and vesting the judicial power of the state in certain named and designated courts, do not preclude the exercise, by the general assembly, of the power granted by other provisions of the constitution to establish, as an instrumentality of the executive department, a "well-regulated militia," declared by the constitution to be necessary "to the security of a free state," to provide by law how such militia shall be organized and trained, and incidentally to authorize the creation of courts-martial as one of the ancient and recognized methods by which such instrumentality may be regulated and disciplined.

Militia — Enlistment as Contract — Imposing Additional Duties.

Enlistment in the active militia of the state, save in times of war or public danger or disturbance, is voluntary, and is a "contract," and the state has no power, by the repeal of the law under which it was entered into (and which is the measure of the rights and obligations of the parties thereto) and the substitution of another law in its stead, to impose upon the other contracting party more onerous conditions and obligations to which he has not given his assent.

[See note at end of this case.]

What Constitutes Enlistment — Oath — Evidence of Taking Oath.

Considering together the several provisions of Act 191 of 1912, upon the subject of enlistment, the conclusion is well-nigh irresistible that, in the contemplation of that statute, the taking of the prescribed oath is the determinative act. But, without saying that no one can be held to have enlisted without having taken such oath, the court finds that the evidence here adduced, of acts and omissions by relator, is insufficient to establish such intention or consent on his part.

Courts-martial — Review by Courts.

The question of the jurisdiction of a court-martial is open to inquiry on habeas corpus issued from a court having authority to issue that writ; and the action of such court in the premises may be reviewed by this court in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by article 94 of the constitution.

[See 17 Ann. Cas. 445.]

Status of Courts-martial.

While "courts-martial" discharge judicial functions, and are in a sense courts, they are not within the meaning of article 84 of the constitution, declaring that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in certain named courts.

Certiorari to Criminal District Court.

Habeas corpus proceeding. Francis O. Lanng, relator, and M. J. Long, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Relator applies for writs of certiorari and prohibition. The facts are stated in the opinion. RELATOR DISCHARGED.

A. Miles Coe and H. M. Wilkinson for applicant.

R. G. Pleasant and Jos. E. Generelly for respondent.

Frank D. Chretien, in pro per.

[3] MONROE, C. J.—Relator was prosecuted before a court-martial of the First Separate Troop of Cavalry, Louisiana National Guard, upon a charge of being absent from ordered drill, inspection, and instruction, in violation of article 15, § 98, of Act 191 of 1912, was convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $10, or suffer imprisonment for ten days, and was imprisoned in conformity to the sentence, whereupon he obtained from the judge of division "B" of the criminal district court, a writ of habeas corpus, directing the sheriff, to whose custody he had been committed, to [4] produce him, and to show cause, etc.; but, after hearing, the writ was discharged. Relator then applied to this court for writs of certiorari and prohibition, upon which application an order nisi was issued, the effect of which has been to bring the ruling so made by the judge a quo before us for review. The points mainly relied on are: (1) That there exists no authority, under the Constitution of this state, for the creation of courts-martial; (2) that even though such court were authorized, relator would not have been subject to its jurisdiction, for the reason that he had ceased to be a member of the state militia.

1. The distinction between courts-martial and the courts which pertain to the judicial branches of the state and the federal governments has long been recognized. In Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How. 65, 15 U. S. (L. ed.) 338, plaintiff, having been convicted by a naval court-martial of attempting to desert from the navy, and sentenced to imprisonment, and the Secretary of the Navy having approved the sentence, the President issued an order to the marshal to receive the convict and commit him to the penitentiary, whereupon the convict brought an action of trespass and false imprisonment against the marshal in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and by Ann. Cas. 1917B.—16.

way of demurrer set up want of jurisdiction in the court-martial and in the President. Considering the question so presented, the Supreme Court said:

"Among the powers conferred upon Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, are the following: 'To provide and maintain a navy;' 'to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces.' And the eighth amendment, which requires a presentment of a grand jury in cases of capital or otherwise infamous crime, expressly excepts from its operation 'cases arising in the land or naval forces.' And by the second section of the second article of the Constitution it is declared that, 'The President shall be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states when called into the actual service of the United [5] States.' These provisions show that Congress has the power to provide for the trial and punishment of military and naval offenses in the manner then and now practiced by civilized nations, and that the power so to do is given without any connection between it and the third article of the Constitution, defining the judicial power of the United States; indeed, that the two powers are entirely independent of each other."

What has thus been said of the power of Congress to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces of the United States may also be said of the power of the General Assembly of Louisiana to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces of the state. Article 8 of the state Constitution declares that a "well-regulated militia" is "necessary to the security of a free state." Article 298 declares that:

"The General Assembly shall have authority to provide by law how the militia . . . shall be organized, officered, trained, armed and equipped, and of whom it shall consist."

And article 9 declares that:

"Prosecutions shall be by indictment or information; but the Legislature may provide for the prosecution of misdemeanors on affidavits; provided, that no person shall be held to answer for a capital crime unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

The recognition of the necessity for a "well-regulated militia," the grant of authority to provide by law how the militia shall be organized, trained, etc., and the exception with respect to capital cases arising in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger, concern the militia as an instrumentality of the executive department of the government, and concern the methods, other than through appeals to the judiciary, by which that instrumentality may be made effective. And, though courts-martial, created or authorized in the exercise of the power thus impliedly, if not expressly granted, may and do discharge judicial functions, and are therefore in some sense courts, they are not the courts to which article 84 [6] of the Constitution refers, in declaring that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in certain named courts and in others thereafter provided in the Constitution, and which are instrumentalities of the judiciary department. And, to that effect is the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of perhaps the greater number of the courts of last resort of the states. 27 Cyc. 496, 497, note.

There is some contrariety of opinion among the state courts as to the manner and extent in, and to, which the rulings of courts-martial, in matters affecting the militia of the different states, may be reviewed and controlled. State v. Nuchols, 18 N. D. 233, 119 N. W. 632, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 413, "case note." But, no one denies that the question of jurisdiction is always open to inquiry upon a writ of habeas corpus (Ex p. Carll, 106 U. S. 521, 1 S. Ct. 535, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 288, note); and, as no appeal lies in this case, there can be no question of the authority of this court to review, in the manner here proposed, the action of the district court, in discharging that writ. Const. art. 94; Garland's Code of Practice (Roehl), art. 855, p. 629, and authorities there cited.

2. Acts 181 of 1904 and 191 of 1912 alike divide the militia into "active and reserve" and confer upon the "Governor the power, under certain conditions, to order" that there be drafted, from the reserve into the active militia, as many persons, subject to militia duty, as may be needed. But those conditions did not arise, and that power was not exercised under the act of 1904, and have not arisen and has not been exercised under the act of 1912. Enlistment in the active militia was and is purely voluntary, therefore, under both statutes. The act of 1912 imposes many conditions and obligations that were not contained in the act of 1904, and is apparently intended to operate as a piece of legislation complete in itself [7] and covering the entire subject with which it deals. The title reads:

"An act to define and provide for the organizing and disciplining of the militia, to provide penalties for the violation of the same, to prescribe the duties of the Governor, the Adjutant General, and all officers and enlisted men thereof, to define military offenses, to provide penalties therefor and the method of enforcing the same, to provide for the pay, transportation and subsistence of the militia when called into actual service, and to repeal all laws in conflict therewith, especially act 181, approved July 6th, 1904."

The last section reads:

"That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act, especially act No. 181 of the General Assembly of Louisiana, approved July 6th, 1904, and all acts amendatory thereof, be and the same are hereby repealed."

It is quite true that it contains also the sections 2 and 15 which the learned judge, made respondent, has quoted in his opinion, and which declare, in effect (section 2) that "the Active Militia" and the National Guard "of the state shall consist of the regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed military forces, who have heretofore participated or shall hereafter participate in apportionment of the annual appropriation provided by section 1061 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended" (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 3054), and (section 15) "shall consist of the necessary staff department, the commissioned officers heretofore or hereinafter retired, the organization forming the National Guard at this date, and such other . . . as . . . may be enlisted as (or) commissioned therein." But relator had become a member of the "regularly . . . enlisted . . . force" by virtue of his acceptance of an offer which, reduced to definite terms as Act No. 181 of 1904, the state had made, to grant him certain privileges, and, under certain conditions, to feed, clothe, pay and pension him, in consideration of his assuming certain specified obligations and consenting to subject himself, for a specified [8] term, to certain rules and regulations. In other words, he was a member of the force, referred to in the act of 1912, by virtue of a contract, which, by the act of 1912, the state assumed to "repeal," and for which it assumed to substitute that act.

In U. S. v. Grimley, 137 U. S. 147, 11 S. Ct. 54, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 636, it appeared that the defendant (in error) was 40 years old at the time of his alleged enlistment, whereas the law required that recruits should be effective, able-bodied men, between the ages of 16 and 35, and the question was, whether he could be punished, by court-martial, for desertion. The Supreme Court said:

"The government, as contracting party, offers contract and service. Grimley accepts such contract, declaring that he possesses all the qualifications prescribed in the government's offer. The contract is duly signed. Grimley has made an untrue statement in regard to his qualifications. The government makes no objection because of the untruth.

The qualification is one for the benefit of the government, one of the contracting parties. Who can take advantage of Grimley's lack of qualification? Obviously only the party for whose benefit it was inserted. Such is the ordinary law of contracts."

The case of the relator now before us is quite different. He made no untrue statement, and is not now trying to gain advantage by reason of any wrong committed by him. The state has undertaken to repeal the law which contained the offer that he accepted, and which was the sole measure of his rights and obligations under the contract so made, and to substitute in its place another law, purporting to impose upon him conditions and obligations which differ from, and are harsher and more onerous, in material respects, than those to which he had agreed, and his answer to the attempt to enforce those conditions and obligations is "I have not consented to them," which we think is sufficient.

It is said that, after the passage of the act of 1912, relator attended some of the musters or drills of his company, and that, when he [9] failed so to do, he was prosecuted before courts-martial and fined, and that, on two occasions he paid the fines, from which, it is deduced that he accepted the new contract thus tendered, or sought to be imposed on, him, and became an enlisted man according to its terms. The evidence, however, fails to convince us that the acts attributed to him amounted to an enlistment; for at that time the act of 1912 had never been authoritatively interpreted or construed with the act of 1904, nor has it ever since then, been so interpreted or construed. The contention in this case has been that it operated, at once, upon all persons who were then members of the active militia, and, whether with or without their knowledge or consent, imposed its conditions and obligations upon them; and we assume that such was the view taken by the captain of relator's troop, by whom he is prosecuted, and that, taking that view, he felt it to be his duty to enforce the act to the extent of his ability. Relator and other members of the "troop" were therefore in the position of being required to comply with the provisions of the new law or else to submit to the consequences; and it is not surprising that, for a time at least, they should have chosen the alternative first mentioned. But the new law did not have the effect thus attributed to it, and acts that may have been performed by relator, as an enlisted man, under what he erroneously believed to be the compulsion of a highly penal statute, as construed and administered by his superior officers, contained none of the elements of a voluntary enlistment and contract. The fact that, when apparently he began to realize the true situation that had been brought about, he refused to be bound by the act of 1912, because he was unwilling to accept it as his contract of employment, and that he was court-martialed on account of such refusal, and on two occasions paid the fines imposed on him as the alternative [10] of imprisonment, can hardly be regarded as evidence of a voluntary re-enlistment, the more especially when we consider that the act of 1912 contains the following provisions and requirements upon the subject of enlistment, which were entirely ignored, to wit:

"Sec. 40. . . . That every person who enlists or re-enlists in the active militia of this state shall sign and make oath to an enlistment paper, which shall be filed in the office of the Adjutant General. . . . A person making a false oath to any statement contained in such enlistment paper shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of false swearing and punished accordingly. . . .

"Section 98. . . . That the military forces of this state shall be governed by the following rules and articles. . . .

"Art. 1. Enlistment in the active militia of this state shall be voluntary, and every person who enlists therein shall take and subscribe an oath (or affirmation) in the following words:

"I, . . . do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution and laws of the United States and the Constitution and laws of the state of Louisiana; that I will obey the orders of the Governor, as commander in chief of the military forces of the state, and of all other officers appointed over me, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon me as a citizen soldier in the service of the state of Louisiana, according to the best of my ability and understanding. So help me God. . . .

"Art. 2. No enlisted man, duly sworn, shall be discharged . . . without a discharge in writing, approved by his commanding officer. . . ."

The oath referred to in section 40 evidently relates to the qualifications required of persons who enter the service by means of enlistment papers, as contradistinguished from those who receive commissions, whilst that prescribed by section 98, being an oath of allegiance, obedience, etc., is required, as we imagine, of all persons who enter the service, though the language of the statute is, "every person who enlists." However that may be, it is certainly required, as is the oath referred to in section 40, of the man who enlists. Whether the two oaths are, as a matter of custom combined into one or taken separately does not appear, and is a matter of no present concern. What does [11] concern this case, however, is that, taking the several provisions that have been quoted together, the conclusion is well-nigh irresistible that, in the contemplation of the law, the taking of the oath is determinative of the enlistment; and, though we will not say that no man can be held to have enlisted without having taken the oath, we are of opinion that, to so hold, the evidence of the intention to enlist should be very much stronger than that which has been here presented.

In the case of United States v. Grimley, supra, the question was presented whether the defendant (in error) had in fact enlisted, and the court quoted the oath which he had taken, and which read, in part, as follows:

"I, John Grimley, born in Armagh, in the state of Ireland, aged twenty eight years and — months, and by occupation a groom, do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted, this eighteenth day of February, 1888, as a soldier in the army of the United States of America. . . ."

After which the opinion proceeds:

"The question presented is whether the petitioner had in fact enlisted and become a soldier. It will be noticed that, in this oath of allegiance is an acknowledgment that he had enlisted, and that it was not an agreement to enlist. . . . Section 1342 of the Revised Statutes provides that the army of the United States shall be governed by certain rules and articles thereafter stated. Article 2 provides:

"These rules and articles shall be read to every enlisted man, at the time of, or within six days after, his enlistment, and he shall thereupon take an oath or affirmation. . . . Obviously the oath is the final act in the matter of enlistment. . . . We conclude . . . that the taking of the oath of allegiance is the pivotal fact which changes the status from that of civilian to that of soldier."

It is true that the court also recognizes that the receipt of pay may operate as, or be, the equivalent of, an enlistment; but it does not appear that any oath whatever was taken by the relator now before the court, or that he received any pay, and the evidence fails, in our opinion, to show any enlistment [12] or intention to enlist, as resulting from any other acts or omissions on his part, after the passage of the act of 1912. He is not insisting upon the maintenance of his contract as represented by the act of 1904, but is merely resisting the attempt to force upon him, as a contract of enlistment, the act of 1912, and in so doing we are of opinion that he is sustained by the facts and the law.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the district court, here made the subject of review, be set aside, that the writ of habeas corpus, issued by that court at the instance of relator, be now reinstated and sustained, and that relator be discharged.

NOTE.

Enlistment in Militia as Contract.

The holding of the reported case that an enlistment in the militia constitutes a contract which precludes the state from imposing by statute on an enlisted man duties or obligations which do not result from his enlistment has been followed pro forma in three decisions in the same jurisdiction. State v. Long, 136 La. 12, 66 So. 380; State v. Long, 136 La. 13, 66 So. 380; State v. Long, 136 La. 133, 66 So. 381. No other decision seems to have passed on the question. As to the power of the executive to impose additional duties it was said in Betty v. State, 188 Ala. 211, 66 So. 457: "The general scope and the particular occasions of military service by the militia are fixed by law; and, although in the achievement of these authorized objects the governor exercises the plenary powers of a commander in chief, we think it must be readily apparent that he cannot, by the mere device of a military order, create new forms and enter new fields of military activity. Such a power, capable of almost infinite abuse, would be incompatible with the spirit of our institutions. Not being expressly conferred by law, the power must be held as denied by necessary implication."

The contractual nature of an enlistment is involved in the discussion of the validity of the enlistment of a minor in the state military service without the consent of his parents, as to which see the note to Acker v. Bell, Ann. Cas. 1913C 1269. See also, as to the right of an infant unlawfully enlisted to release from detention by the military or naval authorities, the note to Dillingham v. Booker, 16 Ann. Cas. 127.

EMERSON.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
First Circuit—October 18, 1916.

236 Fed. 161.

Statutes — Liberal Construction — In Aid of Military Power.

A public statute relating to the military power of the government should be liberally construed so as to make such power effective.

Construction to Avoid Absurdity.

Rules of strict and literal construction may be departed from, in order that absurd results may be avoided, and to insure that the statute shall be effective for the purposes intended.

Opinion of Legislator in Aid of Construction.

While debates in the legislature may be considered in determining the legislative intent, individual expression of members of the legislature will not establish such intent, in enacting a statute.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 1031.]

Militia — Calling into Service of United States — Failure to Take Federal Oath.

Const. art. 1, § 8 (8 Fed. St. Ann. 652, 654), declares that Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, and to make provision for organizing and disciplining the militia and for governing such part thereof as may be employed in the service of the United States. Dick Law Jan. 21, 1903, c. 196, 32 Stat. 775, as amended by Act May 27, 1908, c. 204, 35 Stat. 399 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. 346), authorized the President to call into service the state militia. Act June 3, 1916 (Fed. St. Ann. Pamph. Supp. No. 7, 40), for the national defense, establishing the National Guard, and intending to increase the efficiency of the militia, provides in section 58 that the National Guard shall consist of the regular enlisted militia armed and equipped as provided by the act. Section 70 provides that enlisted men in the National Guard of the several states and territories serving under enlistment contracts containing an obligation to defend the Constitution of the United States and to obey the orders of the President, shall be recognized as members of the National Guard under the provisions of the act for the unexpired portion of their enlistment contracts, and that, when any such enlistment does not contain such obligation, the enlisted man shall not be recognized as a member of the National Guard until he shall have signed a new enlistment contract, etc. Members of the Massachusetts militia, who had taken an oath to faithfully observe and obey the laws for the regulation of the government of the volunteer militia of the commonwealth, and to support the Constitution of the United States, were called into active service by the President to repel invasion by a foreign foe. It is held that, as the latter statute should receive a liberal construction, members of the Massachusetts militia who did not elect to sign a new enlistment contract are nevertheless, until the expiration of their terms, subject to being called into active service to repel invasion or put down insurrection, etc.

Appeal from United States District Court for District of Massachusetts: DODGE, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceeding. Alexander M. Emerson, petitioner, and Warren E. Sweetser, respondent. From judgment rendered, respondent appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Henry Wheeler and Harry Le Baron Sampson for appellee.

Sitting: PUTNAM and BINGHAM, Circuit Judges, and ALDRICH, District Judge.

[162] ALDRICH, J.—The rights involved in this case have reference to the question how far the statute of 1903, known as the Dick Law, which was designed to promote the efficiency of the militia, and was amended in 1908 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 346), was affected by the subsequent act of Congress of June 3, 1916, known as the National Defense Act, and entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes." (Fed. St. Ann. Pamph. Supp. No. 7, p. 40.)

The general question is whether the act of June 3, 1916, supersedes such prior laws and regulations, and repeals such provisions of the Dick Law, as amended, as authorized the President, in cases of invasion or emergency, to call out and use the organized state militia as a military force to help repel invasion and suppress insurrection, and whether in consequence thereof, under operative provisions of the act of 1916, it is left altogether at the option or election of members of the organized militia of the several states to sign a new enlistment contract or not, and to take an oath of allegiance to the United States of America or not, and to obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the Governor or not, and in the event of an election not to sign a new enlistment contract and take the oath, whether it results from such election that the militiaman, in respect to the unexpired term of his original enlistment, is mustered out and relieved altogether from obligation to respond to the federal emergency call of the President for military aid.

While certain conditions justify rules of technical and strict construction, the particular situation here makes the question more one of interpretation, to be influenced and controlled by the broad and important inquiry whether, under the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, the purpose of Congress was to weaken or strengthen the federal military arm; and an ascertainment of that character necessarily involves grave consideration of questions of public and private rights and of public policy as well.

It is quite likely, if the questions as to these statutes were to be determined under rules of strict and literal construction, that the conclusion reached by the learned judge of the District Court upon careful reasoning, would be quite justifiable; but we are not concerned with that view, because we think that a public statute of this character, which relates to the vital question whether the military power of the government shall be potential and effective in the hands [163] of the constitutional authorities, or is to be contingent upon the option of constituent members of the lawful military organizations, is one to be determined under broad rules of liberal construction.

In the situation presented, and under rules of liberal construction, the purpose of Congress would be quite controlling, and in ascertaining the purpose of Congress in its efforts under the Dick Law to promote the efficiency of the militia, and under the National Defense Act to make further and more effectual provision for the national defense, it must be assumed that Congress was actuated by the fundamental idea that governments are created for the protection of the rights and liberties of peoples and properties within their domain—that the use of military force may sometimes become necessary, and that to effect the object of governments they should be so maintained as to make the military force effective in the face of imminent exigencies of government emergencies and peril.

An interpretation of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, which would strike down all pre-existing laws as to military obligations under pre-existing contracts for national defense through militia service, would be contrary to the usual course of legislation designed to strengthen the Army, and would be so plainly contrary to the necessary idea of government defense and protection, that it would not be adopted unless it was so plainly expressed as to make it manifestly appear that Congress intended weakness rather than strength. Nothing short of clear and apt words would justify such an interpretation of a statute, intended to operate for greater efficiency and greater effectiveness, as would make it operate, through an overthrow of government rights, for less efficiency and less effectiveness.

While there was doubtless no thought in Congress that the voluntary militia plan contemplated by the National Defense Act of 1916 should be used to coerce enlistment into broader fields, it is quite as obviously clear that there was no congressional thought that a failure to do so would operate to set the organized militia of the several states at large from the limited service upon which its members had already entered. So, as we view it, we have no question at all relating to the duty of members of the organized militia to engage in the broader service, but have the single question whether, under reasonable construction, the voluntary election not to do so operates to discharge its members altogether from federal obligations of military service.

It is a familiar principle that rules of strict and literal construction may be departed from in order that absurd results may be avoided, and to the end that a statute shall be effective for the purposes intended.

In order to construe a statute of this character, therefore, there must be an ascertainment of what Congress intended; and such ascertainment is to be made under recognition of the fundamental and essential idea that chief among government purposes is that of so organizing and reorganizing its military force as to adequately safeguard itself and its people against domestic and foreign dangers.

It would seem quite consistent with the contemplated scheme for military strength and defense to hold that the National Defense Act of 1916 was intended to leave it at the election of the members of [164] the organized state militia, and of the National Guard of the several states, to remain in the service for the full terms of their enlistment for purposes of repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection, or to enter upon the broader field for a longer term. And it seems to us that it would be obviously inconsistent with the scheme for national defense and efficiency to hold that the exercise of the right of election by the militiaman, against the broader field and longer term, should operate to absolve him altogether from prior obligations entered into according to then existing laws.

If the exercise of such a supposed right by a single militiaman operates that way, as a consequence it would of course operate that way in respect to the contracts of the militiamen of the organized militia and the National Guard of the several states, throughout the nation, who should elect not to enter upon the broader service; and thus it would result that it would be at the option of the organized militiamen, and the National Guard of the several states, in respect to their prior engagements, to respond to the President's call or not.

If the exercise of the right of option not to enter upon the broader service is attended with the dire consequence that the militiaman is discharged from the obligations of his prior federal engagement, it, in effect, rests entirely with the constituent members of the organized militia, and the National Guard of the several states, themselves to disorganize and disband the organized militia force, with the result that the central government must in the end rely for its military power upon the Regular and Volunteer Army and what is distinctively designated as the National Guard. Under such a view, a very substantial and essential part of the federal government's military power would be bound only by a rope of sand.

To get at the meaning of the National Defense Act of 1916, it becomes necessary to consider somewhat the relative rights of the federal and state governments under the Dick Law, and under prior laws in respect to the federal military arm. This is so, because, if the relations are not altogether revolutionized or stricken down by the National Defense Act of 1916, they define the obligation which the militiaman and the state National Guard man assumed when he became a member of the organized militia or the National Guard of his state, and took the oath then prescribed by law.

There is no occasion to go much into the history of the earlier discussions as to what constitutes the primary militia, as distinct from the organized militia, or much into the earlier controversies as to the power of the President to use the organized state militia as a federal military force, because, as stated by the learned judge of the District Court, and indeed as conceded, unless existing obligations were dissolved by the act of Congress of 1916, the petitioner was bound under his engagement of service to respond to the call of the President and render service when needed to suppress insurrections within the national domain, or to repel invasions.

Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States (8 Fed. St. Ann. 652, 654) declares that Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; and it also empowers Congress to make provision [165] for organizing and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part thereof as may be employed in the service of the United States.

While the Massachusetts volunteer militia oath contains no express obligation to obey the orders of the President, those who become members of the militia expressly swear that they will faithfully observe and obey the laws and regulations for the government of the volunteer militia of the commonwealth and the orders of all officers elected or appointed over them, and that they will support the Constitution of the United States.

No question being made here against the idea that the organized militia and the National Guard of the states, under laws and obligations existing prior to June 3, 1916, might be invoked by the President as a military force for certain federal purposes within the national domain, we have no occasion to refer to that aspect of government military strength further than to refer to the power as something which had existence as a government force, to be called out by the President through the Governors of states, and used under military orders in such fields as the prior laws and the nature of the engagement for service contemplated.

We now come to a consideration of the provisions of the act of June 3, 1916, which the petitioner particularly urges in support of his contention that the effect of the National Defense Act was to supersede the old and to create a new and widely different military system, and to discharge all federal obligations of such members of the organized militia and of the National Guard of the states as do not enlist for a longer term and broader field of service than that contemplated by the contract of service under prior existing laws and regulations.

The provision upon which the petitioner chiefly relies is that of section 70, and the particular language is that:

"Enlisted men in the National Guard of the several states, territories, and the District of Columbia now serving under enlistment contracts which contain an obligation to defend the Constitution of the United States, and to obey the orders of the President of the United States, shall be recognized as members of the National Guard under the provisions of this act for the unexpired portion of their present enlistment contracts. When any such enlistment does not contain such obligation, the enlisted men shall not be recognized as a member of the National Guard until he shall have signed an enlistment contract and taken and subscribed to the following oath of enlistment."

And the proposed oath provides for a more extended term of service, for allegiance to the United States of America, and the state, and that such enlisted man shall obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the Governor.

It is quite true that section 70 declares, as to members of the National Guard of the several states, whose enlistment and oath do not contain the broader obligation, that they shall not be recognized as members of the National Guard until they have assumed the broader obligation by signing the enlistment contract and taking the oath prescribed; but we look upon this as merely declaratory of the fact that they shall not be recognized and classed in the National Guard, distinctively designated as such, and we do not view such declaration as at all inconsistent with the idea that they shall remain in the class of service [166] into which they had in fact previously entered. In short, upon mobilization and under election, not being recognized as members of that body of men known as the National Guard, the militiamen, by operation of law, are relegated to that branch of the service to which they belong, and in which they are bound to perform certain federal military duty.

Viewed in the light of the manifest purpose on the whole scheme of Congress for greater federal military efficiency, saying, if members of the National Guard of the several states shall elect otherwise, that they shall not be recognized as members of a distinct branch of the United States Army, falls far short of saying, or meaning, that a militia organization of a state, so far as federal rights are concerned, may be disbanded under the option of its members, and that federal obligations for service may be altogether rescinded at their free will.

Organized militia existed in Massachusetts, and, being under obligations to respond to an emergency call of the President, when mobilized, was subject to regulations established by Congress under the express provisions of the federal Constitution in respect to organization and discipline, and, of course, reorganization.

Under the theory of ample federal constitutional power, through Congress, to organize, reorganize, and discipline the organized militia of the states, and upon the theory of adequate means of segregation under the provisions of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, through military orders, there are no obvious reasons for not merging those who voluntarily elect to enter upon the broader and longer service into units of the National Guard for service both within and beyond the national boundaries; and under the same theory we see no reason why those who elect not to enter upon the broader and longer service, but must serve the term for which they enlisted, may not be lawfully merged into designated military units for service in the narrower field contemplated by the original enlistment within the boundaries, and for the purpose of protecting the national borders from invasion and of suppressing insurrection.

Great stress is laid upon section 58 of the act of June 3, 1916, which apparently limits the constituency of the National Guard. It is true that section 58 does declare that the National Guard shall consist of the regularly enlisted militia, armed and equipped as provided by the act of June 3, 1916.

But, we look upon this, however, as intended to establish a particular standard in that branch of the service known as the National Guard, and we think the reasonable theory is that this provision has reference to an intended distinctively classified and standardized branch of the federal service, and that the broader provision of section 1 of the same act creates a larger scope, and has reference to an organization of a wider constituency—that of the Army of the United States, which may consist of other land forces, such as are now or may be hereafter authorized by law, aside from and in addition to the Regular Army, the Volunteer Army, the officers of the Reserve Corps, the enlisted Reserve Corps, and the National Guard.

Thus, under such broad provision, it is obvious that there may well be units of military land forces other than those particularly enumerated, [167] and these land forces may well be the organized militia land forces under federal engagement to help put down insurrections and repel invasions.

Obviously, the National Guard, as distinctively classified and standardized, is intended to be a constituent part of the broader organization known as the Army of the United States; but that being so by no means necessarily carries with it the idea that the organized militia and National Guard of the several states may not be distinctively recognized as military forces to be mobilized under constitutional military orders, regulations, and designations, and, being organized into military units for the unexpired term, may not be utilized for defending the national bounds and for suppressing insurrection within.

The enacting section of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, unquestionably contemplates a broader scope for the exercise of power in respect to military organizations and compositions under constitutional limitations. Indeed, it is expressly and clearly declared that the Army of the United States shall consist of certain enumerated branches and such other land forces as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law. Thus, under this section, the United States Army, under its broad creation as a generic organization, may well be composed, as it would seem, not only of the Regular Army, the Volunteer Army, the National Guard, and the other enumerated branches, but such other, and any number, of constituent military suborganizations of land forces not enumerated, as may now or hereafter be authorized by laws not offending the Constitution of the United States or the Constitutions of the states.

We look upon sections 58 and 70 as intended to classify and standardize a particular branch of the national military force, and not as provisions intended to supersede the older system in its entirety, and to relinquish altogether the rights of the federal government in respect to the obligations of members of the organized military forces of the states which may be constitutionally used for certain kinds of national defense.

While the general and expressed object of the statute of 1916 was a more formidable national defense, through greater efficiency and effectiveness of military force, among the unquestionable purposes of classification and standardization of that particular branch of the United States Army distinctively known as the National Guard, was that of creating a status which should become the basis for providing for, and for regulating emoluments, disbursements, and pensions in that branch of the military service, and for caring for widows and orphans.

The act of 1916, being one for national defense, and one for more effectual provisions to that end, and Congress, upon its passage, being under the weight of well-known existing conditions of foreign menace, and in the presence of a recent invasion by an organized military body of armed men from a foreign country, the view is an impossible one that Congress intended to make it optional with the whole, or any substantial part, of the organized military force of the states, under obligation to aid the federal government in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection, to march or not, at will, in furtherance of the duty [168] which they had previously assumed, and for which they had been maintained in part by the government making the emergency call for help.

The President's communication of June 18, 1916, to Governor McCall, invoking military aid, was based upon the possibility of further aggression upon the territory of the United States, and it is quite apparent that both the President and the Secretary of War had in mind conditions which might necessitate reorganizations and subdivisions of the militia force, because, in the call upon the Massachusetts executive for military aid, it was expressly set forth, among other things, that, if "tactical divisions are later organized," requisite and additional staff officers, with rank as prescribed, will be called into service.

While debates upon a pending legislative bill have considerable potency upon questions of legislative intent, individual expression does not necessarily mean an expression of the intent and understanding of the legislative body. It is true that some of the expressions in the colloquial debate, upon the bill in question, between Mr. Hill and Mr. Hay, have a tendency to sustain the view urged by the petitioner in respect to the intention of Congress; but the colloquy ends with a deliberate expression by Mr. Hay that section 22 applies to unorganized militia which in the future may undertake to become organized militia under the provisions of the act.

Such is the view, in substance, which we take of the statute in question, that it keeps out of the National Guard, as distinctively standardized, such members of the militia as do not voluntarily engage for the higher obligations, and that it refers to future organizations and to greater efficiency and effectiveness, rather than to the idea of breaking down existing obligations for service; and it is in this sense that we cannot accept section 61 in respect to the right of states to maintain troops in time of peace as a mandate imposing itself upon organizations, obligations, and rights existing at the time of the passage of the act in question. It is only in the aspect that it has some bearing upon the question of construction that we refer to that section at all.

The argument on the one side that it has reference to existing state organizations, and therefore relieves from obligation, and puts out of service, all members of the militia and of the National Guard of the states not enlisting for the longer term and taking the oath to obey the orders of the President, prescribed by section 70 of the National Defense Act, and the argument of the other side, upon constitutional ground, that, if it means that, its operation would be destructive of the right of the states to maintain troops, raises a question not necessarily pertinent to this case, and one which we need not consider, because, whatever it means, its only weight here is in aid of the interpretation of the scope and meaning of the statute in respect to obligations of service under prior enlistments, and we give it consideration in that respect.

It is our conclusion that the so-called National Defense Act of 1916 was intended to give greater efficiency and effectiveness to the federal military force, through classification and standardization under military regulations and orders based upon existing rights and obligations, rather than one intended to operate to the end that members [169] of the organized militia, and of the National Guard of the states, who do not see fit to voluntarily enlist for a longer term and assume the broader obligations which might require them to go beyond the national bounds, should be absolved from the duty of responding to the emergency call of the President and the mobilization orders of the Governor in discharge of the obligations into which they had entered, and from the narrower service which they had already assumed under existing laws—that of serving a specified term within the national domain under the lawful orders of the President.

It results, therefore, that when the petitioner had elected not to enlist for the longer term and for the broader service, though not recognized as distinctively a member of the National Guard, that he was still in the service for the federal purposes contemplated at the time he enlisted in the Massachusetts militia and took the oath to obey all laws and regulations for the government of the volunteer militia of the commonwealth, to obey the orders of all officers, and support the Constitution of the United States.

The petitioner being in service for such federal purposes, he was not entitled to be discharged upon habeas corpus.

The order of the District Court is vacated, with directions that the petitioner be returned to the military custody from which he was taken.

PUTNAM, J. (dissenting).—It seems to me that the act of June 3, 1916, is too positive and precise to be modified by construction in the manner attempted by the opinion of the court, and I therefore conclude that the decrees and orders of the District Court should be affirmed, and dissent to that extent from the opinion of the court in this case.

NOTE.

Power of Federal Government with Respect to State Militia.

The power of the federal government over the state militia is derived primarily from the Constitution of the United States which includes the following provisions: "Congress shall have power . . . to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; . . . to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Art. I, § 8; 8 Fed. St. Ann. 652, 654. "The President shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states when called into the actual service of the United States." Art. II, § 2; 9 Fed. St. Ann. 7.

The Congressional power under the foregoing grant has been exercised from an early date, the regulations now in force being principally embodied in the so-called "Dick Act" (Act of Jan. 21, 1903, as amended by the Act of May 27, 1908, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. 346) and the National Defense Act of 1916 (Fed. St. Ann. Pamph. Supp. No. 7, 40).

The Congressional power conferred by the foregoing provisions is unlimited except as to the reserved power of the states to appoint officers and conduct the actual training of the militia. Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 16, 5 U. S. (L. ed.) 19; In re Spangler, 11 Mich. 305. See also 10 Op. Atty.-Gen. 13, 279; 22 Op. Atty.-Gen. 228.

The respective powers of the state and the federal governments were stated generally in

People v. Hill, 59 Hun 624, 13 N. Y. S. 637, affirmed 126 N. Y. 497, 27 N. E. 789, wherein it was said: "It will thus be seen that the power conferred upon the United States is to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. It is apparent that the organization here mentioned refers to the manner of formation of the militia, the weapons with which they shall be armed, and the tactics in which they shall be instructed. 'Disciplining,' as used in this section, refers in no wise to governmental action, as is apparent from the last clause of the section, where it is provided that the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress is reserved to the states. And the states were so zealous in guarding the right to control the government of the militia, and the material of its organization, that, in order that there should be no mistake, and that no greater powers should be claimed because of the word 'organizing' than were implied in prescribing the method of the formation of the militia, the appointment of officers, and authority to train is expressly reserved; and the only instance where governmental powers may be exercised by the United States is distinctly mentioned, viz., when the militia shall be employed in the service of the United States. At all other times the whole government of the militia is within the province of the state, and therefore any legislation which the state may adopt, relating to the government of the militia, is in no wise in contravention of the powers conferred upon Congress, as long as it does not infringe upon the method of organization. Why was the power granted to the United States to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia? It was that the militia should be organized after one model, armed in a uniform manner, and disciplined in one system of tactics; the result being that, when the militia of different states come together, called into service by the government of the United States, they come together as a homogeneous body, all organized in one way, armed in one way, and disciplined in one way; and not as a confused mass, having different methods of organization, different arms, and acquainted with different systems of tactics, and hence their usefulness very materially impaired. It was to provide against this contingency that this power was conferred upon the United States by the Constitution, and beyond this the states delegated no authority to the United States to interfere in their internal affairs in respect to the government of the militia." See also Ansley v. Timmons, 3 McCord L. (S. C.) 329. In Opinion of Justices, 14 Gray (Mass.) 614, it was said that the sole power to define the composition of the militia is in Congress.

The President has the sole and final power to determine whether an exigency exists which requires the calling of the militia into the service of the United States. Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19, 6 U. S. (L. ed.) 537; Vanderheyden v. Young, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 150. Compare Opinion of Justices, 8 Mass. 549. In Martin v. Mott, supra, it was said: "Is the President the sole and exclusive judge whether the exigency has arisen, or is it to be considered as an open question, upon which every officer to whom the orders of the President are addressed may decide for himself, and equally open to be contested by every militiaman who shall refuse to obey the orders of the President? We are all of opinion that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen, belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons. We think that this construction necessarily results from the nature of the power itself, and from the manifest object contemplated by the act of Congress. The power itself is to be exercised upon sudden emergencies, upon great occasions of state, and under circumstances which may be vital to the existence of the Union. A prompt and unhesitating obedience to orders is indispensable to the complete attainment of the object. The service is a military service, and the command of a military nature; and in such cases every delay, and every obstacle to an efficient and immediate compliance, necessarily tend to jeopardize the public interests. While subordinate officers or soldiers are pausing to consider whether they ought to obey, or are scrupulously weighing the evidence of the facts upon which the commander-in-chief exercises the right to demand their services, the hostile enterprise may be accomplished without the means of resistance. If 'the power of regulating the militia, and of commanding its services in times of insurrection and invasion, are (as it has been emphatically said they are) natural incidents to the duties of superintending the common defense, and of watching over the internal peace of the confederacy,' these powers must be so construed as to the modes of their exercise as not to defeat the great end in view. If a superior officer has a right to contest the orders of the President upon his own doubts as to the exigency having arisen, it must be equally the right of every inferior officer and soldier; and any act done by any person in furtherance of such orders would subject him to responsibility in a civil suit, in which his defense must finally rest upon his ability to establish the facts by competent proofs. Such a course would be subversive of all discipline, and expose the best disposed officers to the chances of ruinous litigation. Besides, in many instances, the evidence upon which the President might decide that there is imminent danger of invasion, might be of a nature not constituting strict technical proof, or the disclosure of the evidence might reveal important secrets of state, which the public interest, and even safety, might imperiously demand to be kept in concealment."

When the militia is called into the service of the United States its members become members of the military forces of the United States, under the exclusive control of the federal military authorities. In re Wulzen, 235 Fed. 362, Ann. Cas. 1917A 274; Vanderheyden v. Young, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 150; Com. v. Irish, 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 177, note.

But the militia when not called into service by the President has a status distinct from that of the armed forces of the federal government. West Virginia v. U. S. 45 Ct. Cl. 576; Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. U. S. 49 Ct. Cl. 522. In State v. Wagener, 74 Minn. 518, 77 N. W. 424, 73 Am. St. Rep. 369, 42 L.R.A. 749, it was said: "Under our Military Code, the active militia or National Guard is organized and enrolled for discipline, and not for military service, except in times of insurrection, invasion and riot. The men comprising it come from the body of the militia of the state, and, when not engaged at stated periods in drilling or training for military duty, they return to their usual vocations, subject to call when public exigencies require it, but may not be kept in service, like standing armies, in times of peace. While enrolled as soldiers of the state for the purposes aforesaid, they are neither 'troops,' within the meaning of section 10 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution, nor a 'standing army,' within the meaning of section 14 of the bill of rights in the state constitution. Dunne v. People, 94 Ill. 120." In Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. U. S. supra, it was held that a railroad holding a federal land grant was not bound to carry state militia at a reduced rate to and from an encampment where under order of the secretary of war they were to participate in training jointly with regular army forces. The court said: "The Constitution therefore clearly distinguishes between the army and navy on the one hand and the militia upon the other. The latter may be called forth by the President for specific purposes, he being the judge of the exigencies justifying his call, and when so called forth and assembled in obedience to the call there is no doubt that the militia or the National Guard come under the control of the government and into the service of the United States—the governor of the state ceasing to be commander in chief con-temporarily with the President becoming their commander-in-chief. And certainly when the President becomes the commander-in-chief the militia are in the service of the United States, while they cannot be 'in the actual service of the United States' if he is not their commander-in-chief. . . . That the National Guard may become 'troops of the United States' within the meaning of said land grant act is not to be questioned, but, as was said at the bar in this case, it is not the potentiality but the actuality of being in the service contemplated by the Constitution which fixes their status as 'troops.' The meaning of the act under which the claimant must transport troops is not to be restricted to the regular army, nor can it be extended to include the National Guard when not in the service of the United States. The President did not call forth the militia of said states nor direct them to assemble at Chickamauga Park, nor was he their commander-in-chief while they were there. If it should be conceded that while at the joint camp of instruction the National Guard were under the command of officers of the regular army and because thereof were in the service of the United States—a concession we do not make—it would yet seem that such service commenced with their arrival and ended with their departure, and therefore that during the transportation to and from the camp, for which this action is brought, they were not in the service or troops of the United States."

Members of the state militia when not in the service of the United States under the call of the President are not subject to the articles of war of the United States. State v. Peake, 22 N. D. 457, 135 N. W. 197, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 354; Manley v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. 392, 137 S. W. 1137. And see Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 U. S. (L. ed.) 19. It is, however, competent for a state to provide by statute that the militia shall be subject to the articles of war and that its members shall be triable by a general court-martial for a violation thereof. McGorray v. Murphy, 80 Ohio St. 413, 17 Ann. Cas. 444, 88 N. E. 881. And see Dowling v. Lee, 68 Fla. 23, 66 So. 142.

The reported case holds that the provision of the National Defense Act of 1916 (Fed. St. Ann. Pamph. Supp. No. 7, 40) for the administration of a federal oath to members of the militia does not prevent the calling into federal service under an earlier act of a militiaman who has not taken that oath.

OWENS

v.

STATE.

Florida Supreme Court—November 6, 1914.

68 Fla. 154; 67 So. 39.

Jury — Custody and Conduct — Witness for Prosecution as Bailiff.

It is manifestly improper for one who is a material witness for the state in a prosecution for murder, to have charge as bailiff of the jury impaneled to try the case, or to be with or have any communications with such jury. Especially is this true when such party continues to remain with such jury after he has been removed as such bailiff by the court, at the instance of the defendant on trial.

[See note at end of this case.]

Necessity of Excluding Outside Influences.

An impartial jury, selected and kept free from all outside or improper influences, is necessary to a fair and impartial trial.

Same.

In a prosecution for crime which has resulted in a conviction, where it is made to appear that the jury was not kept free from outside or improper influences, and there is a sharp conflict in the evidence upon material points, the judgment may be reversed.

T. W. Fielding and Evans Haile for plaintiff in error.

T. F. West and C. O. Andrews for defendant in error.

[155] SHACKLEFORD, C. J.—H. M. Owens and Alex Powell were indicted and tried for murder in the first degree, which resulted in Alex Powell being acquitted and H. M. Owens convicted of manslaughter. Fifteen errors are assigned, but in view of the conclusion which we have reached it will not be necessary to consider or discuss them all.

We turn to the motion for a new trial, which was overruled and which ruling is assigned as error, and copy the following grounds thereof, which we shall consider together:

"4th. Because one W. F. Beach, a material witness in behalf of the State of Florida, slept in and occupied the same room with the jury that had this defendant in charge.

5th. Because one W. F. Beach, a material witness for the State of Florida, was left in sole charge of the said jury, and escorted said jury to and from supper in a restaurant some distance from the court house, and ate supper with said jury, and had escorted said jury to and from their breakfast and dinner in said restaurant; and at the time of eating supper with said jury, said Beach was at the table with four of said jury, and talked with said four jurors during the time they were eating supper, and for the space of about thirty minutes.

6th. Because W. F. Beach, who was a material witness for the State of Florida, was appointed and designated by P. G. Ramsey, Sheriff of Alachua County, Florida, without the knowledge or consent of defendants, or any of his attorneys, to stay and sleep with the jury that tried this [156] defendant, and the said Beach did stay and sleep with said jury during defendant's trial.

7th. Because one W. F. Beach, a material witness for the State of Florida, during the night of the 29th day of January, A. D. 1914, stayed with and slept in the same room with the said jury, and on that same night one F. M. Cellon was the bailiff over said jury.

8th. Because one F. M. Cellon, being the same F. M. Cellon whom the Judge trying the case, removed on the second day of the trial, after he had slept with the jury trying this defendant, the night before, assisted the prosecuting attorneys in selecting the jury that tried this defendant, and during the trial of this defendant, and while said Cellon was acting as bailiff to said jury, he assisted the attorneys prosecuting this defendant in the prosecution of this defendant, by suggesting questions to said attorneys to ask the witnesses who were testifying, and also assisted said attorneys in prosecuting this defendant by furnishing them with evidence by which they attempted to impeach a witness for this defendant.

9th. Because the said F. M. Cellon stayed with and slept with the jury in the same room, and escorted the jury to and from their meals, before he was removed as bailiff of said jury by the judge.

10th. The said F. M. Cellon was removed by the Judge as bailiff over said jury because of his intense interest exhibited by him during the trial of the case against this defendant, but the said removal was not made until the said F. M. Cellon had already spent one night with said jury in the same room with them, and had escorted said jury to and from several meals, and had eaten with them.

11th. Because said F. M. Cellon, while Aleck Powell was in jail, charged with this defendant for the killing of [157] Splain, tried to extort a confession from said Aleck Powell, a mere lad under 21 years of age, and tried to force said Aleck Powell to make statements charging this defendant with the murder of Splain.

21st. That because P. G. Ramsey, then the Sheriff of said county, volunteered information to the State's Attorney concerning one of the talesmen who was selected as one of the jurors and tendered the defendant by the State, in the presence of all the jurors, clearly showing to the jury his interest in the case against the defendant.

22nd. Because P. G. Ramsey, Sheriff, took an active part in the prosecution of this defendant, H. M. Owens, and so prejudiced this defendant by the appointment of his Deputy, F. M. Cellon, as bailiff, and Permitting W. F. Beach, a personal friend of W. E. Bells, and from Bell's home, to sleep and eat with the jury trying the cause, as to prevent this defendant from having a fair trial.

23rd. Because the Sheriff and his Deputies prevented this defendant from having a fair and impartial trial."

We shall not discuss these grounds in detail.

The transcript of the record shows that the trial of this case was begun on Thursday, the 29th day of January, 1914, and concluded on Saturday, the 31st day of January, when the verdict was rendered. The bill of exceptions discloses that the following proceedings took place:

"Mr. Williams, of counsel for defendants, here stated to the Court that Mr. Cellon, who is the bailiff in charge of this jury, comes forward and whispers to Mr. Broome, who is assisting State's Attorney, in the prosecution, during the trial of this case, and asked for an order of the court that he be removed, and another bailiff be appointed who is not taking an interest in this case. And thereupon [158] State's Attorney stated that Mr. Cellon had not spoken to him during the trial of the case; that if he had spoken to Mr. Broome, it had not been communicated to him. Whereupon Mr. Broome stated that Mr. Cellon had spoken to him with reference to the case. Motion granted, and the Court ordered Mr. Bruton to take charge of the jury."

It would seem that Mr. Cellon was removed as such bailiff on the second day of the trial, though the record is not entirely clear upon that point. We also find the following proceedings in the bill of exceptions:

"Here, during the second day's trial of the defendants, the attorneys for the defendants, in open court and during the progress of the trial, called the Court's attention to the fact that one W. F. Beach was the bailiff to the petit jury that had these defendants in charge, and that was trying these defendants; that said W. F. Beach was acting in a manner extremely hostile towards the defendants, and then and there the attorneys for said defendants moved the court to remove the said W. F. Beach as bailiff to said petit jury, and to place some impartial bailiff in charge of said jury; and thereupon the court granted the motion of the attorneys for the defendants, and removed the said W. F. Beach as bailiff to said petit jury."

Just how Mr. Beach came to act as bailiff we are not advised, but presumably by order of the Sheriff, since the sheriff alone had authority to so order. See Nicholson v. State, 38 Fla. 99, 20 So. 818. It is further disclosed that W. F. Beach, who was a deputy sheriff, was called as a witness by the State in rebuttal and gave material testimony against the two defendants. It further appears, not only from the affidavits filed by the defendant, H. M. Owens, on behalf of his motion for a new trial, but from the examination of Mr. Frank E. Cellon, Mr. W. [159] F. Beach, and Mr. W. T. Bruton, all of whom were deputies of the sheriff, that both Beach and Cellon were in charge of the jury on the night of the 29th of January and that both Beach and Bruton had charge of the jury on the following night, being the only two nights the jury was out during the trial. It also appears that Beach went with the jury to supper on each night, the first night with Cellon and the second night with Bruton, and ate with them, the second night, when he had been removed as bailiff, still being at supper and eating with them. Still other facts and circumstances are made to appear, which we do not deem it necessary to set forth. It is sufficient to say that, while it is not affirmatively made to appear that either Beach or Cellon did actually attempt to influence the jury in any way, and, as a matter of fact each one positively denies having done so, yet it plainly appears that each one had the opportunity of so doing. It was manifestly improper for Beach, who was a material witness for the prosecution, to have charge of or to be with the jury. See People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 3 N. W. 927, 36 Am. Rep. 438, and appended note. We would also refer to Madden v. State, 1 Kan. 340; State v. Snyder, 20 Kan. 306; Gainey v. People, 97 Ill. 270, 37 Am. Rep. 109; Rickard v. State, 74 Ind. 275. We shall not undertake to express any opinion concerning the evidence. Suffice it to say that there is a conflict therein upon material points. This being true, and it plainly appearing that some of the deputies of the sheriff had acted in an irregular and improper manner while in charge of the jury, and it would seem, were over-zealous for the prosecution, we think that the ends of justice would be best subservied by another trial. As was said in Buxton v. State, 89 Tenn. 216, text 217, 14 S. W. 480, "An impartial jury, selected and kept free from all outside or improper influences, has always [160] been regarded by our courts as necessary to a fair and impartial trial."

The other errors complained of need not arise upon another trial, therefore we shall not discuss them.

Judgment reversed.

NOTE.

Prejudice of Officer as Disqualifying Him from Acting as Custodian of Jury.

The majority of the cases decided subsequent to those collated in the note to State v. Oteri, Ann. Cas. 1912C 878, hold that the fact that an officer is a witness for the prosecution in a criminal case does not ipso facto disqualify him from acting as a custodian of the jury. Young Chung v. State, 15 Ariz. 79, 136 Pac. 631; Galan v. State, 68 Tex. Crim. 200, 150 S. W. 1171; Holmes v. State, 70 Tex. Crim. 214, 156 S. W. 1172. Compare the reported case.

In Galan v. State, supra, the custodian was a material witness for the prosecution. It was held that it was not error to allow him to act as bailiff unless there was something done by him which influenced or tended to influence the jury in their verdict, the court saying: "If he did wrong in the matter some fact ought to be stated showing or tending to show such action." In Holmes v. State, supra, the custodian was a witness for the prosecution in a trial for burglary. In declaring him to be eligible, the court said: "If every officer who should be summoned as a witness in a case should thereby be disqualified from performing his official duty, it might occur that there would be no officer to wait on the court. In this case it is not attempted to show any improper conduct on the part of the officer. The court in approving the bill shows that no other deputy was in attendance on court, and the bill presents no error."

The reported case holds that where it appears that the prejudiced custodian had an opportunity to influence the jury, it is ground for a new trial whether the jury were actually influenced or not.

It has been held that the distant relationship of the custodian to the person for whose death the accused was on trial did not serve to disqualify the custodian. Combs v. Com. 160 Ky. 386, 169 S. W. 879. In that case the relationship was very distant, or possibly merely a reputed one. There was no evidence of any misconduct or any prejudice on the part of the custodian, and the accused had assented to the appointment.

MATTER OF ESTATE OF LESTER.

Iowa Supreme Court—February 12, 1915.

169 Iowa 15; 150 N. W. 1033.

Executors and Administrators — Priority of Claim — Funeral Expenses — Cost of Monument.

An expenditure for a monument is not strictly a funeral expense within Code, § 3347, providing that, as soon as the executor or administrator has sufficient means, he shall pay charges of deceased's last sickness and funeral, but even though the estate is insolvent the court may in its sound discretion class such an expenditure as a funeral expense, but postponing it to the payment of such part of a claim for nursing during the last sickness of deceased as is preferred by statute.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Wapello county: HUNTER, Judge.

[15] Proceeding in probate for an order authorizing the administrator to expend $125.00 for a monument for deceased. The court granted the order for a monument in the sum of not to exceed $100.00, but provided that before expending said amount for that purpose the administrator should first pay all funeral expenses and the expenses of the last sickness of the deceased, which should include the sum of $156.00 of the $363.00 claim allowed by the court in favor of Rachel Mead, so far as the administrator has assets in his hands. The administrator, E. M. Lester, appeals. AFFIRMED.

Tisdale & Heindel for appellant.

Steck & Steck for Rachel Mead, appellee.

PRESTON, J.—Appellant is the son and only heir at law and the sole beneficiary under the will of deceased. The showing [16] is that the assets consist of $280.00 in money and a small amount of household goods; that the indebtedness against the estate and admitted claims amount to about $140.00; but that in addition to such claims is the claim of Rachel Mead, which was allowed in the sum of $363.00; $156.00 of the Rachel Mead claim was for nursing the deceased, as we understand the record, and we do not understand appellant to dispute that fact. The objector, Rachel Mead, filed written objections to the granting of the order because the administrator is the son of decedent and had received from his mother, the deceased, all the real estate she owned of the value of from $1,000.00 to $1,200.00, as she says, and for the further reason that the application is not made in good faith, but made for the purpose of preventing Mrs. Mead from making any part of her claim.

The testimony of the administrator shows that the house and two lots deeded to him about 1910 were estimated to be worth from $600.00 to $700.00. The administrator has paid out about $8.00 or $9.00 for witness fees and $5.30 for the funeral dress. The funeral expenses were $90.00. There was also a claim filed for digging a grave, and a livery bill. The total claims filed amount to about $685.00, including the allowance of objector's claim. The funeral expenses have not been paid, nor has anything been paid on Mrs. Mead's claim. The estate is insolvent. The administrator, as a witness admits that there is feeling between himself and his aunt, Mrs. Mead, because of her coming to nurse his mother.

The contention of the appellant is, that the cost of a monument is a part of the funeral expenses under the statute, and that the court should not have preferred Mrs. Mead's claim, or a part of it, as ahead of the expense for monument; that if there is not money enough to pay all the funeral expenses they should be prorated. We have no argument for appellee. Appellant cites a number of cases from this and other states in support of his claim, among them: Hapgood [17] v. Houghton, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 154; Ferrin v. Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315; Fairman's Appeal, 30 Conn. 205. In the Hapgood case the question determined was one of pleading, and the Ferrin case arose on the question of a contract for funeral expenses. In the Connecticut case it was held that tombstones are properly a part of the funeral expenses, but it was said by the court in that case: "We do not intend to hold that an administrator or executor may procure them (tombstones) in all cases at the expense of the estate. If the estate is solvent, we think he should consult the heirs, and have the advice and approbation of the court of probate. If it is insolvent, they certainly should not be obtained without that advice and approbation. In the absence of specific legislation the propriety of obtaining them, and at what expense, may properly be left to the court." Webb's Estate, 165 Pa. St. 330, 30 Atl. 827, 44 Am. St. Rep. 666; Barclay's Estate, 11 Phila. 123, 33 Leg. Int. 108; In re Porter, 77 Pa. St. 43, are cited on the proposition that an allowance for the expenses of a suitable tombstone over the grave of decedent is a legitimate item of credit in the account of an executor. Laird v. Arnold, 42 Hun 136, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 376; Matter of Shipman, 82 Hun 108, 31 N. Y. S. 571, are cited to sustain the proposition that the cost of a suitable monument is properly allowed the administrator as a part of the funeral expenses.

In Kentucky, such is made a part of the funeral expenses by statute. Hespen v. Hespen, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1328, 105 S. W. 99.

In Bendall v. Bendall, 24 Ala. 295, 60 Am. Dec. 469, it is held that the cost of a tombstone, if not prejudicial to creditors, or disproportioned to the estate, is properly allowed as a part of the funeral expenses.

But it was held in Hisem v. Lemel, 19 La. 425, that the cost of erecting a tomb was no part of the funeral expenses. See also: Note, 33 L.R.A. 666, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 572, and note; 18 Cyc. 439.

Our statute provides that as soon as the executor or administrator is possessed of sufficient means over and above [18] the expenses of administration, he shall pay off the charges of the last sickness and funeral of deceased, and next, any allowance made by the court for the maintenance for the widow and minor children. Code Sec. 3347. Under this statute, it has been held by this court, in Crapo v. Armstrong, 61 Ia. 697, 17 N. W. 41: "That a tombstone is a proper expenditure to be made by an executor as pertaining to the funeral expenses, and that such expenditure may be made without any direction by will, and notwithstanding the estate may be insolvent. . . . We think that in the absence of any statutory provision upon the subject, the propriety of obtaining tombstones or monuments, and the amount to be expended therefor, may very properly be left to the circuit court having the supervision of the settlement of the estate." And in Lutz v. Gates, 62 Ia. 513, 514, 17 N. W. 747, it is held that a suitable monument may properly be erected to the memory of a deceased person and the cost thereof paid by the administrator out of the funds of the estate. In Mullinnix v. Brown, 151 Ia. 468, at 475, 131 N. W. 671, it is held that the cost of a suitable monument for one deceased is as properly chargeable against his estate as are the funeral expenses; and that lands may be sold in the absence of a personal estate to meet such claims. Appellant also cites Foley v. Brocksmitt, 119 Ia. 457, 93 N. W. 344, 97 Am. St. Rep. 324, 60 L.R.A. 571, where the court said, referring to funeral expenses: "The law with reference to such matters is well settled and generally understood. Such charges are not, strictly speaking, debts due from the deceased, but charges which the law out of decency imposes upon his estate. And so far as these are reasonable in amount they take legal priority of all such debts; as likewise do the administration charges."

But there was no question in regard to a monument in that case. There can be no question as to the propriety of the allowance of such a claim. Some of the cases outside of Iowa, while holding that the cost of a monument is proper funeral expense, do not decide the point that they are such so as to be a preferred claim ahead of other creditors, and [19] none of the Iowa cases so hold. The Crapo case, supra, seems to hold, inferentially, at least, that such a claim would not come under the statute quoted.

We are of opinion that, while such an expenditure pertains to the funeral expenses, it is not such strictly and so as to come within the provisions of the statute referred to, but we think it may be made so by the court within its sound discretion. One hundred fifty-six dollars of Mrs. Mead's claim, being for nursing, would be a preferred claim as expense of the last sickness, under the statute. The court did not err in requiring the administrator to pay that much of her claim before using any of the funds in his hands to erect a monument. It follows, then, that the order of the district court was right, and it is Affirmed.

AS PART OF FUNERAL EXPENSES.

The cost of a suitable monument or stone, consonant with the value of the decedent's estate, is properly classed under the head of funeral expenses for which the estate is liable. Bendall v. Bendall, 24 Ala. 295, 60 Am. Dec. 469; Van Emon v. Superior Ct. 76 Cal. 589, 18 Pac. 877, 9 Am. St. Rep.

Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315; Moulton v. Smith, 16 R. I. 126, 12 Atl. 891, 27 Am. St. Rep. 728. See also Jaqua v. Gray, 46 Ind. App. 24, 91 N. E. 745; Dudley v. Sanborn, 159 Mass. 185, 34 N. E. 181; Bell v. Briggs, 63 N. H. 592, 4 Atl. 702. Compare In re Ferguson, 81 Ohio St. 58, 89 N. E. 1070; Meyer's Estate, 18 Phila. (Pa.) 42, 43 Leg. Int. 108; Barclay's Estate, 11 Phila. (Pa.) 123, 33 Leg. Int. 108, 2 W. N. C. 447. In Wood v. Vandenburg, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 277, the qualification was made that the cost of a suitable headstone is a part of the funeral expenses in a case where the rights of creditors cannot be defeated thereby. And in Moulton v. Smith, 16 R. I. 126, 12 Atl. 891, 27 Am. St. Rep. 728, it was said that a simple and inexpensive headstone is demanded by the decencies of Christian burial and may be regarded as a part of the funeral expenses.

But it has been held that the cost of a monument or tombstone is not strictly a funeral expense within the meaning of statutes limiting the amount of, or giving priority to, funeral expenses. Sinnott v. Kenaday, 14 App. Cas. (D. C.) 1, reversed on other grounds in 179 U. S. 606, 21 S. Ct. 233, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 339. And see the reported case. Compare Nelson v. Schoonover, 89 Kan. 388, 131 Pac. 147. In Sinnott v. Kenaday, supra, it was held that the expense of erecting a monument was not strictly a part of the funeral expenses, and hence was not within a statute limiting funeral expenses to $300. But in Nelson v. Schoonover, supra, it was held, contrary to the holding in the reported case, that the expense of erecting a suitable monument was to be classed among funeral expenses, within the meaning of a statute giving priority to such expenses.

The cost of a monument is, however, a part of the funeral expenses within the exemption of such expenses from a transfer tax. Matter of Edgerton, 35 App. Div. 125, 54 N. Y. S. 700. See also Matter of Maverick, 135 App. Div. 44, 119 N. Y. S. 914.

It has been held that the cost of a tombstone is not a part of the funeral expenses as defined in the Louisiana statute (Code, Ann. Cas. 1917B.—17.

art. 3159) which provides that "funeral charges are those which are incurred for the interment of a person deceased," but that the curator of an estate will nevertheless be allowed the amount expended by him in erecting a tombstone pursuant to the request of the deceased and with the consent of the heirs. Hisem v. Lemel, 19 La. 425. And it has been held in the same jurisdiction that the expense of the erection of a tomb to a deceased husband is not chargeable to the community property but is to be borne by the estate of the deceased. Smith's Succession, 9 La. Ann. 107.

Although the expense of a monument is a part of the funeral expenses, proper to be made by an executor, it does not follow that the estate may be sued directly on a contract made by the executor for a monument. The executor should be sued personally on his contract, leaving him to recover his allowance out of the estate. Ferrin v. Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315; Hector v. Lavery, 51 App. Div. 74, 64 N. Y. S. 518. Compare Laird v. Arnold, 42 Hun 136, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 376. In Ferrin v. Myrick, the court said: "The contract for the gravestones was proved to have been made. They were of a character suitable to the rank and station in life of the deceased, and to the circumstances of his estate. The defendant, as administrator, had assets in his hands applicable to their payment. Can the action in such cases be maintained against the estate, as a matter of course, or is the remedy against the administrator personally? The administrator contracted for the purchase and delivery of the monument. He had a right to contract for stones suitable to the rank in life of the deceased, and to the estate left by him. He had no right to contract for stones of an unsuitable character. Thus, for the grave of a man leaving an estate of $10,000, or $20,000, monuments of which the expense should be $100 or $200, would very likely be deemed suitable and reasonable. If the same individual should leave an estate of but $500, and a family of small children, an expenditure of several hundred dollars for that purpose, probably would not be deemed suitable or reasonable. . . . Whether the particular article is suitable and reasonable, or otherwise, is a question which the seller is not called upon to decide. That question is not left to his decision. It belongs to the administrator. He decides it at his peril, to be allowed or disallowed, in the final settlement of his accounts with the surrogate. The seller accepts the judgment and decision of the administrator, acts upon his direction, and makes and delivers the stones or the monument upon his direction and upon his agreement. It is, therefore, most reasonable and proper, that the administrator should be liable himself to the seller, although the estate may not ultimately be liable to him, or to anyone else, for the article furnished. Again, it is to be considered that the administrator is not the agent of the testator, or of the estate, and therefore allowed to contract in its behalf." But in Laird v. Arnold, 42 Hun 136, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 376, creditors sued by petition to make real estate assets for the payment of the debt contracted by the administrator for a monument, and the prayer of the petition was allowed.

ALLOWANCE TO PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE.

It is quite generally held that the cost of a tombstone or monument, not disproportionate to the value of the estate, is a valid charge against the estate of a decedent and that the personal representative is entitled to use funds of the estate for that purpose and is properly granted an allowance for such a use of the assets.

South Carolina.—Patterson v. Jones, 99 S. C. 128, 82 S. E. 1008.

Such an expenditure may be made by the personal representative, it has been said, without any direction by will. Crapo v. Armstrong, 61 Ia. 697, 17 N. W. 41; In re Porter, 77 Pa. St. 43. And it may be made although the estate is insolvent. Cornwell v. Deck, 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 87. See also Crapo v. Armstrong, 61 Ia. 697, 17 N. W. 41.

However it has been said that an administrator will not be allowed to procure a monument at the expense of the estate in all cases and as a matter of course, but that he should consult the heirs and have the advice and approval of the court of probate, even if the estate is solvent, and that if it is insolvent the monument certainly should not be procured without that advice and approbation. Fairman's Appeal, 30 Conn. 209. And see Lund v. Lund, 41 N. H. 355. But an allowance of a reasonable expenditure for a tombstone will not be refused simply because the executrix failed to consult all the persons interested in the estate. Titlow's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. 40.

It has been held that, although an executor may bind the estate of the deceased on an implied contract for the cost of a monument, he cannot bind it by express contract, and that if he makes an express contract for the purchase of a monument he will be personally bound, and recovery cannot be had against the estate on the contract. Durkin v. Langley, 167 Mass. 577, 46 N. E. 119.

Real estate of the deceased may be sold by the personal representative under order of court, in the absence of personalty sufficient for the purpose, to defray the expense of the erection of a suitable monument to the deceased. Mullinnix v. Brown, 151 Ia. 468, 131 N. W. 671. See also Nelson v. Schoonover, 89 Kan. 388, 13 Pac. 147. In Mullinnix v. Brown, supra, the court said: "Again, it is said that no order to sell should have been made because of lack of proof of the allowance of any claims save that for the monument, which was secured upon order of court, and that there exists no authority in law for ordering a sale of real estate for the purpose of paying such claims. In this contention counsel are in error. The record does show the allowance of claims against the estate of the deceased for more than the amount of money and personal property in the hands of the administrator. Moreover, we think that real estate left by one deceased may be sold upon proper application for the payment of such debts as well as for the funeral expenses of one deceased. Whilst counsel cite several cases which they claim support their contention, we find none which do so. The cost of a suitable monument for one deceased is as properly chargeable against his estate as are the funeral expenses; and that lands may be sold in the absence of a personal estate to meet such claims is entirely clear."

The construction of a vault for the repose of the dead is as proper as the erection of a monument, and the personal representative of a decedent will be allowed a reasonable allowance therefor. Knapp v. Jessup, 146 Mich. 348, 109 N. W. 666, 117 Am. St. Rep. 646, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 617.

If an executor resists in good faith an action against him personally on a contract for a tombstone, and a recovery is had against him, he may be allowed costs, witness fees, and attorney's fees out of the estate. Matter of Grout, 15 Hun 361.

It has been held that a claimant was entitled to recover against the estate of a decedent the value of a monument made by him under an agreement with the administratrix, and that he might so recover although the monument remained on his own premises and had not yet been erected, the agreement with the administratrix providing that he was not to put the work up until he was paid or his claim was allowed by the orphan's court. Crosson's Appeal, 125 Pa. St. 380, 17 Atl. 423.

It has been held that the court will not affirmatively allow an expenditure to be subsequently made for a monument, but will only pass on the item as a claim after the expenditure has been made. Benner's Estate, 3 Brews. (Pa.) 398.

Injunction will not lie at the suit of the widow, the sole devisee of the deceased, to restrain the executor from erecting a monument to the deceased at a cost of $500. The executor has a lawful right to do so and no irreparable injury is threatened the widow to call forth the interposition of equity. Duffy's Estate, 9 Kulp (Pa.) 409.

By a Kentucky statute (Stats. § 3885) the personal representative or heirs at law may cause to be erected over the grave of the deceased an appropriate memorial tablet, the cost of which shall be allowed as funeral expenses on the settlement of the estate. Hespen v. Hespen, 105 S. W. 99, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1328.

It has been held that the Massachusetts statute authorizing an allowance for a monument was not confined to the case of a monument on a lot bought with the intestate's money, but that it applied equally to a case in which an administratrix bought a lot with her own money and had the intestate's body removed there, after having obtained leave of court to erect the monument on the cemetery lot from which the intestate's body was moved. Dudley v. Sanborn, 159 Mass. 185, 34 N. E. 181. It has been held, however, that the statute applied only to the purchase of a monument by the personal representative and that it did not authorize another person, without the authority of the personal representative, to erect a monument to the deceased and recover the amount of the cost thereof against the estate. Sweeney v. Muldoon, 139 Mass. 304, 31 N. E. 720, 52 Am. Rep. 708, wherein it was said: "The purchase of a tombstone cannot be considered as a part of the charges or necessary expenses of the funeral, within the meaning of these provisions of the statutes. It was not intended that any person might erect a tombstone to the deceased, and charge the administrator with the cost of it, as a debt or a preferred debt against the estate. The necessity for a decent burial arises immediately upon the decease, and the law pledges the credit of the estate for the payment of such reasonable sums of money as are expended for that purpose; but there is no similar necessity for the erection of a tombstone, and, if a tombstone is erected without the authority of the administrator, the statutes have not made the cost of erecting it a debt of the estate. We think it was not the intention of the St. of 1878, c. 228 [P. S. c. 144, § 6; R. L. c. 150, § 12] to authorize another person, without authority from the administrator or executor, to erect a monument to the deceased, and sue the administrator or executor therefor, in an action at law, but merely to authorize an administrator or executor to expend a reasonable sum for that purpose if it becomes necessary, and there are sufficient assets."

By a statute of New Hampshire (G. L. c. 196, § 17) it is provided that "administrators of estates actually solvent may erect monuments at the graves of the testators or intestates, and the reasonable expense thereof shall be allowed them on settlement of their accounts." This statute has been held to include the power to do at the expense of the estate whatever is reasonably necessary to keep a monument in proper condition during the time of administration and to make it as durably suitable and sufficient as its purpose requires. Bell v. Briggs, 63 N. H. 592, 4 Atl. 702. It has been held that although it is proper under the New Hampshire statute for an administrator to erect a plain and simple tombstone, and although with the consent and advice of the heirs he may erect a costly one, yet it is unreasonable and an improper expenditure for the administrator to erect a costly monument, without the consent of the heirs. Lund v. Lund, 41 N. H. 355, wherein the court said: "The charge for a monument is also, we think, too high. If all the heirs had consented, there could have been no impropriety; but, on the other hand, there might have been a marked propriety in thus adorning the final resting place, not only of the intestate, but of his parents and sister; and it would seem that this expense was incurred, probably as much on account of the father and sister, as the son and brother. But administrators are to act in good faith to the heirs, for whom they hold the property of the intestate in trust, and should administer estates economically; and should only furnish such plain and substantial monuments as shall be proper for them to erect with the property of others, without their consent. However proper and commendable it might be for the remaining children to erect beautiful and costly monuments to the memory of their departed parents and friends, yet the offering should be voluntary on the part of all concerned. We think that courts of probate should require that administrators, when they are acting on their own responsibility in furnishing monuments with the money of others, without their consent, should practice strict economy in their expenditures; that they should conform to the provisions of the statute in that particular. The statute provides that administrators of estates actually solvent may erect suitable monuments at the graves of the testators or intestates, and the reasonable expense thereof shall be allowed them on the settlement of their accounts." In Tuttle v. Robinson, 33 N. H. 104, it was held that the statute was not an authorization for expenditures for the fencing of the burial place of the deceased. In Brackett v. Tillotson, 4 N. H. 208, it was held that under the statute an administrator of an insolvent estate would be allowed nothing for the erection of a monument to the deceased. The court said: "The statute of 1826, chap. 43, empowers the judges of probate, in the settlement of the accounts of executors and administrators of estates, actually solvent, to allow such reasonable sums as they may think proper, for the erection of suitable monuments or gravestones at the graves of their testators or intestates. This statute makes a distinction between the case of a solvent, and of an insolvent estate, and in our opinion with good reason. For whatever is allowed to executors and administrators for this purpose, is in fact allowed at the expense of heirs and legatees, or of creditors. And however fit and proper it may be that monuments should be erected at the expense of heirs and legatees, we are not aware of any principle of equity or justice which can require a creditor to contribute anything for the erection of a monument at the grave of his insolvent debtor. This claim of the administrator cannot be allowed."

A statute of Ohio (R. S. § 6185) providing that "the court may also, in settlement, allow, as a credit to the executor or administrator, any just and reasonable amount expended by him for a tombstone or monument for the deceased," has been held not to confer on the probate court jurisdiction to entertain an application to have the court fix a maximum amount to be expended for a monument and to order him to secure such a monument at the expense of the estate in case one is not provided by the widow or next of kin. In re Ferguson, 81 Ohio St. 58, 9 N. E. 1070.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MEMBER OF FAMILY.

By the weight of authority it has been held that where a member of the family of a deceased orders a monument and procures it to be erected over the grave of the deceased, the personal representative having no agency in the matter, the person so procuring the monument is personally liable and the estate of the deceased cannot be held liable for the cost thereof. Foley v. Bushway, 71 Ill. 386 [by the widow of the deceased]; Lerch v. Emmett, 44 Ind. 331 [by the mother of the deceased]; Argo v. Donover, 80 Ia. 214, 45 N. W. 744 [by the brother of the deceased]; Walton v. Hall, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803 [by the widow of the deceased]; Samuel v. Thomas, 51 Wis. 549, 8 N. W. 361 [by the sister of the deceased]. And see Sweeney v. Muldoon, 139 Mass. 304, 31 N. E. 720, 52 Am. Rep. 708. Compare Pease v. Christman, 158 Ind. 643, 64 N. E. 90; Lutz v. Gates, 62 Ia. 513, 17 N. W. 747.

In Argo v. Donover, supra, it appeared that the deceased, shortly before his death, told his brother that he wished a monument erected to him and that the brother, pursuant to that expression of desire, had a monument erected. It was held that the brother could not recover of the estate the amount so expended. The court said: "It is not clear from plaintiff's petition whether he asks to have the claim allowed as for money expended in erecting the monument at the instance and request of deceased, or for the value of the mares, upon the theory that they became his in consideration of his erecting the monument. There is entire lack of evidence to support the claim upon either theory. It does not appear that deceased desired or requested the plaintiff to procure the monument. He simply expressed the desire that a granite monument from seven to nine feet high should be placed over his grave. The inference would be that this desire should be carried out by his administrator. There was certainly no direction or request that the plaintiff should do so." In Samuel v. Thomas, 51 Wis. 549, 8 N. W. 361, it appeared that no administrator had been appointed for five or six months after the death of the intestate and that his sister expended $500 for a tombstone and other expenses connected with interment, that the administrator refused to pay this amount out of the estate without an order of court, and that the court refused to give such order. It was held that the order was properly refused. The appellate court said: "What expenses incurred intermediate the death of an intestate and the granting of letters of administration are legally chargeable to the estate? The answer is, we think, that only such necessary expenditures as from the nature of the circumstances cannot properly be postponed until an administrator shall be appointed, are so chargeable. This rule will, of course, entitle an heir, a legatee, widow or guardian, or even a stranger, who has paid reasonable burial expenses, necessarily incurred before administration could be granted, to be reimbursed from the estate. But, as we understand the law, the rule goes no further. Every expenditure which can decently and reasonably be postponed until an administrator is appointed should be so postponed, and one who, before such appointment, voluntarily incurs an expense for which there is no immediate necessity, does so in his own wrong, and cannot compel the administrator, when appointed, to reimburse him. The common law imposed severe liabilities upon one who, without authority, assumed to act as an executor. It always has been the policy of the law to prevent any unauthorized and unnecessary interference with the estates of deceased persons, and to confide the settlement of such estates to the legally appointed and qualified executors or administrators, acting under the scrutiny and control of the proper courts. Certainly, there was no necessity for Mrs. Samuel to expend $500 upon her brother's grave before letters of administration issued to Mr. Howell. A delay of a few months would have been no disrespect to the memory of the dead, and could furnish no just ground of complaint to his dearest friend. Besides, had the court allowed the administrator to erect so expensive a memorial, it would have seen to it that the brother and the other sister of the deceased should be consulted, and their wishes in regard thereto considered." In Lutz v. Gates, 62 Ia. 517, 17 N. W. 747, it appeared that the administrator did not object to the claim of the widow for an allowance of the cost of a monument which she had ordered, but merely resisted the claim pro forma because of the objections of some of the heirs, other heirs not objecting. The court said: "The widow consulted some of the heirs—those that were convenient—and they consented it should be paid for out of the estate. But, as we understand, there were heirs that were not consulted. There are other facts which, it is claimed, tend to show that the monument is suitable and proper, and that it should be paid for out of the estate. These are not set out, for the reason that we think the facts above stated control the question before us. Since this case was determined in the circuit court, the case of Crapo v. Armstrong, 61 Ia. 697, has been determined by this court, and, following that case, we think the circuit court erred in sustaining the objection to the claim which was, as above stated, that it is not a proper or legal claim against the estate. The estate is solvent, and, if the charge is not a proper one against the estate, it would follow that in no case could a monument be procured at the expense of the estate."

In Pease v. Christman, 158 Ind. 642, 64 N. E. 90, it was held, however, that, inasmuch as the erection of a suitable monument is a part of the funeral expenses of the deceased, a widow who contracts for a monument for her deceased husband should be allowed the amount as a claim against the estate. The court in that case distinguished the case of Lerch v. Emmett, 44 Ind. 331.

Where a sister of a testator bought a marble slab for his grave, and the widow and executrix of the testator, thinking the estate should bear the expense, bought the slab from the sister giving her a note for it, it was held that the claim of the widow to be allowed the amount thereof as executrix out of the estate was properly granted. Menzies v. Ridley, 2 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 544, wherein it was said: "Another item is 24l. 13s. 6d. for a marble slab to the memory of the testator, and which the master has disallowed. The master finds that the late Margaret Campbell, testator's sister, had paid 24l. 13s. 6d. for a marble slab to be erected to the memory of the said testator, and that his widow, subsequently considering that the expense of the said slab should be borne by the estate, gave her promissory note to the said Margaret Campbell for the said sum, which is not yet paid. It does not appear upon what ground the master disallowed this item: whether because the slab had been prepared at the expense of the testator's sister, and so that it might have been erected without expense to the estate, or because Mrs. Menzies has not yet paid the note which she gave to the testator's sister for the amount, or generally, on the ground that an executor cannot claim against an estate the cost of a gravestone or slab. It is not pretended that the slab in question was unsuitable to the degree and station in life of the deceased, or that the cost was unreasonable, considering the estate left behind him. The claim is not contested by creditors, but by the testamentary guardians of the deceased. The circumstance of the slab having been prepared at the expense of testator's sister, is not, I think, a good ground for resisting this claim. The testator's widow was the sole acting executrix of her husband's will; Ridley and McAnnany, though appointed executors, never (as they say in their answers) acted as executors or intermeddled with the estate. She, considering that the expense of the slab ought to be borne by the estate, purchased it of testator's sister. I think she was right in considering that the estate, which was bequeathed to herself and her children, should bear the expense of a slab to the memory of her husband and their father. I think she would have been justified in refusing to allow it to be erected except at their expense; to have procured a slab elsewhere if the one prepared for the sister was unsuitable, or if she had refused to part with it; and consequently that she was justifiable in taking it off the hands of the sister at the expense of the estate."

The estate of a decedent is not liable for the cost of a family monument, contracted for and paid for by two sons of the decedent, and bearing the names of the children and grandchildren of the decedent. Morgan v. Morgan, 83 Ill. 196. And an executor, son of the testatrix, can have no claim upon the estate of the testatrix for the expense incurred by him in the renovation of the tombstones of the grand parents of himself and of the petitioners who oppose the allowance. Bantz v. Bantz, 52 Md. 686.

But where the monument is ordered by members of the family at the express request of the decedent, before his death, the decedent before his death approving the contract and agreeing to pay it, the cost of the monument is a proper claim against the estate of the decedent. Cate v. Cate (Tenn.) 43 S. W. 365.

Propriety or Reasonableness of Expenditure.

IN ABSENCE OF TESTAMENTARY DIRECTION.

In General.

To be allowable as a charge against the estate, the cost of a tombstone must be reasonable, taking into consideration the value of the estate, the amount of the debts, the habits and wishes of the deceased, and similar considerations. Bendall v. Bendall, 24 Ala. 295, 60 Am. Dec. 469; Crapo v. Armstrong, 61 Ia. 697, 7 N. W. 41; Crothers v. Crothers, 123 Md. 603, 91 Atl. 691; Matter of Beach, 1 Misc. 27, 22 N. Y. S. 1079; Matter of Howard, 3 Misc. 170, 23 N. Y. S. 836; Matter of Meuschke, 61 Misc. 9, 114 N. Y. S. 722; Duffy's Estate, 9 Kulp (Pa.) 409; Connelly's Estate, 28 Pittsb. Leg. J. N. S.

(Pa.) 352; Taylor's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. 691; Conway's Estate, 10 Pa. Dist. 509, 18 Lanc. L. Rev. 129; Barclay's Estate, 2 W. N. C. 447, 11 Phila. (Pa.) 123, 33 Leg. Int. 108. In Bendall v. Bendall, supra, the court said: "The principal inquiry should be, is the expenditure for this purpose disproportioned to the means of the estate, or injurious to the interests of the creditors and family of the deceased? Whenever it is ascertained that the estate could well afford the expense, without materially affecting its funds, or injuriously affecting the interests of creditors, or of those who are to take and enjoy it after the death of the testator or intestate, there is no impropriety in allowing the administrator a credit for such expenditure. In this case it is shown that the estate in the hands of the administrator amounted to nearly eight thousand dollars; that there were but few, and these very inconsiderable, debts existing against the deceased, and neither widow or children to be provided for. The estate is bequeathed to collateral relations; and the deceased expressed a desire that his remains should be deposited in a marble vault. Under these circumstances, the administrator might well esteem it his duty to make the expenditure which he has made, and there was no error in allowing him a credit for the sum so expended."

The expenditure by an executor or administrator of an amount for a monument is at his own risk, and the burden is on him to prove that the expenditure was reasonable. Barclay's Estate, 2 W. N. C. 447, 11 Phila. (Pa.) 123, 33 Leg. Int. 108.

The court having jurisdiction over the settlement of decedents' estates has a discretion as to whether an expenditure should be allowed for a monument, and an exercise of this discretion is not reviewable and binds all parties unless it is unreasonable or amounts to an abuse of discretion. Jaqua v. Gray, 46 Ind. App. 24, 91 N. E. 745; Crapo v. Armstrong, 61 Ia. 697, 17 N. W. 41.

The statute of Rhode Island (Pub. Stat. c. 189, § 4) which allows the erection of a suitable monument with the permission of the court of probate, has been held to contemplate something more pretentious than a mere tablet or headstone. Moulton v. Smith, 16 R. I. 126, 12 Atl. 891, 27 Am. St. Rep. 728.

Illustrations.

It has been held that it is unreasonable to erect to the deceased a monument of such a character as to provoke comment on the contrast between the lavishness of the monument and the simplicity of the habits and antecedents of the deceased. Taylor's Estate,

3 Pa. Dist. 691, wherein the court cut down from $1,000 to $100 the credit for the cost of a monument to the deceased, a Quaker, and a man of severely simple habits.

Where the testator has already erected a monument to himself, his executor is not justified in erecting another monument on a different lot merely because the widow of the deceased wishes him to be buried in the other lot. There can be no reasonable expenditure for a monument where the deceased has already provided a monument. In re Woodbury, 40 Misc. 143, 81 N. Y. S. 503.

If the estate is insolvent, the personal representative should not be allowed to expend $42.35 for a tombstone for the deceased. Little v. Williams, 7 Ill. App. 67, wherein the court said: "When an estate is in such insolvent condition that it can pay nothing to general creditors, nothing for physician's bill or other expenses of the last illness of the deceased, and only in part pay that which the law regards a still more equitable and deserving claim, we are of opinion the administrator should not be allowed to expend $42.35 for a tombstone for the deceased. Regard should be paid to the rights of the living."

It has been held that $375 for a tombstone is an unreasonable expenditure when the estate is insolvent, and that the executor cannot recover on so large a claim against the insolvent estate. Burbridge v. Rogers, 7 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 42.

Where an estate amounted to £11,500, and £100 had already been allowed out of it for funeral expenses, an additional allowance of £20 for a tombstone was properly refused by the master. Bridge v. Brown, 2 Y. & C. Ch. (Eng.) 181.

An expenditure of between fifteen and twenty per cent of the gross amount of the estate for curbing the cemetery lot and erecting a monument is grossly disproportionate and an allowance for such an expenditure will not be made. Crothers v. Crothers, 123 Md. 603, 91 Atl. 691.

Where an estate amounted to a total of only $17,000, the allowance of $2,000 for a vault and tomb was held to be unreasonable, and the allowance reduced to $1,000. Matter of Shipman, 82 Hun 108, 31 N. Y. S. 571, wherein it was said: "The surrogate allowed as part of the funeral expenses the sum of $2,000 for the construction of a 'vault and tomb,' and the sum of $580 for a cemetery lot. A reasonable charge for a suitable headstone is proper to be allowed as part of the funeral expenses. (Code Civ. Proc. sec. 2749; Owens v. Bloomer, 14 Hun 296.) The monument, if it be called that, which is allowed for here, was not of the ordinary character. The amount of the real and personal estate altogether was about $17,000. We find no sufficient reason in the facts or in law for the allowance of so large a sum for the purposes stated without express authority in the will. The item of $2,000 should be reduced to the sum of $1,000."

The expenditure of $443 for a tombstone by the administrator of an estate of from $10,000 to $15,000 is reasonable. Laird v. Arnold, 42 Hun 136, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 376.

It is extravagant to erect a $500 monument at the expense of an estate which does not amount to over $8,000, and real estate will not be decreed to be sold to defray such an expense. Owens v. Bloomer, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 296.

Where the assets of the estate do not exceed $3,540, it is unreasonable to expend $1,400 for a monument. Miller v. Morton, 89 Hun 574, wherein the court held that in such a case the total funeral expenses, including the monument, should not reasonably exceed $1,000.

The expenditure of $50 for a headstone is allowable, although the testator had never earned large wages, his estate amounting to between seven and eight thousand dollars. Matter v. Meuschke, 61 Misc. 9, 114 N. Y. S. 722.

Where an estate amounts to over $6,000, it is not unreasonable for the executor to spend $300 for a second tombstone, after having bought a simple inexpensive stone for the first grave of the deceased, from which grave the remains have been removed. Matter of Howard, 3 Misc. 170.

While an expenditure of $400 for a monument, the estate amounting to $8,000, reaches the limit of reasonableness, the executor will be granted an allowance therefor where the rights of creditors have not been impaired and where none of the legatees except the widow makes any objection. Matter of Beach, 1 Misc. 27, 22 N. Y. S. 1079.

It is not unreasonable to spend $200 for a tombstone where the estate amounts to $26,000. Campbell v. Purdy, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 434.

In a case wherein it appeared that an administrator paid $78 for a gravestone, out of an estate of only $983.30, it was held that the amount was excessive and the allowance therefor was reduced to $50. Matter of Mount, 3 Redf. (N. Y.) 9, note.

Where an estate amounted to $2,625.78, it was held to be unreasonable to expend $670 for a monument and only $250 was allowed therefor. Matter of Erlacher, 3 Redf. (N. Y.) 8.

Where an estate was not sufficient to pay all the legacies in full, it was held that $500 was all that was suitable to expend on a headstone to mark the resting place of the deceased. Tickel v. Quinn, 1 Dem. (N. Y.) 425.

Where an unmarried man leaves an estate of $25,000, all of which goes to collateral heirs, an expenditure of $700 for a tombstone for him is not unreasonable or extravagant and will be approved. Conway's Estate, 10 Pa. Dist. 509.

An allowance of $125 for a monument has been held not to be unreasonably small, although the estate amounted to $24,000, considering the fact that because most of the legacies were specific the whole of the payment of the cost of the monument would fall on one beneficiary, the testator's son. O'Brien's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. 198.

Where an estate consisted of two houses and $273.75 in personal property, an allowance of $1,100 for a tombstone was held not to be unreasonable, there being no creditors, and the widow, the recipient of one-half the estate, asking for the monument. Geiger's Estate, 12 W. N. C. (Pa.) 439. But in Hirst's Estate, 12 W. N. C. (Pa.) 323, the court refused to grant a petition for the setting aside out of the assets of the estate of $1,100 for a monument, the application being ex parte, and without citation of interested parties.

UNDER TESTAMENTARY DIRECTION.

Where a testator, in his will, directs his executor to erect a monument, and gives the executor a discretion as to the amount to be expended, that discretion cannot be exercised arbitrarily or in disregard of the rights of heirs and legatees but must be exercised within lawful limits. Matter of Luckey, 4 Redf. (N. Y.) 95; Burnett v. Noble, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 69. In the case first cited objection was made to the final accounting of the executor because he had contracted for a monument to cost $1,475 when the personal estate of the decedent was $11,096. The court held that the expenditure of such an amount was an abuse of the discretion given the executor in the will and cut down the allowance to $700. The court said: "The rights of creditors are not affected by the determination of the question submitted, and it only concerns the residuary legatee, who is a niece of the decedent. And yet, if it shall be held that the executor was authorized, under the terms of the will, to expend the sum named for a monument, he might have expended the whole of the residuary estate. I am not willing to approve the doctrine that a discretion conferred upon an executor by a will is to be exercised without regard to the rights of other legatees, or that it is an uncontrollable discretion. I am of the opinion that when a discretion is conferred upon an executor or trustee, it should be held a discretion to be exercised according to law, and the principles of justice. . . . It seems to me, therefore, that in this case the discretion to be exercised by the executor should be limited to the amount adjudged proper by the well-adjudicated cases in this state, and that the terms of the will do not enlarge the power of the executor beyond that limit, otherwise very great injustice would be done to the parties interested, and a precedent established which would be a fruitful source of fraud. I am of the opinion that considering the estate in question, and the circumstances of the case, that $700 is an exceedingly liberal allowance for the purposes named, . . . and that no greater amount than that should be allowed in this case." In Burnett v. Noble, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 69, it appeared that the testator in his will had directed his executor as follows: "To finish and have made and placed over the graves of myself and husband, in the Evergreens Cemetery, a suitable monument, of a pattern and kind which he may approve of. And I trust to his discretion in the matter, as he understands my wishes." It further appeared that the estate left was not over $2,000. The executor wished to spend $700 on a monument, but the court directed that not more than $250 should be so spent.

But it has been held that under a simple direction in a will that the executor shall erect a suitable monument to the memory of the testator, the discretion of the executor in the matter of the cost of the monument will not be interfered with merely at the objection of the residuary legatee under a charitable bequest, in the absence of gross abuse of such discretion; and it is not such gross abuse as requires intervention of the court for the executor to spend $6,000 for the monument, the estate amounting to over $300,000. Cannon v. Apperson, 14 Lea (Tenn.) 553.

The word monument means a shaft or stone and not a building, so that where a testator sets aside a fund for the erection of a monument his executor is not justified in using the fund for the erection of a memorial building or other form of memorial. Faucher v. Faucher, 156 Cal. 13, 19 Ann. Cas. 1157, 103 Pac. 206, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 944; Ogden's Petition, 25 R. I. 373, 55 Atl. 933. In Faucher v. Faucher, supra, the court said, adopting the remarks of the judge of the department court: "He left the fund of $25,000 to be used by his executors for funeral expenses for the proper interment of his remains and for a suitable monument to his memory. There is nothing in this language to indicate that the testator used the word 'monument' in any other than its natural and specific meaning, which is that of 'a pillar, statue, shaft or any structure placed over a tomb or at a grave.' (Standard Dictionary.) In its applied sense, a monument being a 'reminder' may take any form. Napoleon's battles are a monument to his memory. Horace by his poetry 'built himself a monument more enduring than brass,' and Sir Christopher Wren in his oft-quoted epitaph, 'Si monumentum requiris, circumspice,' declares St. Paul's cathedral to be his monument. Yet, as suggested by the supreme court of Rhode Island in Ogden, Petition [25 R. I. 373] 55 Atl. 933, if one were to say that he had seen Napoleon's or Horace's or Wren's monument, the mind would call up some memorial shaft or column, and not the victories of one, the poetry of another, or the cathedral of which the third was the architect. So it is said in Cincinnati Soc. Appeal, 154 Pa. St. 621, a monument may take the shape of a memorial hall or other building, but that is not the general sense of the word, and will not be presumed to be its meaning." In the case of In re Ogden, 25 R. I. 373, 55 Atl. 933, it appeared that the testator had set aside a fund for the erection of a memorial monument to soldiers. The court held that the amount thus set aside could not be used in the erection of a memorial building.

Where the testator directs in his will that a monument shall be erected, authorizing his executors to spend $5,000, and no more, it is not necessary that the whole of the $5,000 shall be spent for the purpose. Canfield v. Canfield, 62 N. J. Eq. 578, 50 Atl. 471, wherein the court said: "I think it was not the intention of the testator to require the expenditure for this one object of the full sum of $5,000. He intended that the monument, lot, fence and inscriptions should not together exceed $5,000. He says this in so many words, but he does not say that this sum must be spent if neither lot, fence nor inscription were necessary. He had no definite sum in mind for the cost of the monument alone. This might have been greater or less, as the cost of the other things was more or less. Again, he 'reserves' the sum of $5,000, to be expended in building the monument 'as hereinafter directed.' There is no explicit direction to dispose of all the money in that way only. The final direction is that they 'are authorized and empowered' to expend that sum and no more. On the whole, I do not think that, taking this obscurely worded codicil as a whole, it requires such a construction as to compel the expenditure of more money than is reasonably sufficient to effect the object which testator had in view, viz., the erection of a suitable granite monument, laid upon a foundation six feet in depth, properly inscribed and protected. This object, it is conceded, has been attained, and the work has been done under the direction of the widow to whom he gave, with a trifling exception, the enjoyment of all his property for her life, and in whom he had, presumably, the fullest confidence."

Where a will directs the executors to expend not over $2,000 in the repair of the cemetery lot, it is not an act in excess of this authority for the executors, after having erected a sarcophagus at the cost of $500, to exchange the monument for a better one at a cost of $935.05. In re Frazer, 92 N. Y. 230, wherein it was said: "The will directed the executors to expend a sum not exceeding $2,000 in the repair of the cemetery lot of W. H. Smith, who was testator's father-in-law, and that his body should be kept in a receiving vault in LeRoy until such repairs be made. After his death a sarcophagus was erected upon the lot at a cost of $500 and his remains placed therein. After this, the monument on the lot was exchanged for a better one, headstones to graves erected, and coping replaced at a further cost of $935.05. This last expenditure is objected to on the ground that a new monument was not 'in repair' of the lot, and there being a sarcophagus there was no need of a monument. It can scarcely be necessary to review a discretion exercised by the executors and kept within the limit fixed by the testator himself. What was done was plainly within the authority of the will and was reasonably and fairly executed."

It is unreasonable to spend $1,050 for a monument to a deceased who has left an estate of only $2,410, where the will authorizes the executor to erect a monument of New England granite of sufficient size to cut a dozen names thereon, with dates; and since the language of the will is unambiguous, declarations of the deceased cannot be introduced to justify an extravagant outlay for the monument. Matter of Smith, 75 App. Div. 339, 78 N. Y. S. 130, 11 N. Y. Ann. Cas. 427, wherein it was said: "The entire estate of the deceased amounted to only $2,410, and the executor has expended the sum of $1,050 for a monument and the expenses incidental to lettering, setting and fencing it. The excuse presented for this extravagant outlay is that the wishes of the testator, as expressed in the will and during his lifetime, could not be carried out for less money. In determining the testator's wishes we are limited to the language of the will. The will being entirely clear and unambiguous in its terms, there was neither necessity nor justification for resorting to extrinsic evidence. But, on the hearing, the executor was not only permitted to produce witnesses to testify that the deceased had said in his lifetime that he was going to put the whole of his property in a monument, but the executor himself was permitted to testify in his own behalf to conversations with him in which he said that he didn't care if his monument took the whole of his property; that he wished to astonish the people. The evidence of the executor was properly subject to the additional objection taken by the contestant that it was incompetent under section 829 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and its admission constituted reversible error. The language of the will was explicit. The executor is merely authorized and empowered to purchase and erect in the testator's burial plot a monument of New England granite of sufficient size to cut thereon a dozen names mentioned in the will, with dates of birth and death, and also to erect a suitable and proper fence around the plot with granite posts. There was evidence that this could have been done at a very considerable less expenditure than that which has been actually incurred, and it was the duty of the executor to see that the work was performed within the limits for such a purpose which the law imposes in the case of a small estate. The use by the testator of the words 'suitable and proper' indicates a comprehension of the propriety of limiting the expenditure to an amount proportionate to his means and station. It is conceded that the charge made is reasonable for the material furnished and the work done, but the objection is, and it appears on the record to be a valid one, that the expenditure has been incurred without regard to the meagre nature of the estate, and the rights and interests of the residuary legatee."

In Matter of Young, 92 Misc. 633, 157 N. Y. S. 494, there was involved the following testamentary direction: "I direct my executor after paying the above bequests, out of the balance of my money on deposit in the Bowery Savings Bank and Seamans Savings Bank, that said balance shall be used to defray funeral expenses and the erection of a monument over my grave." It was held that it was not required that the whole of the bank balance should be expended for funeral expenses and the erection of a monument. The court said: "The provision now under consideration does not, in my opinion, in terms require that all of the balance shall be expended for funeral expenses and the erection of a monument, and I believe that the intent of the testatrix was that so much of the balance as would be reasonable, having in mind her station in life and the amount of her estate, should be used to defray the funeral expenses and to pay for a monument. The executor states that he knew the decedent for a number of years before her death, being related to her husband; that she lived with one of her daughters in a very frugal way and that her habits of life were modest and simple. These are facts which he should take into consideration in deciding how much to spend for a monument. As a guide to him I will say that a monument such as she purchased for her deceased husband would not be unreasonable in my opinion. I do not think that it is necessary for me to fix the cost of such monument arbitrarily, particularly when the executor himself has an intimate knowledge of the circumstances of the decedent. I therefore find that the intent of the testatrix was as above stated and that as to any balance remaining in the hands of the executor after the payment of debts, legacies, expenses of administration and funeral expenses and after paying for a monument, the decedent died intestate, and such balance is distributable in accordance with the statute governing distribution of personal property."

But where a testator, after giving several legacies, provided that "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, after the decease of my said mother, and the payment of said bequests, I direct my said executor to appropriate and use for and in the erection and construction of a suitable monument at my grave, such as the amount of funds in his hands will warrant," it was held that the last clause did not impose any qualification of reasonableness on the general direction to use all the residue and that there was, therefore, no just ground of complaint at the use by the executor of practically all the residue for the purchase of the monument. Bainbridge's Appeal, 97 Pa. St. 482, wherein the court said: "In the exercise of this power, the executor selected a monument which cost seven hundred and fifteen dollars, being about ninety dollars less than the residuary estate. The court sustained him in so doing. This presents the ground of complaint. It is contended the language of the will does not justify the expenditure of so large a sum. It is claimed to be more than 'the amount of funds in his hands will warrant.' This is an attempt to give undue weight to that clause and make it paramount to the previous clause appropriating the whole fund. It should be construed in connection with, and subordinate to, the former clause. He had therein directed his executor to appropriate and use 'all the rest, residue and remainder' of his estate for the purpose named. The whole fund was 'in his hands' for that purpose. The last clause was not intended to take from him the right to so use the whole fund. The word 'suitable' manifestly related to the form and style of the monument, which was left to the discretion of the executor, with the cautionary direction to have due regard to the amount of the funds. There is absolutely nothing indicating he may not use the whole fund. There is no devise over of any part thereof. The reason therefor evidently is that he expected all of it would be expended for the specific purpose named. Why then shall not due effect be given to an intention so clearly expressed? May not the testator have said to the appellant as the good man of the house said to the laborer, 'is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?' We will not consider the wisdom or the folly of this disposition. He had a right to make it. He did make it, according to the forms of law. He gave the fund and clearly expressed his intention as to its use. We see no cause to set at naught his will or to impair its force. The executor made his election under it. The court confirmed his action. The appellant has no just ground of complaint."

In the case of In re Porter, 77 Pa. St. 43, it appeared that the testator left a large estate, leaving $50,000 to found a college, $6,000 for the purchase of useful books, and $5,000 for the improvement of his cemetery lot, the purchase of a monument and the building of a cut-stone wall, and the $5,000 had been practically used up in the construction of the cut-stone wall. It was held that the executors should be allowed to retain an additional $5,000 for the purchase of a monument consonant with the wall, especially in view of the fact that the intention to found the college had been defeated and that the heirs and next of kin who had become entitled were not special objects of the testator's bounty.

Where a testator provided in his will for the erection of a suitable tablet to his memory, not to exceed $1,500, and also for the erection of a monumental tablet to his three deceased wives, it was held to be proper for the executors to expend $3,000 for a single monument to the testator and to his wives, the estate amounting to $200,000. Archer v. Severn, 13 Ont. 316.

Where a testator left an estate of $1,200, and in his will left to his executor all his property of every kind and description for the payment of his funeral expenses and the erection of a monument to his memory, it was held that the testator did not intend that all his estate should be expended for the purpose, and the court fixed $150 as a reasonable amount, directing that the rest should go in distribution. Emans v. Hickman, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 425.

Estate of Deceased Married Woman.

It is the duty of a husband to pay the expenses of the burial of his deceased wife, and the erection of a suitable stone or mark of identification is included within this duty. Therefore, as a general rule, her estate is not liable for the cost of a tombstone or monument and her personal representative will not be granted an allowance for the cost thereof. In re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345, 34 Pac. 825; Stonesifer v. Shriver, 100 Md. 24, 59 Atl. 139. And even if the erection of a tombstone is not deemed a part of the suitable burial of the wife, the husband, of course, cannot recover against her estate for expenditures therefor, for it is then only to be required as a tribute, or gift, by him to her memory. Stonesifer v. Shriver, 100 Md. 24, 59 Atl. 139.

This rule is, however, not absolute but is to be governed by the circumstances, and if the husband is a poor man, and the deceased wife leaves a considerable estate, a reasonable amount should be allowed her personal representative for the erection of a tombstone, taking into consideration the rank and condition of the deceased in society. In re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345, 34 Pac. 825.

Where a feme covert, in her will, sets apart a fund for the erection of a monument over her grave, a reasonable amount for such an expense is properly allowed out of her estate. In re Koppikus, 1 Cal. App. 84, 81 Pac. 732.

GRIFFIN

v.

UNION SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Washington Supreme Court—August 11, 1915.

86 Wash. 605; 150 Pac. 1128.

Evidence — Ambiguity in Writing — Effect of Use of Printed Letterhead.

Where a contract of guaranty was written on a letterhead of a bank, which showed the names and official capacities of the various officers, and was signed by one who appended the word "manager" after his signature, but there was nothing to show that the manager intended the bank to be bound, the word "manager" must prima facie be taken as mere descriptio personae, though it creates sufficient ambiguity to admit parol evidence as to the intention of the signer.

[See note at end of this case.]

Corporations — Liability on Contract by Agent — Manner of Signing.

Where a contract was signed by one who described himself as manager of defendant bank, plaintiff has the burden of proving, there being nothing else to show that defendant was bound, that it was the intention of the signer to bind the bank.

Same.

Where a manager had no authority to execute a contract of guaranty for his bank, that fact is evidence that a contract signed by him as manager was intended only as his personal obligation.

Same.

A bank is held not to be bound by a contract signed by its manager as such.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county:
ALBERTSON, Judge.

Action by E. W. Griffin, plaintiff, against Union Savings and Trust Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

McClure & McClure and Doncorth & Todd for appellant.

Wm. Parmelee for respondent.

[606] ELLIS, J.—This is an action to recover the sum of $2,605.75, the amount of two drafts drawn by the plaintiff, Griffin, on the Chena River Mining Company, payment of which it is alleged was guaranteed by the defendant by a letter of guaranty given to the plaintiff by one O. B. Woolley, who was at that time the manager of the defendant's branch bank at Renton, Washington. The guaranty was written on a letter-head of the branch bank, at the top of which was printed the name of the trust company, the names and the official capacities of its various officers, and Woolley's name, as manager of the Renton branch. The letter was dated at Renton, Washington, June 20, 1912, and, omitting the printed heading, reads as follows:

"E. W. Griffin, Esq.,

"Fairbanks, Alaska.

"Dear Sir: This is to guarantee payment to you for any and all drafts drawn by the Chena River Mining Co. upon themselves for an amount not exceeding five thousand—$5,000.00—dollars. Said drafts are for work to be done on their property between the dates of September 1st, 1912, and June 1st, 1913.

Yours truly,

"O. B. Woolley, Manager."

None of the officers of the defendant had any knowledge of the giving of this guaranty, nor any knowledge of Woolley's relations to the mining company.

The circumstances leading up to the giving of the guaranty are briefly these: Griffin, Struthers, Hightower and Woolley, owned the majority of the capital stock of the Chena River Mining Company and were desirous of developing the claims held by that company in Alaska. Woolley was secretary and treasurer of the company with a prospective salary of $8,000 a year. Griffin was a merchant operating a store in the vicinity of the claims, and while in Seattle on his way to Alaska from a trip to the east, he was approached by Struthers and requested to act as Alaska agent for the mining company and to advance funds to [607] finance the development of the claims. Griffin refused to do this unless indemnified. While Griffin, prior to this time, had no acquaintance with Woolley and claims that he did not know Woolley had any interest in the mining corporation, it seems that he did know that Struthers and Hightower were doing their banking business with the Renton branch of the defendant. Upon being asked by Struthers if the bank's guaranty would be satisfactory to him, he replied in the affirmative. Griffin testified that, on the day he left for Alaska, he telephoned to Woolley at Renton that he wanted the guaranty before leaving. He did not testify that he told Woolley that he required the bank's guaranty or that a personal guaranty would not suffice. Later in the day, Woolley brought to Griffin in Seattle the guaranty above set out, saying as he handed it to him: "Here is this guaranty." Touching what occurred at this time, Griffin testified:

"I don't recall the exact words; I could not say; I don't think we had any talk about it; he simply handed it to me; he probably said, 'Here is this guaranty what I was to give you;' I know I telephoned him that day that I was going away and wanted that guaranty before I left and he promised that he would come right down with it that afternoon, so when he came down he simply handed it to me and said, 'Here is this guaranty;' now, that is my recollection of the circumstances in connection with it."

Griffin left the guaranty with one Shallenberger, his agent in Seattle, and returned to Alaska. Thereafter, from time to time, he honored orders drawn on him by the men in charge of the work on the claims, in the aggregate amount of the two drafts in question, and, to reimburse himself, drew the drafts and sent them to Shallenberger for collection. Shallenberger presented them to Woolley for payment, but Woolley withheld payment at that time in order to secure the approval of Struthers, for the reason that the drafts were drawn on the bank instead of the mining company as agreed. Shallenberger finally procured drafts properly [608] drawn and presented them to the bank for payment. In the meantime, Woolley had been deposed from his position as manager and the bank refused payment. The plaintiff then brought this action to recover the amount of the drafts from the bank. It was tried by the court without a jury. The court found in favor of the plaintiff and entered judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals.

The appellant contends that the contract of guaranty, if intended to bind the bank, was ultra vires and void; that Woolley had neither actual nor apparent authority to bind the bank by this guaranty, and that it was respondent's duty to inquire as to Woolley's authority; and finally, that the contract of guaranty was not executed by or on behalf of the bank, but was on its face the personal contract of Woolley alone, which fact could not be disputed by parol testimony. It is obvious that if this last claim be found correct, it will be unnecessary to consider the others.

It is but fair to the trial court to say that this last point was not very distinctly raised in the court below. It was, however, presented by the pleadings, and there was an objection to the admission of the guaranty in evidence on the ground of incompetency. The question is presented and argued in the briefs on both sides, and the respondent has raised no objection to its consideration here on the ground that it was not sufficiently presented in the court below. We must, therefore, consider it.

It will be noted that the writing itself presents nothing whatever to indicate any connection of the bank therewith, except the fact that it is written upon its letter-head and that the word "manager" is appended to Woolley's signature. The respondent contends, and the trial court seems to have entertained the view, that these two circumstances establish as a fact that Woolley was acting in his capacity as manager and intended to bind the appellant by this guaranty.

[609] The only decision cited as supporting this theory is People's Bank v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 181, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 907. In that case the guaranty was written below one of the defendant's letter-heads and was signed "M. D. Buchanan, Vice-President." In the guaranty, occurred the following language:

"In accordance with your telegram I herewith hand you ten notes of $5,000 each, etc. . . . We debit your account $50,000. . . . This bank hereby guarantees the payment of the principal sum and interest of said notes."

The notes were also indorsed:

"Pay to the order of the People's Bank of Belleville. Henry E. Picket. This bank hereby guarantees the payment of this note, principal and interest, at maturity. M. D. Buchanan, Vice-President Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago."

The words, "This bank hereby guarantees," found in both the separate guaranty and in the indorsement, show beyond question that the signer, however defectively the form of his signature expressed that purpose, intended to bind the bank and not himself personally. This alone is sufficient to distinguish the case from that before us. But in addition to this, it also appears that the guaranty was given with the knowledge and consent of the president and cashier of the bank, both of whom were directors, as was also the vice-president who signed it. Moreover, the plaintiff's account with the defendant was debited with the full amount of the face of the notes, the defendant thus receiving and retaining the full benefit of the transaction. The court, of course, held that the defendant was estopped to deny that the guaranty was its own. The distinction from the case here is too plain to require further comment.

There are many decisions which hold that the words agent, manager, trustee, treasurer and the like, affixed to the signature of the person who executes a simple contract, when the instrument itself does not clearly indicate that it was [610] made on behalf of some one other than the signer, are at least prima facie, mere descriptio personarum. Pershing v. Swenson, 58 Minn. 310, 59 N. W. 1084; Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 18 Pac. 320, 9 Am. St. Rep. 193; Barker v. Mechanic F. Ins. Co. 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 94, 20 Am. Dec. 664; Gavazza v. Plummer, 53 Wash. 14, 101 Pac. 370, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1. It is now, however, quite generally held, especially as to unsealed instruments, or where, as here, the use of seals has been abolished by statute, that the question is one of intention, and that the word agent, or any other word indicating a representative capacity, affixed to the name of the signer, when the intent cannot be clearly gathered from the recitals of the instrument itself, imports into the instrument such an ambiguity as to permit a resort to extrinsic evidence to determine the true intention of the parties. Southern Pac. Co. v. Von Schmidt Dredge Co. 118 Cal. 368, 50 Pac. 650; Smith v. Alexander, 31 Mo. 193; Hardy v. Pilcher, 57 Miss. 18, 34 Am. Rep. 432; Metcalf v. Williams, 104 U. S. 93, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 665. See also note to Gavazza v. Plummer, 53 Wash. 14, 101 Pac. 370, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 16. The statement which more nearly harmonizes with the different shades of meaning conveyed in the various decisions than any other which we have been able to find, and which we conceive to be in consonance with the better reasons, is that found in Pratt v. Beaupre, 13 Minn. 187, 190, as follows:

"The rule is, that when words which may be either descriptive of the person, or indicative of the character in which a person contracts, are affixed to the name of a contracting party, prima facie, they are descriptive of the person only; but the fact that they were not intended by the parties as descriptive of the person, but were understood as determining the character in which the party contracted, may be shown by extrinsic evidence; but the burden of proof rests upon the party seeking to change the prima facie character of the contract."

The following decisions voice the same rule: Rhone v. Powell, 20 Colo. 41, 36 Pac. 899; Lewis v. Mutual L. Ins. [611] Co. 8 Colo. App. 368, 46 Pac. 621; Keeley Brewing Co. v. Neubauer Decorating Co. 194 Ill. 580, 62 N. E. 923.

The last case cited is also further instructive as showing that the mere use of the letter-head of the supposed principal is wholly insufficient to show an intention to charge the principal, or to dispense with the necessity to resort to evidence aliunde to establish the real intention. In that case a proposal was written below the letter-head of the decorating company which read, "We propose, etc.," and was signed by the alleged agent in his own name followed by the words "Mfg. Agt. & Supt. of Contracts." The other party, having accepted the proposal, sought, as here, to hold the decorating company on the contract so created. The court said:

"The words 'Mfg. Agt. & Supt. of Contracts,' following the signature of D. E. Livermore, are mere descriptio personae. (Braun v. Hess, 187 Ill. 283.) There is, however, enough uncertainty upon the face of the agreement to admit parol proof of who was intended to be bound as principal (Vail v. Northwestern L. Ins. Co. 192 Ill. 567), and the burden of proof was upon the appellant to show that the Neubauer Decorating Company, and not Livermore, was the principal in the contract. The appellant failed to sustain such burden of proof."

We hold that the guaranty here in question was prima facie the personal undertaking of Woolley alone, that the fact that it was written under the letter-head of the appellant and Woolley's official title "manager" was appended to his signature created sufficient ambiguity as to his intention to admit of parol evidence, and that the burden of proof was upon the respondent to overcome by competent evidence the prima facie import of the instrument.

A careful consideration of the entire record convinces us that the respondent has not sustained this burden. There is not a word of testimony that Woolley himself intended to bind the appellant by this guaranty or that he was ever asked to give a bank guaranty. Griffin did not testify that [612] he himself ever at any time told Woolley that he wanted a bank guaranty. Though he testified that he did tell Struthers and Hightower that he would accept a bank guaranty, there is no evidence that either Struthers or Hightower ever requested a bank guaranty from Woolley or told him that Griffin had demanded or expected to receive a bank guaranty. There is nothing in evidence raising an implication that Griffin had any reason, because of any antecedent custom or course of dealing with Woolley or with the bank, to rely upon this instrument as binding the bank. He had never had any dealings with Woolley or with the bank, and there is no evidence that Woolley ever gave to any one on behalf of the bank any guaranty of any kind. There is not a single circumstance in evidence having any reasonable tendency to estop the appellant from disputing liability upon this guaranty. It received no benefit from it, and there is no competent evidence that it was intended, either by Woolley or by any one else, that it ever would receive any such benefit. The evidence is clear that Woolley, as manager of the branch bank, had no actual authority to execute this, or any guaranty on its behalf. While this fact would not be important as binding upon Griffin had the guaranty been so drawn as to be clearly intended to bind the appellant, since Griffin would then have had the right to rely upon the fact that the giving of such a guaranty was within the apparent scope of Woolley's authority as manager, the lack of actual authority is nevertheless important as bearing upon the question of Woolley's intention in giving the guaranty. The very fact that he had no such authority is some evidence that he never intended to bind the appellant by this instrument, prima facie his personal undertaking. Smith v. Alexander, 31 Mo. 193.

Another circumstance strongly tending to show that the appellant cannot be bound by this guaranty and that there was no intention on Woolley's part that it should be, is found in the fact that it received no consideration whatever for [613] the giving of the guaranty. It does appear that, at the time the guaranty was given, the Orillia Lumber Company, a corporation, doing business in King county, was, and long had been, heavily indebted to the Renton branch of the appellant trust company, and that Woolley, by a system of false bookkeeping, had concealed from the officers and directors of the appellant the existence of a large part of this indebtedness. Struthers and Hightower were the sole stockholders of the Orillia Lumber Company, and Woolley, apparently in the hope of receiving sufficient money from them through a sale of the mining claims to discharge this excess indebtedness, entered into an agreement with them reading as follows:

"This indenture or agreement made and entered into on this 13th day of May, 1912, by and between W. E. Hightower and Fred J. Struthers, each of whom own a one-half interest in the Orillia Lumber Company and are representing the Orillia Lumber Company, a corporation, and as parties of the first part, and O. B. Woolley, duly authorized agent of the Union Savings and Trust Company, a corporation (Renton branch), party of the second part, Witnesseth:

"That as said party of the first part, the Orillia Lumber Company, a corporation, is indebted to the Union Savings and Trust Company in the sum of $....., and that as said Hightower and Struthers are interested in selling their interests in the Chena River Mining Company, a corporation, and expect to receive a large sum of money out of the sale of said mining company, it is hereby agreed: That upon the sale of said mining company, and in consideration and upon payment or payments for the sale of said mining property, that all of the first moneys received for the sale of said property shall be turned and paid over to either the Union Savings and Trust Company, or paid to O. B. Woolley, and that money to be paid to said party of the second part by said parties of the first part or their agents until all of said above sums of money due to said party of the second part shall be paid in full. And it is further agreed: That parties of the first part shall not receive any of the moneys paid in said sale until all of the said sums of money, both principal and [614] interest, are paid in full and all notes and debts cancelled.

"Witness our hands and the corporate seal of said corporations the day and year first above written.

"(Signed) Orillia Lbr. Co.

"By W. E. Hightower.

"J. Fred Struthers.

"C. B. Woolley."

It is argued that this agreement was made for the benefit of the appellant and that, therefore, it served as a sufficient consideration proceeding to the appellant to sustain the giving of the guaranty here in question. It must be borne in mind, however, that this agreement was entered into sometime before the giving of the guaranty was thought of, and that its existence, as well as the excessive indebtedness of the Orillia Lumber Company to the branch bank, was concealed from the officers of the appellant. Moreover, this agreement was also signed by Woolley personally, and was so worded as to make it of doubtful value to the appellant, except by the grace of Woolley, even had a sale of the mine been made. The guaranty here in question makes no reference to this agreement, and there is not a word of testimony in the record indicating that the guaranty was given because of this agreement, or that this agreement was ever intended to operate as a consideration for the guaranty. We are constrained to hold that the respondent has wholly failed to overcome by any competent evidence the prima facie import of the guaranty as that of Woolley alone.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded with directions to dismiss the action.

Morris, C. J., and Main and Crow, JJ., concur.

FULLETON, J. (dissenting).—In my opinion the evidence justifies the conclusion that the guaranty given by Woolley to the respondent was understood to be, and was in fact, the guaranty of the appellant bank, and not the personal guaranty of Woolley. For this reason, I dissent from the conclusion of the majority.

NOTE.

Evidentiary Effect of Use of Printed Letterhead or Billhead.

While statements embodied in a printed letterhead or billhead fall within the rule that written matter in a contract controls that which is printed (see the note to Atlantic Terra Cotta Co. v. Goetzler, Ann. Cas. 1913E 958), the heading is not wholly without importance. The reported case holds that the fact that a writing, signed by an individual with the addition of words descriptio personae, bears the printed letterhead of a corporation creates such an ambiguity as to admit parol evidence of an intention to bind the corporation. That holding finds support in Keeley Brewing Co. v. Neubauer Decorating Co. 194 Ill. 580, 62 N. E. 923, stated at length in the reported case. See also Reif v. Commercial Cabinet Co. 185 Ill. App. 577. The same rule was applied to an individual signature without suffix in Towers v. Stevens Cattle Co. 83 Minn. 243, 86 N. W. 88, the court saying: "It is earnestly contended for defendant that inasmuch as this, as well as letters to plaintiff, was signed by George H. Stevens individually, the contract was necessarily made with him, and not with the cattle company. It does not follow, as an absolute matter of law, that, because such letters were signed in Stevens' individual name, he did not use his signature for or in behalf of the corporation, if such an understanding and intent can be gathered from the acts of the parties and the entire correspondence, taken together in connection with the subject-matter of the deal. The important fact appears that all letters signed in this case by Stevens in his individual name were written upon defendant's letterheads, whereon he was designated as the president and manager of the corporation, and relate to property he did not then own, but the corporation did, while no claim or attempt was made to show that Stevens owned any cattle to which an individual transaction between himself and plaintiff would apply. The plaintiff wrote some letters to Stevens, as well as to the company, all about the same subject-matter (commissions for securing purchasers); and while Stevens answered all letters in his own name, which well might have been a custom adopted and pursued by him in the business of the corporation, yet it does not appear that any distinction with reference to a different ownership of the property to which commissions were to apply was ever suggested in the correspondence, and it is apparent that plaintiff supposed he was to act for the defendant in procuring purchasers of the corporate property. The court below had the whole correspondence before it, and, upon the entire record, we think there was evidence to support its view that such letters showed 'corporate earmarks,' in the deal between the cattle company and the plaintiff; hence the finding of the trial court should be sustained, unless it can be held, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff, in attempting to deal with the corporation, through its manager in charge of its business, with reference to the corporate property, is concluded absolutely by the individual signature of the manager in the letters referred to. We do not think that such a rule finds support in the decisions of this or other courts. In such a case the whole transaction evidenced by the acts of the parties in connection with the whole correspondence should be taken together, and the sense in which the signature was used is a matter of proof." In Musser v. Johnson, 42 Mo. 74, 97 Am. Dec. 316, there was involved an assignment written on the letterhead of a railroad company and signed by two persons designating themselves as "Prest." and "Sec'y." The court said: "When the instrument bears no marks of an official character upon its face, there is great difficulty in applying the rule; but where marks of an official character not only exist, but actually predominate, the case is shorn of all perplexity. The assignment in this case is headed and dated at the company's official place of transacting business; and although the officers use the plural 'we,' instead of naming the company, as the contracting party, it sufficiently appears that they were acting officially for the company, and intended to bind it."

On the same principle, the fact that a bill or note signed by an individual is written below a printed heading which includes a corporate or firm name is sufficient to take the instrument out of the rule relating to the liability of an agent failing to disclose his principal. Hitchcock v. Buchanan, 105 U. S. 416, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 1078; Continental Nat. Bank v. Heilman, 81 Fed. 36, affirmed 86 Fed. 514. 30 C. C. A. 232; Sayre v. Nichols, 7 Cal. 535, 68 Am. Dec. 280; Waugh v. Suter, 3 Ill. App. 271; Akron Second Nat. Bank v. Midland Steel Co. 155 Ind. 581, 58 N. E. 833, 52 L.R.A. 307; Slawson v. Loring, 5 Allen (Mass.) 340, 81 Am. Dec. 750; Fuller v. Hooper, 3 Gray (Mass.) 334; Carpenter v. Farnsworth, 106 Mass. 561, 8 Am. Rep. 360; Chipman v. Foster, 119 Mass. 189; Gillig v. Lake Bigler Road Co. 2 Nev. 214. Compare Brooklyn First Nat. Bank v. Stuetzer, 80 Hun 435, 30 N. Y. S. 83; Brooklyn First Nat. Bank v. Wallis, 84 Hun 376, 32 N. Y. S. 382; Casco Nat. Bank v. Clark, 139 N. Y. 307, 34 N. E. 908, 36 Am. St. Rep. 705; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Clark, 139 N. Y. 314, 34 N. E. 910, 36 Am. St. Rep. 710.

As against the persons by whom it was put out, a printed letterhead is admissible to show the fact of incorporation or partnership. Farmers' Bank v. Saling, 33 Ore. 394, 54 Pac. 190; Gordon v. Funkhouser, 100 Va. 675, 42 S. E. 677. Compare Ludowieg v. Talcott, 47 Misc. 77, 93 N. Y. S. 621. In Gordon v. Funkhouser, supra, it was said: "In the course of the examination of Dr. Gordon, as a witness in his own behalf, he was asked: 'Is that the letterhead of the old firm of Sites & Gordon?' (handing witness the letterhead), and the witness answered, 'Yes, sir.' To which question the plaintiff objected because the paper itself did not indicate the time the paper was used, and also on the ground that the answer to the question was a declaration of the witness, himself the interested party, which objections were sustained, and this is assigned as error. There was evidence tending to show that there was a partnership conducted under the style and firm name of Sites & Gordon, composed of W. K. Sites and A. Hays Gordon, at the time the bond sued on was executed by W. K. Sites, and that the firm of which Dr. Gordon is alleged to have been a member was not formed until three years thereafter. The letterhead in question is in the form of letterheads generally used in the mercantile business, stating the names of the individual members of the partnership, the place at which the business of the firm is conducted, and leaving the date at which the letterhead is used blank. Upon this letterhead appeared the names of W. K. Sites and A. Hays Gordon as the members of the firm, and it was clearly the right of the witness to state in answer to the question that it was the letterhead used by that firm." But in Ricker Nat. Bank v. Brown (Tex.) 43 S. W. 909, it was said that a letterhead was not evidence of the facts thereby disclosed as against third persons. The court said: "The letterhead showed that George E. Ricker, who was cashier of plaintiff bank, was also secretary and treasurer of the Hynes Buggy Company. This was admitted, over objection, to show that said Ricker was an officer of both concerns, upon which appellee based the theory that Ricker, being an officer of the buggy company, was bound to take cognizance of any transaction with said buggy company, and that the bank was charged with the knowledge possessed by him. The letterhead of the buggy company would be evidence against said company, if a party to the suit, but could not be used against the appellant. The letterhead stands upon the same footing as the letters themselves."

MARAVELAS.

New York Court of Appeals—December 15, 1916.

219 N. Y. 383.

Fraudulent Conveyances — Bulk Sales Law — Validity.

The New York Bulk Sales Law (Personal Property Law, § 44) invalidating as to creditors a sale in bulk of a stock of merchandise is constitutional.

[See note at end of this case.]

Klein v. Maravelas, 173 N. Y. App. Div. 953, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Second Judicial Department.

Action by David Klein, doing business as Samuel Klein & Son, plaintiff, against Peter Maravelas, defendant. Judgment for defendant at Special Term of Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Plaintiff appeals by permission. REVERSED.

[333] The complaint was based upon section 44 of the Personal Property Law (L. 1914, ch. 507) and alleged the defendant's non-compliance with the said statute as a purchaser of a stock of merchandise and fixtures in bulk and demanded plaintiff's appointment as a receiver, for the benefit of the plaintiff and all the other creditors similarly situated, of the defendant's vendor.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—18.

The following questions were certified: 1. "Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?" 2. "Is section 44 of the Personal Property Law (as amended by chapter 507 of the Laws of 1914) constitutional?"

Max Arens and Elie Klein for appellant.

Ira Wollison for respondent.

[334] CARDOZO, J.—This case makes it necessary for us to say whether the so-called sales in bulk law is a constitutional enactment (Personal Prop. Law, § 44, L. 1914, ch. 507; Cons. Laws, ch. 41). A very similar law was enacted in 1904 (L. 1904, ch. 569). In Wright v. Hart ([1905] 182 N. Y. 330, 75 N. E. 404, 3 Ann. Cas. 263, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338), we held it to be unconstitutional. We said that it violated the federal constitution in denying to merchants the equal protection of the laws. We said that it violated both the federal and the state constitution in imposing arbitrary restrictions upon liberty of contract. That decision was reached by a closely divided court. Three judges dissented. There were strong dissenting opinions by Judge Vann and Chief Judge Cullen.

Since Wright v. Hart was decided, the validity of like [385] statutes has been upheld in two cases by the United States Supreme Court (Lemieux v. Young, 211 U. S. 489, 29 S. Ct. 174, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 295; Kidd, etc. Co. v. Musselman Grocery Co. 217 U. S. 461, 30 S. Ct. 606, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 839). Objection to this statute on the ground of conflict with the federal constitution has thus been removed. We have still to determine, however, whether there is any conflict with our state constitution; and that requires us to say whether we shall adhere to our decision in Wright v. Hart.

We think it is our duty to hold that the decision in Wright v. Hart is wrong. The unanimous or all but unanimous voice of the judges of the land, in federal and state courts alike, has upheld the constitutionality of these laws. At the time of our decision in Wright v. Hart, such laws were new and strange. They were thought in the prevailing opinion to represent the fitful prejudices of the hour (Wright v. Hart [1905] 182 N. Y. 342). The fact is that they have come to stay, and like laws may be found on the statute books of every state. The United States Supreme Court has sustained them (Lemieux v. Young, supra; Kidd, etc. Co. v. Musselman Grocery Co. supra). The courts of Washington (McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. [1902] 30 Wash. 549, 71 Pac. 37, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889, 60 L.R.A. 947); Tennes-

Ellis* [1914] 26 Idaho 438, 144 Pac. 6, L.R.A.1915E, 917); Montana (Wheeler, etc. Mercantile Co. v. Moon [1914] 49 Mont. 307, 141 Pac. 665), and Oregon (Coach v. Gage [1914] 70 Ore. 182, 138 Pac. 847), have sustained them. Indiana, Ohio and Illinois, which once held such laws bad (McKinster v. Sager [1904] 163 Ind. 671, 72 N. E. 854, 106 Am. St. Rep. 268, 68 L.R.A. 273; Miller v. Crawford [1904] 70 Ohio St. 207, 1 Ann. Cas. 558, 71 N. E. 631; Williams, etc. Co. v. Preslo [1911] 84 Ohio St. 328, Ann. Cas. 1912C 704, 95 N. E. 900; Off v. Morehead [1908] 235 Ill. 40, 14 Ann. Cas. 434, 126 Am. St. Rep. 184, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167), have sustained their present laws, which do not differ substantially from our own (Hirth-Krause Co. v. Cohen [1911] 177 Ind. 1, Ann. Cas. 1914C 708, 97 N. E. 1; Johnson Co. v. Belosky [1914] 263 Ill. 363, 105 N. E. 287; Steele, etc. Co. v. Miller [1915] 92 Ohio St. 115, 110 N. E. 648). The one jurisdiction in which such statutes remain invalid is Utah (Block v. Schwartz [1904] 27 Utah 387, 1 Ann. Cas. 550, 76 Pac. 22, 101 Am. St. Rep. 971, 65 L.R.A. 308), and there the adverse judgment was rendered many years ago.

In such circumstances we can no longer say, whatever past views may have been, that the prohibitions of this statute are arbitrary and purposeless restrictions upon liberty of contract (Rast v. Van Deman, etc. Co. 240 U. S. 342, 366, 36 S. Ct. 370, 60 U. S. (1. ed.) 679; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487, 31 S. Ct. 186, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 112, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1062; Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 23 S. Ct. 168, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 323). The needs of successive generations may make restrictions imperative to-day which were vain and capricious to the vision of times past (People v. Charles Schweinler Press, 214 N. Y. 395, 108 N. E. 639). Back of this legislation, which to a majority of the judges who decided Wright v. Hart, seemed arbitrary and purposeless, there must have been a real need. We can see this now, even though it may have been obscure before. Our past decision ought not to stand in opposition to the uniform convictions of the entire judiciary of the land. Least of all should it stand when rendered by a closely divided court against the earnest protest of distinguished judges. Indeed, in a later case (People v. Luhrs, 197 [387] N. Y. 377, 89 N. E. 171, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 473), we stated with the concurrence of all the members of the court, that the authority of Wright v. Hart, had been shaken, though the case did not call upon us to determine whether it was still the law. We cannot say to-day in the face of such overwhelming authority, that the presumption of validity which attaches to every act of legislation has been overcome. The present statute is similar in essentials to the one condemned in 1905. In details it may be distinguished from the earlier one, but the details are in reality trifling. We cannot without a sacrifice of candor rest our judgment upon them. We think we ought not to do so. We should adopt the argument and the conclusion of the dissenting judges in Wright v. Hart, and affirm the validity of the statute on which the plaintiff builds his rights.

The order should be reversed, without costs, and the questions certified answered in the affirmative.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., Chase, Collin, Cuddeback, Hogan and Pound, JJ., concur.

Order reversed, etc.

NOTE.

In the reported case the court sustains the constitutionality of a statute making the transfer of goods in bulk void as against creditors unless five days before the transfer an inventory is taken and notice to creditors is given. The question of the constitutionality of sales in bulk statutes is fully discussed in the notes to G. S. Johnson Co. v. Belosky, Ann. Cas. 1915C 411; Williams v. Preslo, Ann. Cas. 1912C 704; Off v. Morehead, 14 Ann. Cas. 434, and Block v. Schwartz, as reported in 1 Ann. Cas. 550, and 101 Am. St. Rep. 971.

Whether the sale of a part interest in a business to a partner or for the creation of a partnership comes within a bulk sales law is considered in the note to Daly v. Sumpter Drug Co. Ann. Cas. 1914B 1101; and whether a conveyance to a creditor in payment of a debt is a sale under such a law is treated in the note to Sampson v. Brandon Grocery Co. 9 Ann. Cas. 331. The execution of a chattel mortgage as a violation of a sales in bulk statute is dealt with in the note to Hannah v. Richter Brewing Co. 12 Ann. Cas. 344.

For cases construing the statutory provision that a sale of goods in bulk shall be presumed to be fraudulent and void, see the note to Wm. R. Moore Dry Goods Co. v. Rowe, Ann. Cas. 1913C 1213. And cases concerning the meaning of "goods, wares and merchandise" within statutes regulating sales thereof in bulk are collated in the note to Everett Produce Co. v. Smith, 5 Ann. Cas. 798.

The remedies of a creditor for a violation of a bulk sales law are set forth and discussed in the note to Coffey v. McGahey, Ann. Cas. 1916C 923.

CITY OF DAYTON

v.

TRUSTEES OF SPEERS HOSPITAL.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—May 26, 1915.

165 Ky. 56; 176 S. W. 361.

Taxation — Exemptions — Hospital as Charity.

A testatrix gave property to three persons in trust for the establishment of a hospital; the trustees to report annually to the chancery court in the county, and such court to fill all vacancies in the office of trustee. The hospital received private pay patients; public patients going there of their own accord, or sent there by the county and certain nearby cities, including the city in which the hospital was located, and which was seeking to subject the hospital to taxation. No patients were kept without charge, but some of those who came of their own accord failed to pay, and no one had ever been turned away for inability to pay. The county and such cities compensated the hospital as to patients sent by them, but in a sum less than the actual cost. The operation of the hospital resulted in different years, either in a deficit or in a very small gain. There was no provision for reversion in the will, the trustees served without pay, and it did not appear that it was ever intended that any private gain should result. The profit from private patients who paid for their care and treatment went into the general fund of the hospital, and was used for maintaining it. It is held that the hospital property was exempt from taxation as a "public charity;" since whatever is done or given gratuitously in relief of the public burdens, or for the advancement of public good, is a public charity, and an institution founded and endowed as a purely public charity does not lose its character as such under the tax laws if it receives a revenue from the recipients of its bounty sufficient to keep it in operation, or, applying another test, if the object for which an institution is founded is the general public good, and not private gain, and it is so conducted that the public receives all the benefits of it, it is a purely public charity.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell county.

Action by City of Dayton, plaintiff, against Trustees of Speers Hospital, defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Hubbard Schwartz for appellant.
Kelly & Regenstein for appellees.

[56] HURT, J.—This is an appeal of the city of Dayton, Kentucky, from a judgment rendered by the Campbell Circuit Court, in an action by the city against J. O. Jenkins, John L. Phythian, and W. E. Senour, trustees of the Speers Hospital, in which the city sought to procure a [57] decree of sale of the hospital, in satisfaction of taxes assessed against it by the officials of the city, for the years 1910 and 1911. The defense offered by the appellees was that the hospital was an institution of purely public charity, and the case resulted in a judgment dismissing the petition of appellant. The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, which are, in substance, that the taxes for the benefit of the city were regularly levied upon the hospital for the years mentioned, in the first of which years the taxable value, at which it was assessed, was $28,000.00, and the second year $38,000.00, and the whole amount sought to be recovered was $1,100.50, as taxes due from it to the city for the years mentioned. The hospital was founded by funds set apart for that purpose by the will of Elizabeth L. Speers, who died in 1894, and whose will was duly probated October 20th, 1894. The item of the will which set apart the funds for the erection and maintenance of the hospital, after providing that the various specific legacies devised in the will to various persons, should be paid, and all costs and expenses incident to the settlement of her estate, "conveyed and transferred the entire balance of her estate, real, personal, and mixed of every kind, wherever situated, to Dr. B. K. Rachford, Dr. C. B. Schoolfield, and William C. Pickering, as trustees, in trust, for the establishment and maintenance of a hospital in the city of Dayton, Campbell County, Kentucky. Said hospital to be erected and maintained, and conducted in such a manner, and upon such plan, as, in their judgment, would do the greatest good. Said trustees shall annually report all of their acts and doings to the highest court in said county, having original equitable jurisdiction, and all vacancies in said trustees shall be filled by said court. Said court shall require from said trustees proper bonds, for the performance of their duties, and it may allow them annually, out of the trust funds, a just and fair compensation for their labor, etc." In pursuance to the trust thus created, the trustees and their successors erected the hospital at a cost of about $72,000.00, which left real estate of the value of $14,200.00 situated in Ohio, which also passed into the hands of the trustees. The receipts of the hospital, with the rents of the property, in Cincinnati, were not sufficient to pay its operating expenses, and its doors were closed, but in 1901 the present trustees were appointed, [58] and they applied to the Campbell Circuit Court for permission to borrow $6,000.00 to pay its debts, and $2,000.00 additional with which to make needed repairs. The trustees borrowed the $8,000.00 from J. J. Ellerhorst, and thereafter they borrowed from Ellerhorst $2,250.00 additional, making $10,250.00, to secure which they gave a mortgage for that sum upon the real estate situated in Cincinnati, Ohio, and while the income from that property did not quite pay the interest on the Ellerhorst mortgage, he accepted same in full satisfaction of it. In 1909 it became necessary to provide a more commodious and convenient building for the nurses at the hospital, and the trustees again applied to the Campbell Circuit Court and received permission to borrow $20,000.00 for that purpose, and to secure it by a mortgage upon the hospital itself. $16,453.36 of this fund was expended in erecting necessary additional building, and the remaining $3,546.64 was put in the treasury of the hospital, and used to pay accumulated debts and the operating expenses of the institution. There was another debt of $1,000.00 due one Langendorfer, incurred in building the nurses' addition to the hospital, and Langendorfer had secured his claim by filing a mechanics' lien upon the hospital property, and to satisfy this claim the circuit court authorized the trustees to place another mortgage upon the property for that sum, which was done in 1912. The average number of patients cared for in the hospital each day in 1910 was thirty-three, of which number nineteen were private patients and fourteen public patients, and the average number of patients cared for in 1911, each day, was twenty-seven, of which number fourteen were private patients and thirteen were public patients. In the year 1910 the city of Dayton sent to the hospital and paid for twenty-one patients, who remained there an aggregate of three hundred and fifty-eight days, and in 1911 it sent twenty-one patients to the hospital, who remained an aggregate of four hundred and thirty-two days. Private patients are those who enter the hospital and pay from their own resources for their room, board, and nursing, and pay the physician, for professional services rendered them, directly. The profit, if any, derived from the care of these private patients, for their rooms, board, and nursing, goes into the general fund of the hospital, and is used for maintaining the hospital. Public patients [59] are described as those who come of their own accord, or are sent by the authorities of the city of Dayton, Bellevue, Newport, and Campbell County. All public patients are received and treated in the public wards. No patients are kept in the hospital without charge, but some patients, who come of their own accord, fail to pay their bills. All public patients receive medical attention at the hands of the members of the hospital staff, free of charge to them, and one interne is on duty at all times, and his services are, also, given to the patients. The hospital trustees serve and have always served without compensation. When the hospital first began operation a number of rooms were furnished by charitably inclined persons and organizations, and since that time other rooms have been furnished in a similar manner. The hospital each year receives from various sources charitable contributions in the way of beds, towels furniture, food supplies, and various necessities, which have been used for the benefit of all the patients in the operation of the hospital. The hospital is located in the central part of Dayton, and has the benefit of the sewerage system of the city of Dayton, and such police and fire protection as is furnished any other building in the city. The hospital pays the same for water, gas, and electric light and power service as is paid by other consumers. Each year, during its operation, the hospital has received contributions of money, which are used in the operation of the hospital.

The agreed statement of facts further shows that for several years, before the year 1910, the cities of Dayton and Bellevue contributed annually to the hospital the sum of $1,000.00 per year, and the city of Newport contributed annually to the support of the hospital $3,000.00, and the county of Campbell contributed annually the sum of $1,000.00. These contributions were made to the hospital upon condition that the indigent sick of three cities named and of the county were to be received at the hospital and treated there without charge to them. This plan continued for several years, when it was changed, so that the cities of Dayton, Bellevue, and Newport paid $1.05 per day for each indigent person sent to the institution by them, but in the year 1913 the city of Newport paid $3,500.00 for that year, while the county of Campbell continued to donate $1,000.00 per year, as theretofore. The hospital trustees [60] have given to the cities of Dayton and Bellevue notice that after March 1st, 1914, the rate to be paid for each patient per day was to be $1.20. The actual cost per day for caring for each patient has been $1.28 per day. During the year 1910, in addition to the public patients received from the three cities named and Campbell County, three persons came of their own accord, who remained an aggregate of twenty days, and in 1911 three such patients were treated for an aggregate of thirty-three days.

It was, also, agreed that the earnings of the hospital for the year ending August 31st, 1909, for board, operating, nursing, rents, donations, miscellaneous receipts of all kinds, and discounts earned, amounting to $18,720.69, while its expenses for the same time for wages, provisions, fuel, water, and light, surgical supplies, drugs, house supplies, repairs, interest, insurance, and general expenses amounting to $17,032.89, which, after deducting $861.45 for persons treated free of charge, left a balance in favor of the institution of $826.35; for the year ending August 31st, 1910, the receipts of the hospital amounted to $18,067.43, and deducting the expenses for the same period from it, left a net deficit for the same year of $147.87; deducting the expenses from the earnings for the year ending August 31st, 1911, showed a net gain for the year of $184.14. A statement of the earnings and expenses for the year ending August 31st, 1912, showed a net balance in favor of the institution of $126.43.

This court, in Kentucky Female Orphan School v. Louisville, 100 Ky. 470, 36 S. W. 921, 40 L.R.A. 119, and in Widows' etc. Home, etc. v. Com. 126 Ky. 386, 103 S. W. 354, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 829, quoted with approval from the case of Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. St. 565, 25 Atl. 55, wherein it laid down, among others, the two following rules by which to determine whether an institution was one of purely public charity:

"First: Whatever is done or given gratuitously in relief of the public burdens or for the advancement of public good, is a public charity. Where the public is the beneficiary, the charity is public, and where no private or pecuniary return is reserved to the giver or to any particular person, but all the benefits resulting from the gift or act go to the public, is a purely public charity, the word 'purely' being equivalent to 'wholly.'

[61] "Third: An institution founded and endowed as a purely public charity does not lose its character as such, under the tax laws, if it receives a revenue from the recipients of its bounty sufficient to keep it in operation."

In the case of Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229, the Ohio supreme court said:

"When the charity is public, the exclusion of all idea of private gain or profit is equivalent in effect to the force of 'purely,' as applied to public charity in the constitution."

Another test of purely public charity is the object for which it was founded. If it was for the general public good, and not for private gain, and was so conducted that the public received all the benefits of it, it is a purely public charity. Donohugh v. Library Co. 86 Pa. St. 306.

By the will of Elizabeth Speer, the funds for the establishment and maintenance of this hospital in the city of Dayton were set apart by her, and the hospital to be erected and maintained, and was so conducted in such a manner and upon such a plan, as, in the judgment of the trustees, would do the greatest good. No provision is in the will providing that the funds so set apart should ever revert to any private person, or should in any event, ever, be used for any purpose, except the one designated in the will. The title to the property is vested in trustees, who have no personal interest in the property, whatever, and in the case of vacancies in the office of trustees, the vacancies must be filled by the circuit court of the county. The purpose of the donor was to create a pure charity, and the fund was placed in the service of the public without any view to provide gain for any one. The nursing and medical treatment of the indigent sick, and of those whose pecuniary circumstances are such, as will not justify an expenditure of more than a small sum for medical and surgical treatment, and nursing and caring while sick, is, without question, a public charity, if the doors of the institution are open to all persons, alike. It is always the duty of the State to provide for its indigent sick.

It does not appear that it was ever intended, that any private gain should result to any person in the operation of the trust created by the donor, in setting apart the fund for the erection and maintenance of the [62] hospital. The supervision of its operation was given to the court of the highest equitable jurisdiction in the county, and the power to name the trustees was vested in the same tribunal—thus stamping it with evidences of its public character. In its operation no one has been excluded from its benefits. The county in which it is situated and the nearby cities have used it as an instrumentality to care for their indigent sick, and to procure surgical and medical treatment for them. It is true, the county and cities have compensated the institution for the care and treatment of their poor and friendless sick, but in a sum less than the actual cost to the institution for caring for them. One-half of the inmates have received the services of the physicians, as well as the nursing and their board, free of any charge to them. While a charge is made against every patient, other than the ones who are consigned there by the county or cities, it does not appear that anyone has ever been turned away, or excluded from its benefits, because of poverty, or inability to pay for the benefits. Private patients are received, who pay the institution for their rooms, boarding, and nursing, and pay their physicians for their treatment, but the funds received from this source are all devoted to the general expenses of the hospital. A building and grounds and furniture are not adequate to maintain a hospital. The nurses must be paid, fuel and lights, water and food provided, and some one to superintend and direct the operations of the hospital.

The fact that the institution receives a revenue from the recipients of its bounty, sufficient to keep it in operation, does not take from it its character as a purely public charity, where it was founded and endowed as such, and when all of the receipts go to providing for the purposes for which it was erected and maintained. The municipalities and the county itself in which the institution is located, and whose duty it is to care for the indigent sick of each of them, respectively, have, by its use, been saved the burden of erecting an institution of the kind of their own, or otherwise caring for such sick.

In 6 Cyc. 900, a public charity is defined "to be a gift, to be applied consistently with the existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, [63] suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government."

The Speers Hospital has been so conducted and was so endowed and maintained, that no private gain has come to any one, and all of its benefits go to the public.

The cases of Walthen v. Louisville, 85 S. W. 1195, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 635, and Gray St. Infirmary v. Louisville 65 S. W. 11, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1274, relied upon to show that Speers Hospital is not a purely public charity, are not in point, since each of those institutions was founded and conducted with a view to private gain and resulted in private gain to the managers.

It is, therefore, adjudged that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

NOTE.

Hospital as Charity Exempt from Taxation.

Introductory, 278.

What Constitutes Charitable Hospital:

Hospital Not Operated for Profit, 278.

Hospital Operated for Profit, 281.

Property Included in Exemption:

Land Adjoining Hospital, 281.

Land Detached from Hospital, 282.

Introductory.

The present discussion is confined to the question whether a hospital is such a charity as to be exempt from property taxation. It excludes the charitable nature of a hospital when considered for other purposes than that of exemption from taxation, and also excludes exemption from inheritance, succession or transfer taxes.

Whether a gift for the establishment of a hospital is a charitable gift is discussed in the note to Buchanan v. Kennard, Ann. Cas. 1912D 50. The cases dealing with the charitable nature of a private hospital as exempting it from liability for the negligence of employees are reviewed in the notes to Parks v. Northwestern University, 4 Ann. Cas. 103; Bruce v. Central M. E. Church, 11 Ann. Cas. 150; Duncan v. Nebraska Sanitarium, etc. Assoc. Ann. Cas. 1913E 1127; and Schloendorff v. Society of New York Hospital, Ann. Cas. 1915C 581. The liability to an inheritance tax of a bequest to a foreign charitable corporation is considered in the notes to Humphreys v. State, 1 Ann. Cas. 233; and Matter of Crawford, Ann. Cas. 1912B 992.

What Constitutes Charitable Hospital.

HOSPITAL NOT OPERATED FOR PROFIT.

A hospital wherein no charge is made to patients received therein constitutes a charity exempt from taxation. Western Dispensary v. New York, 56 Super. Ct. 361, 4 N. Y. S. 547. See also Frederick County Com'rs v.

In Massachusetts Soc. etc. v. Boston, 142 Mass. 24, 6 N. E. 840, it was held that a free hospital for the care of homeless, neglected, diseased or abused animals was exempt from taxation.

A hospital caring for poor patients free but charging those able to pay for its privileges is exempt from taxation as a charity provided such revenue is devoted solely to the purposes of the institution so that the hospital is operated without profit.

Thus in State v. Powers, 10 Mo. App. 263, affirmed 74 Mo. 476, it was held that a hospital building was not excluded from the benefits of the constitutional exemption from taxation for the reason that the institution derived some part of its revenue from paying patients. The court said: "Suppose that the community in charge of the hospital devoted themselves partly to some kind of manual labor, shoemaking for instance, in order to raise money for the purpose of furnishing medicine and necessities and comforts to their patients, would not this be a charitable act? If they devote themselves partly to the care of paying patients, to defray the expenses of attendance upon the poorer patients who cannot pay, this is surely an act of charity. Must we hold that if the community raise money by begging, their purposes are purely charitable; but if they work to support themselves whilst ministering to the sick, and to support the sick to whom they minister, the character of the charity is impaired? Or is it to be contended that no charitable institution, not endowed, and independent, is to be exempted from taxation under the law? The fact that paying patients are taken, the profits derived from attendance upon these patients being exclusively devoted to the maintenance of the charity, seems rather to enhance the usefulness of the institution to the poor; for it is a matter of common observation amongst those who have gone about at all amongst the suffering classes, that the deserving poor can with difficulty be persuaded to enter an asylum of any kind confined to the reception of objects of charity; and that their honest pride is much less wounded by being placed in an institution in which paying patients are also received. The fact of receiving money from some of the patients does not, we think, at all impair the character of the charity, so long as the money thus received is devoted altogether to the charitable object which the institution is intended to further." And in State v. Board of Assessors, etc. 52 La. Ann. 223, 26 So. 872, wherein it was contended that certain institutions could not be classed as charitable because they received pay from a class of patients able to pay in the desire to avail themselves of well-equipped institutions where the sick could receive proper attention, the court said: "It strikes us as a narrow construction to hold that these institutions are not to be deemed charitable, because unable to bear the whole expense of taking care of the indigent needing medical attention, and of those whose straightened circumstances render them helpless to obtain the attention and medicines they need, the institutions make a moderate charge of those able to make return in some small degree for the shelter, medical treatment, medicines and food they receive. Nor can we see our way clear to hold that institutions established for charitable purposes, and serving the purposes to the extent shown by the record, are not to be decreed charitable, because they derive some revenue from the class called 'pay patients.'" Likewise in St. Joseph's Hospital Assoc. v. Ashland County, 96 Wis. 636, 72 N. W. 43, the court said: "How it can be doubted that this institution is doing a benevolent work in the truest sense of the word we are unable to see. It is really the work of the good Samaritan. It is true that those who are able to pay do pay a very moderate weekly charge, but those who are unable to pay receive the same care for nothing. This does not render the work done any the less benevolent. Doubtless, if the hospital were absolutely free to all, it could not be operated. It is the very fact that pay is collected from those who can pay which enables the sisters to operate the hospital and care for those who are too poor to pay. If this work be not benevolent work, especially in the great cities and in the newly-settled districts, then there will have to be a new meaning attached to the word 'benevolent.' . . . The fact that there were surplus receipts at times, which were loaned to build other hospitals of the same character, does not show that the property was used for pecuniary profit." In Philadelphia v. Pennsylvania Hospital, 154 Pa. St. 9, 25 Atl. 1076, involving an alleged exemption from a municipal assessment for a water pipe the court said: "While it was conceded that the building and grounds are exempt from taxation for the reason that defendant is a purely public charity, yet it was contended that within the portion of the grounds charged with this claim there is a large building reserved exclusively for the use of patients paying a higher rate than any others; that these payments much exceed the cost of maintenance assignable to themselves, if the original cost of the property and any estimated rental is excluded. It appears to be conceded that the object of the trustees in maintaining this department of the institution is to make a profit, by the use of which to extend the institution's capacity for good among the destitute members of the community. It was not contended, nor is there anything to show, that there was any actual profit realized in this department after taking into consideration the value of the ground and improvements, and the cost of maintenance. The apparent profit is applied to the general objects of charity, and no portion of it inures to the benefit of any person concerned in administering the charity." And in St. John Cathedral v. Denver, 37 Colo. 378, 96 Pac. 1021, it was held that the exaction of payment from the inmates of a home for consumptives for the actual necessities furnished according to their circumstances and the accommodations they received, did not constitute a use of the building for other than a strictly charitable purpose. So in Sisters of St. Francis v. Board of Review, 231 Ill. 317, 83 N. E. 272, it was held that an institution organized not for profit but for conducting hospitals and training schools for nurses was a charity and exempt from taxation. The court said: "The facts in reference to the training schools conducted in this hospital are not clearly made to appear by the evidence, but as we understood the record, persons not members of the corporation who desire to become trained nurses are permitted to enter the hospital, where they are boarded and taught to perform the duties of their chosen calling in exchange for such assistance as they can give in doing the work of the institution. . . . In this hospital charity is extended to all the members of the community and is not confined to any particular class of individuals. It is an institution of public charity, and where an institution devoted to beneficence of that character is, under the law, exempt from taxation, it does not lose its immunity by reason of the fact that those patients received by it who are able to pay are required to do so, or by reason of the fact that it receives contributions from outside sources, so long as all the money received by it is devoted to the general purposes of the charity, and no portion of the money received by it is permitted to inure to the benefit of any private individual engaged in managing the charity." Likewise in Denville Tp. v. St. Francis Sanitarium (N. J.) 98 Atl. 254, the court said: "That the buildings and land exempted in this case are used for charitable, benevolent, and hospital purposes abundantly appears, and as the act extends the exemption to cases where the charitable and benevolent work carried on is supported partly by fees and charges paid by the beneficiaries where the entire income is used for such purposes, the fact appearing in this case that there is an income from the beneficiaries which is used for charitable and benevolent purposes does not make this institution one conducted for profit, and thus beyond the benefit of the exemption."

In Struthers v. Sudbury, 27 Ont. App. 217, it was held that a hospital owned and carried on by physicians which was subject to governmental control and for the support of which public funds were contributed, was exempt from taxation as a public hospital. But in Engstad v. Grand Forks Coun- ty, 10 N. D. 54, 84 N. W. 577, it was held that the building and land of a private individual, used as a charitable hospital, was not exempt from taxation for the reason that property owned by one individual could not, within the meaning of the statute, be property "belonging to an institution."

HOSPITAL OPERATED FOR PROFIT.

A hospital operated for profit is not exempt from taxation as a charity. St. Andrew's Hospital v. Shearsmith, 19 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 624; Meedham v. Bowers, 21 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 436, 59 L. T. N. S. 404, 37 W. R. 125; People v. Ravenswood Hospital, 238 Ill. 137, 87 N. E. 305; New Orleans v. Congregation, etc. 15 La. Ann. 389. Thus in People v. Ravenswood Hospital, supra, it was held that a hospital organized for profit was not exempt from taxation, though conducted as a public hospital. The court said: "It would be a contradiction in terms to say that a corporation organized for gain and pecuniary profit is an institution of public charity. It follows, of necessity, that the law requires that the property to be exempt must belong to and stand in the name of an institution organized for public charity as well as that the property shall be used actually and exclusively for such charitable purposes. The right to enjoy exemption from taxation can only be established by strict proof of the existence of all facts necessary to authorize the exemption." And in Needham v. Bowers, 21 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 436, the court said: "In this case the question raised is whether the Barnwood House Institution was liable to pay inhabited house duty, or whether it comes within the exemption No. 4 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, which exempts 'any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons.' We think that this exemption, which specifies hospitals along with charity schools and poor houses, must be construed in the same manner as we have construed the exemption in s. 61 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and that it does not include the case of a hospital not maintained by charity, but carried on, and carried on at a profit, by funds derived from patients who pay for their treatment."

In Wathen v. Louisville, 85 S. W. 1195, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 635, it appeared that certain persons owned property on which buildings were situated in which a medical school was conducted for profit. One of these buildings was used as a hospital and dispensary in which medicines were dispensed and patients treated free of charge unless able to pay a small sum. If not able to pay they were treated without charge. Holding that as the institution was operated for gain no part of it was exempt from taxation under the constitution the court said: "It is manifest from the evidence that the hospital is maintained because it is necessary to the successful conduct of the school of medicine. Without the clinical instruction and the operations by the professors in the presence of the students the school could not be maintained with success. The hospital is an adjunct or a part of the medical school. Whatever gain may result from the operation of the medical school goes to the owners of the property. While the evidence shows a great deal of charity work is performed in the treatment of patients and in dispensing medicines, still the institution is conducted for profit." See to the same effect Gray St. Infirmary v. Louisville, 65 S. W. 11, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1274. See also People v. Campbell, 93 N. Y. 196.

Property Included in Exemption.

LAND ADJOINING HOSPITAL.

As a rule land adjoining a hospital which is exempt from taxation as a charity is included in the exemption. St. Thomas', etc. Hospitals v. Huddell [1901] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 364; Massachusetts Gen. Hospital v. Somerville, 101 Mass. 319; Hennepin County v. Brotherhood of Gethsemane, 27 Minn. 460, 8 N. W. 595, 38 Am. Rep. 298. Compare Thurston County v. Sisters of Charity, 14 Wash. 264, 44 Pac. 252. Thus in Massachusetts Gen. Hospital v. Somerville, 101 Mass. 319, it was held that land bought and held by a benevolent institution for the insane to prevent too near proximity of buildings and use which might be deleterious to the hospital was exempt from taxation. The court said: "There is nothing in the case to show that this was not the real intention; nor that the whole of the lands were not in fact held, and proper to be held, for this purpose. The court cannot, from the mere fact of the extent of the lands so held (one hundred and ten acres, including marsh and flats), determine judicially that the trustees of the institution have wrongly exercised their discretion in this respect. The presumption is in favor of their judgment, and it requires something more than mere difference of opinion, upon a matter of opinion especially confided to them, to overcome that presumption." Compare Denville Tp. v. St. Francis Sanitarium (N. J.) 98 Atl. 254. But in Thurston County v. Sisters of Charity, 14 Wash. 264, 44 Pac. 252 it was held that only the building of a charity hospital and not the land used as a necessary part of the institution was exempt from taxation.

In Denville Tp. v. St. Francis Sanitarium (N. J.) 98 Atl. 254, it appeared that the sanitarium was the owner of a large tract of land on which were erected several buildings especially for sanitarium purposes. The board of equalization exempted from taxation the buildings with five acres of land necessary for the fair enjoyment of the buildings. Affirming that ruling the court said: "That the buildings and land exempted in this case are used for charitable, benevolent, and hospital purposes abundantly appears, and as the act extends the exemption to cases where the charitable and benevolent work carried on is supported partly by fees and charges paid by the beneficiaries where the entire income is used for such purposes, the fact appearing in this case that there is an income from the beneficiaries which is used for charitable and benevolent purposes does not make this institution one conducted for profit, and thus beyond the benefit of the exemption."

In Jepson v. Gribble, 1 Ex. D. 151, 45 L. J. Exch. 502, 34 L. T. N. S. 493, 24 W. R. 460, it was held that the medical superintendent's house built on part of the grounds of a hospital was exempt from taxation. See to the same effect Harrison v. Bulcock, 1 H. Bl. (Eng.) 68.

LAND DETACHED FROM HOSPITAL.

As a rule land detached from a hospital which is exempt from taxation as a charity is included in the exemption, provided it is used to further the purposes of the institution. St. Thomas', etc. Hospitals v. Hudgell [1901] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 364; Cox v. Rabbits, 3 App. Cas. (Eng.) 473; Mason County v. Hayswood Hospital, 167 Ky. 17, 179 S. W. 1050; People v. Purdy, 58 Hun 386, 12 N. Y. S. 307, affirmed 120 N. Y. 679, 28 N. E. 249. Pennsylvania Hospital v. Delaware County, 169 Pa. St. 305, 32 Atl. 456; 36 W. N. C. 547. Compare State v. St. Barnabas Hospital, 95 Minn. 489, 104 N. W. 551; Cooper Hospital v. Camden, 68 N. J. L. 691, 54 Atl. 419, reversing 68 N. J. L. 208, 52 Atl. 210; Cooper Hospital v. Camden, 70 N. J. L. 478, 57 Atl. 260. Thus in Pennsylvania Hospital v. Delaware County, supra, wherein it appeared that farms were bought and used for hospital purposes as a part of the hospital plant, as an open air sanatorium, and as a roaming ground for convalescent patients, the court said the property which was used directly for that purpose, and in the operation of the charity, was exempt, though it might also be used in a manner to yield some return and thereby reduce the expenses. On the other hand in State v. St. Barnabas Hospital, 95 Minn. 489, 104 N. W. 551, it appeared that the defendant conducted a hospital for charitable purposes and with no view to profit. It had acquired by gift certain farming lands, which it rented, and derived an annual income therefrom of about $600. It was held that the land was not exempt from taxation. The court said: "It may . . . be stated that the lands and premises for more than four years previous to these proceedings have been a part of the endowment of the hospital, and are and can be used only for the support and care of charity patients, but were composed of farming lands separate from the curtilage of the institution, and not essential or necessary to the use of the same for hospital purposes." And in Cooper Hospital v. Camden, 70 N. J. L. 478, 57 Atl. 260, the court, said: "The lot which has been taxed is distant from the lands on which the buildings are erected, and there is nothing in the case to show that it is available for the erection thereon of hospital buildings or that it is contemplated to hold or use it for such a purpose. . . . If the right to exemption is conceded in this case, this corporation and all other benevolent corporations with like exemptions could purchase and hold lands in every municipality in the state free from taxation." See to the same effect Cooper Hospital v. Camden, 68 N. J. L. 691, 54 Atl. 419, reversing 68 N. J. L. 208, 52 Atl. 210.

In People v. Raymond, 194 N. Y. 189, 87 N. E. 90, reversing 126 App. Div. 720, 111 N. Y. S. 177, it was held that the Roosevelt Hospital in the city of New York was exempt from taxation on property which was not used exclusively for charitable purposes. The court said that the peculiar features attending its incorporation and characterizing its endowment were controlling. But in Enaut v. McGuire, 36 La. Ann. 804, 51 Am. Rep. 14, it was held that vacant property held in anticipation of being used at some time for the erection of a charity hospital, though not specifically dedicated to that purpose, was not exempt from taxation.

In Philadelphia v. Jewish Hospital Assoc. 148 Pa. St. 454, 23 Atl. 1135, 30 W. N. C. 25, it was held that a hospital building originally used for that purpose by an association which had moved to another building was no longer exempt from taxation. The court said: "A hospital building is not a hospital in the true sense of the word. No charity is administered by the mere possession of the building. As a building only, and independently of its uses, it is a mere house, and comes strictly within the taxing laws as such. To entitle it to consideration as a hospital it is essential that it be devoted to the purposes for which hospitals are used. Whenever it is restored to such use it may with propriety be claimed that it has been brought within the operation of the exempting laws. Until then the property is nothing but a house and land, and as such it is subject to taxation, as are other houses and land." Compare Cox v. Rabbits, 3 App. Cas. (Eng.) 473.

RAICH.

United States Supreme Court—November 1, 1915.

239 U. S. 33; 36 S. Ct. 7.

States — Liability to Suit — What Constitutes Suit against State.

A suit by an alien to restrain the attorney general and county attorney from enforcing to his injury the Arizona anti-alien labor law of December 14, 1914, which he asserts is repugnant to the Federal Constitution, cannot be regarded as a suit against the state.

[See 14 Ann. Cas. 791.]

Injunctions — Restraining Prosecution under Invalid Statute.

Equity has jurisdiction to restrain the criminal prosecution of an employer under the Arizona anti-alien labor law of December 14, 1914, at the instance of an alien employee who alleges that the act violates the Federal Constitution and that its enforcement will result in his immediate discharge from employment, although such employment may be one at will, rather than for a term.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 121; 19 Ann. Cas. 459; 35 Am. St. Rep. 677.]

Aliens — Statute Restricting Employment — Validity.

The discrimination against aliens lawfully resident in the state, which is produced by the provisions of Arizona Act of December 14, 1914, that every employer of more than five workers at any one time, "regardless of kind or class of work or sex of workers shall employ not less than eighty per cent qualified electors or native-born citizens of the United States or some subdivision thereof," renders the statute invalid under U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 538) as denying the equal protection of the laws, and such statute cannot be justified as an exercise of the power of the state to make reasonable classifications in legislating to promote the health, safety, morals, and welfare of those within its jurisdiction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from United States District Court, District of Arizona.

Action by Mike Raich, plaintiff, against William Truax, Sr., et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Wiley E. Jones, Leslie C. Hardy, George W. Harben, J. Addison Hicks and W. B. Cleary for appellants.

Alexander Britton, Evans Browne and Francis W. Clements for appellee.

[35] HUGHES, J.—Under the initiative provision of the constitution of Arizona (Art. IV. § 1), there was adopted the following measure which was proclaimed by the Governor as a law of the State on December 14, 1914:

"An act to protect the citizens of the United States in their employment against non-citizens of the United States, in Arizona, and to provide penalties and punishment for the violation thereof,

"Be it enacted by the People of the State of Arizona:

"Section 1. Any company, corporation, partnership, association or individual who is, or may hereafter become an employer of more than five (5) workers at any one time, in the State of Arizona, regardless of kind or class of work, or sex of workers, shall employ not less than eighty (80) per cent qualified electors or native-born citizens of the United States or some sub-division thereof.

"Sec. 2. Any company, corporation, partnership, association or individual, their agent or agents, found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this Act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to a fine of not less than one hundred (100.00) dollars, and imprisoned for not less than thirty (30) days.

"Sec. 3. Any employee who shall misrepresent, or make false statement, as to his or her nativity or citizenship, shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not less than one hundred ($100.00) dollars, and imprisoned for not less than thirty (30) days." Laws of Arizona, 1915. Initiative Measure, p. 12.

[36] Mike Raich (the appellee), a native of Austria, and an inhabitant of the State of Arizona but not a qualified elector, was employed as a cook by the appellant William Truax, Sr., in his restaurant in the City of Bisbee, Cochise County. Truax had nine employees, of whom seven were neither "native-born citizens" of the United States nor qualified electors. After the election at which the act was passed Raich was informed by his employer that when the law was proclaimed, and solely by reason of its requirements and because of the fear of the penalties that would be incurred in case of its violation, he would be discharged. Thereupon, on December 15, 1914, Raich filed this bill in the District Court of the United States for the District of Arizona, asserting among other things that the act denied to him the equal protection of the laws and hence was contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States (9 Fed. St. Ann. 538). Wiley E. Jones, the attorney general of the State, and W. G. Gilmore, the county attorney of Cochise County, were made defendants in addition to the employer

Truax, upon the allegation that these officers would prosecute the employer unless he complied with its terms and that in order to avoid such a prosecution the employer was about to discharge the complainant. Averring that there was no adequate remedy at law, the bill sought a decree declaring the act to be unconstitutional and restraining action thereunder.

Soon after the bill was filed, an application was made for an injunction pendente lite. After notice of this application, Truax was arrested for a violation of the act, upon a complaint prepared by one of the assistants in the office of the County Attorney of Cochise County, and as it appeared that by reason of the determination of the officers to enforce the act there was danger of the complainant's immediate discharge from employment, the district judge granted a temporary restraining order.

The allegations of the bill were not controverted. The [37] defendants joined in a motion to dismiss upon the grounds (1) that the suit was against the State of Arizona without its consent; (2) that it was sought to enjoin the enforcement of a criminal statute; (3) that the bill did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in equity; and (4) that there was an improper joinder of parties and the plaintiff was not entitled to sue for the relief asked. The application for an interlocutory injunction and the motion to dismiss were then heard before three judges, as required by § 266 of the Judicial Code (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 242). The motion to dismiss was denied and an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants, the attorney general and the county attorney, and their successors and assistants, from enforcing the act against the defendant Truax, was granted. 219 Fed. 273. This direct appeal has been taken.

As the bill is framed upon the theory that the act is unconstitutional, and that the defendants who are public officers concerned with the enforcement of the laws of the State are about to proceed wrongfully to the complainant's injury through interference with his employment, it is established that the suit cannot be regarded as one against the State. Whatever doubt existed in this class of cases was removed by the decision in Ex p. Young, 209 U. S. 123, 155, 161 [14 Ann. Cas. 764, 28 S. Ct. 441, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 714, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932] which has repeatedly been followed; Ludwig v. West. Union Tel. Co. 216 U. S. 146 [30 S. Ct. 280, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 423]; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Andrews, 216 U. S. 165 [30 S. Ct. 286, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 430]; Herndon v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 218 U. S. 135, 155 [30 S. Ct. 633, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 970]; Hopkins v. Clemson Agricultural College, 221 U. S. 636, 643-645 [31 S. Ct. 654, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 890, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 243]; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 607, 620 [32 S. Ct. 340, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 570]; Home Telephone, etc. Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U. S. 278, 293 [33 S. Ct. 312, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 510].

It is also settled that while a court of equity, generally speaking, has "no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment or the pardon of crimes or misdemeanors" (In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 210 [8 S. Ct. 482, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 402]) a distinction obtains, and equitable jurisdiction exists to restrain criminal prosecutions [38] under unconstitutional enactments, when the prevention of such prosecutions is essential to the safeguarding of rights of property. Davis, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207, 218 [23 S. Ct. 498, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 778]; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 241 [25 S. Ct. 18, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 169]; Ex p. Young, supra; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, supra, p. 621. The right to earn a livelihood and to continue in employment unmolested by efforts to enforce void enactments should similarly be entitled to protection in the absence of adequate remedy at law. It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employee has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will. Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 487 [59 N. E. 125, 83 Am. St. Rep. 289, 52 L.R.A. 115]; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353; Brennan v. United Hatters North America, 73 N. J. L. 729, 743 [9 Ann. Cas. 698, 65 Atl. 165, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254]; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 166 [38 Atl. 96, 60 Am. St. Rep. 252]; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters, etc. Assembly No. 7507, 77 Md. 396 [26 Atl. 505, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421, 19 L.R.A. 408]; London Guarantee, etc. Co. v. Horn, 101 Ill. App. 355, 206 Ill. 493 [69 N. E. 526, 99 Am. St. Rep. 185]; Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206 [1 So. 934, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367]; Blumenthal v. Shaw, 23 C. C. A. 590, 77 Fed. 954. It is further urged that the complainant cannot sue save to redress his own grievance (McCabe v. Atchison, etc. Ry. 235 U. S. 151, 162 [35 S. Ct. 69, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 169]); that is, that the servant cannot complain for the master, and that it is the master who is subject to prosecution, and not the complainant. But the act undertakes to operate directly upon the employment of aliens and if enforced would compel the employer to discharge a sufficient number of his employees to bring the [39] alien quota within the prescribed limit. It sufficiently appears that the discharge of the complainant will be solely for the purpose of meeting of the requirements of the act and avoiding threatened prosecution under its provisions. It is, therefore, idle to call the injury indirect or remote. It is also entirely clear that unless the enforcement of the act is restrained the complainant will have no adequate remedy, and hence we think that the case falls within the class in which, if the unconstitutionality of the act is shown, equitable relief may be had.

The question then is whether the act assailed is repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment. Upon the allegations of the bill, it must be assumed that the complainant, a native of Austria, has been admitted to the United States under the Federal law. He was thus admitted with the privilege of entering and abiding in the United States, and hence of entering and abiding in any State in the Union. (See Gegiow v. Uhl, Commissioner, decided October 25, 1915 [239 U. S. 3, 36 S. Ct. 239, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 114]). Being lawfully an inhabitant of Arizona, the complainant is entitled under the Fourteenth Amendment to the equal protection of its laws. The description—"any person within its jurisdiction"—as it has frequently been held, includes aliens. "These provisions," said the court in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 369 [6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 220] (referring to the due process and equal protection clauses of the Amendment), "are universal in their application, to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction, without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality; and the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws." See also Wong Wing v. U. S. 163 U. S. 228, 242 [16 S. Ct. 977, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 140]; U. S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 695 [18 S. Ct. 456, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 890]. The discrimination defined by the act does not pertain to the regulation or distribution of the public domain, or of the common property for resources of the people of the State, the enjoyment of which may be limited to its citizens as against [40] both aliens and the citizens of other States. Thus in McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 396 [24 U. S. (L. ed.) 248]; the restriction to the citizens of Virginia of the right to plant oysters in one of its rivers was sustained upon the ground that the regulation related to the common property of the citizens of the State, and an analogous principle was involved in Pat- sone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 145, 146

[34 S. Ct. 281, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 539] where the discrimination against aliens upheld by the court had for its object the protection of wild game within the States with respect to which it was said that the State could exercise its preserving power for the benefit of its own citizens if it pleased. The case now presented is not within these decisions, or within those relating to the devolution of real property (Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483 [25 U. S. (L. ed.) 628]; Blythe v. Hinckley, 180 U. S. 333, 341, 342 [21 S. Ct. 390, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 557]); and it should be added that the act is not limited to persons who are engaged on public work or received the benefit of public moneys. The discrimination here involved is imposed upon the conduct of ordinary private enterprise.

The act, it will be observed, provides that every employer (whether corporation, partnership, or individual) who employs more than five workers at any one time "regardless of kind or class of work, or sex of workers" shall employ "not less than eighty per cent qualified electors or native born citizens of the United States or some subdivision thereof." It thus covers the entire field of industry with the exception of enterprises that are relatively very small. Its application in the present case is to employment in a restaurant the business of which requires nine employees. The purpose of an act must be found in its natural operation and effect (Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, 268 [23 U. S. (L. ed.) 543]; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 244 [31 S. Ct. 145, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 191]), and the purpose of this act is not only plainly shown by its provisions, but it is frankly revealed in its title. It is there described as "An act to protect the citizens of the United States in their employment against non-citizens [41] of the United States, in Arizona." As the appellants rightly say, there has been no subterfuge. It is an act aimed at the employment of aliens, as such, in the business described. Literally, its terms might be taken to include with aliens those naturalized citizens who by reason of change of residence might not be at the time qualified electors in any subdivision of the United States, but we are dealing with the main purpose of the statute, definitely stated, in the execution of which the complainant is to be forced out of his employment as a cook in a restaurant, simply because he is an alien.

It is sought to justify this act as an exercise of the power of the State to make reasonable classifications in legislating to promote the health, safety, morals and welfare of those within its jurisdiction. But this admitted authority, with the broad range of legislative discretion that it implies, does not go so far as to make it possible for the State to deny to lawful inhabitants, because of their race or nationality, the ordinary means of earning a livelihood. It requires no argument to show that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is of the very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the Amendment to secure. Butchers' Union Slaughter-House Co. v. Crescent City Live-Stock Landing Co. 111 U. S. 746, 762 [4 S. Ct. 652, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 585]; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31 [5 S. Ct. 357, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 923]; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra; Allegeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 589, 590 [17 S. Ct. 427, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 832]; Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 14 [35 S. Ct. 240, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 441]. If this could be refused solely upon the ground of race or nationality, the prohibition of the denial to any person of the equal protection of the laws would be a barren form of words. It is no answer to say, as it is argued, that the act proceeds upon the assumption that "the employment of aliens unless restrained was a peril to the public welfare." The discrimination against aliens in the wide range of employments to which the act relates is made an end in itself and thus the authority to deny to aliens, upon the mere [42] fact of their alienage, the right to obtain support in the ordinary fields of labor is necessarily involved. It must also be said that reasonable classification implies action consistent with the legitimate interests of the State, and it will not be disputed that these cannot be so broadly conceived as to bring them into hostility to exclusive Federal power. The authority to control immigration—to admit or exclude aliens—is vested solely in the Federal Government. Fong Yue Ting v. U. S. 149 U. S. 698, 713 [13 S. Ct. 1016, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 905.] The assertion of an authority to deny to aliens the opportunity of earning a livelihood when lawfully admitted to the State would be tantamount to the assertion of the right to deny them entrance and abode, for in ordinary cases they cannot live where they cannot work. And, if such a policy were permissible, the practical result would be that those lawfully admitted to the country under the authority of the acts of Congress, instead of enjoying in a substantial sense and in their full scope the privileges conferred by the admission, would be segregated in such of the States as chose to offer hospitality.

It is insisted that the act should be supported because it is not "a total deprivation of the right of the alien to labor;" that is, the restriction is limited to those businesses in which more than five workers are employed, and to the ratio fixed. It is emphasized that the employer in any line of business who employs more than five workers may employ aliens to the extent of twenty per cent of his employees. But the fallacy of this argument at once appears. If the State is at liberty to treat the employment of aliens as in itself a peril requiring restraint regardless of kind of work, it cannot be denied that the authority exists to make its measures to that end effective. Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606 [23 S. Ct. 168, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 323]; New York v. Hesterberg, 211 U. S. 31 [29 S. Ct. 10, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 75]; Purity Extract, etc. Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192 [33 S. Ct. 44, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 184]. If the restriction to twenty per cent now imposed is maintainable the State undoubtedly has the power if it sees fit to make the percentage [43] less. We have nothing before us to justify the limitation to twenty per cent save the judgment expressed in the enactment, and if that is sufficient, it is difficult to see why the apprehension and conviction thus evidenced would not be sufficient were the restriction extended so as to permit only ten per cent of the employees to be aliens or even a less percentage, or were it made applicable to all business in which more than three workers were employed instead of applying to those employing more than five. We have frequently said that the legislature may recognize degrees of evil and adapt its legislation accordingly (St. Louis Consol. Coal Co. v. Illinois, 185 U. S. 203, 207 [22 S. Ct. 616, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 872]; McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 539, 551 [29 S. Ct. 206, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 315]; Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 384 [35 S. Ct. 342, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 628, L.R.A. 1915F 820]); but underlying the classification is the authority to deal with that at which the legislation is aimed. The restriction now sought to be sustained is such as to suggest no limit to the State's power of excluding aliens from employment if the principle underlying the prohibition of the act is conceded. No special public interest with respect to any particular business is shown that could possibly be deemed to support the enactment, for as we have said it relates to every sort. The discrimination is against aliens as such in competition with citizens in the described range of enterprises and in our opinion it clearly falls under the condemnation of the fundamental law. The question of rights under treaties was not expressly presented by the bill, and, although mentioned in the argument, does not require attention in view of the invalidity of the act under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Order affirmed.

MCREYNOLDS, J. (dissenting).—I am unable to agree with the opinion of the majority of the court. It seems to me plain that this is a suit against [44] a state to which the Eleventh Amendment declares "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend." Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S. 516, 19 S. Ct. 269, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 535. If Ex p. Young, 209 U. S. 123, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, 28 S. Ct. 441, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 714, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932, and the cases following it support the doctrine that Federal courts may enjoin the enforcement of criminal statutes enacted by state legislatures whenever the enjoyment of some constitutional right happens to be threatened with temporary interruption, they should be overruled in that regard. The simple, direct language of the Amendment ought to be given effect, not refined away. That the challenged act is invalid I think admits of no serious doubt.

NOTE.

Validity of Statute Discriminating against Aliens in Employment of Laborers.

In the reported case it is held (affirming 219 Fed. 273) that an Arizona statute prohibiting any employer of five or more laborers from having in his employ more than twenty per cent of aliens is void as a denial of the equal protection of the law. In accord with the rule laid down in the reported case are several cases holding to be invalid a Pennsylvania statute (Act of June 15, 1897) which imposed on every employer of an unnaturalized alien a tax of three cents for each day that the alien should be employed. See Fraser v. McConway, etc. Co. 82 Fed. 257, 6 Pa. Dist. 555; Juniata Limestone Co. v. Fagley, 187 Pa. St. 193, 40 Atl. 977, 67 Am. St. Rep. 579, 42 L.R.A. 442, affirming 7 Pa. Dist. 201; Ade v. County Comrs. 7 Pa. Dist. 199. In the case first cited it was said: "Can the tax laid by the Pennsylvania Act of June 15, 1897, be sustained consistently with the principles enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases which have arisen under the Fourteenth Amendment? I think not. This tax, as we have seen, is imposed 'at the rate of three cents per day for each day each of such foreign-born unnaturalized male persons may be employed.' The tax is of an unusual character, and is directed against and confined to a particular class of persons. Evidently the act is intended to hinder the employment of foreign-born unnaturalized male persons over twenty-one years of age. The act is hostile to and discriminates against such persons. It interposes to the pursuit by them of their lawful avocations obstacles to which others, under like circumstances, are not subjected. It imposes upon these persons burdens which are not laid upon others in the same calling and condition. The tax is an arbitrary deduction from the daily wages of a particular class of persons. Now, the equal protection of the laws declared by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution secures to each person within the jurisdiction of a state exemption from any burdens or charges other than such as are equally laid upon all others under like circumstances. The Railroad Tax Cases, 13 Fed. 722, 733. The court there, in discussing the prohibitions of the amendment, said: 'Unequal exactions in every form, or under any pretense, are absolutely forbidden; and, of course, unequal taxation, for it is in that form that oppressive burdens are usually laid.' It is idle to suggest that the case in hand is one of proper legislative classification. A valid classification for the purposes of taxation must have a just and reasonable basis, which is lacking here."

As to the validity of a statute prohibiting the employment of alien labor on public works see the note to People v. Crane, Ann. Cas. 1915B 1254, 1271, and see Heim v. McCall, the case immediately following.

McCALL ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—November 29, 1915.

239 U. S. 175; 36 S. Ct. 78.

Courts — Federal Courts Following State Decision — Scope of State Statute.

The application of the provisions of N. Y. Consol. Laws, chap. 31, § 14, against the employment of aliens on public works to contracts for the construction of subways in New York city, and the extent to which they affect the corporate rights of the city or of the subway contractors, are local questions not open for review in the Federal Supreme Court on writ of error to a state court.

Municipal Corporations — Power of State to Regulate — Labor on Municipal Improvements.

The general power of a state over its municipalities extends to the regulation of the kind of laborers which may be employed in the construction of public works by or for such municipalities.

Aliens — Statute Prohibiting Employment on Public Works — Validity.

Privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states are not abridged, contrary to U. S. Const. art. 4, § 2 (9 Fed. St. Ann. 158), by the provisions of N. Y. Consol. Laws, chap. 31, § 14, that only citizens of the United States may be employed in the construction of public works by or for the state or a municipality, and that in such employment citizens of New York state must be given preference.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The freedom to contract secured by U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 428) is not infringed by the provisions of N. Y. Consol. Laws, chap. 31, § 14, that only citizens of the United States may be employed in the construction of public works by or for the state or a municipality, and that in such employment citizens of New York state must be given preference.

Error to New York Court of Appeals.

Action by William E. Heim, et al., plaintiffs, against Edward E. McCall, et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants in trial court reversed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court, First Judicial Department. Judgment of Appellate Division reversed by Court of Appeals. Plaintiffs bring error. AFFIRMED.

[176] BILL in equity to restrain the Public Service Commission for the first district of the State of New York from declaring certain contracts for the construction of portions of the rapid subway system of the City of New York void and forfeited for violation of certain provisions inserted in the contracts in pursuance of § 14 of the Labor Law (so-called) of the State. Laws 1909, ch. 36, Consol. Laws, ch. 31 (Book 30, McKinney's Consol. Laws). It reads as follows:

"Section 14. Preference in employment of persons upon public works.—In the construction of public works by the State or a municipality, or by persons contracting with the state or such municipality, only citizens of the United States shall be employed; and in all cases where laborers are employed on any such public works, preference [177] shall be given citizens of the State of New York. In each contract for the construction of public works a provision shall be inserted, to the effect that, if the provisions of this section are not complied with, the contract shall be void. . . . "1

It is provided that a list of contracts theretofore made, with the names and addresses of the contractors, shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Labor, and when new contracts are allowed the names and addresses of such new contractors shall likewise be filed and, upon demand, each contractor shall furnish a list of subcontractors in his employ. Each contractor is required to keep a list of his employees which shall set forth whether they are naturalized or native born citizens of the United States. A violation of the section is made a misdemeanor.

The case went off on demurrer and it is therefore necessary to give a summary of the bill, which we do in narrative form, as follows:

Heim is a property owner and taxpayer of the State of New York. The defendants are the acting Public Service Commissioners for the First District of the State of New York and have been constituted and are the Public Service Commission of that district.

The Board of Rapid Transit Railroad Commissioners for the City of New York under the laws of the State (referred to as the Rapid Transit Act) in 1896 laid out and established a route for said railroad in the city, which was subsequently constructed, equipped and operated. [178] Afterwards other routes were established, constructed, equipped and operated.

These routes were located in the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx and Brooklyn, and since 1912 and prior thereto have been leased and operated by the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, referred to as the Interborough Company. There has been a like lease of roads in Brooklyn by the Con-

¹Section 14 of the Labor Law was amended by act of March 11, 1915, ch. 51, Laws of New York, 1915, as follows:

"SECTION 14. Preference in employment of persons upon public works.—In the construction of public works by the State or a municipality, or by persons contracting with the State or such municipality, preference shall be given to citizens over aliens. Aliens may be employed when citizens are not available. . . ."

solidated Railroad Company, called the Brooklyn Company.

The Board of Rapid Transit Commissioners, acting under the laws of the State, decided that other rapid transit railroads were necessary, and determined and established routes and the general plans for the construction thereof.

The lines are described and respectively called Interborough lines and Brooklyn lines.

The Board and the Public Service Commission contemplated that such extension and additions would form, with the existing Interborough and Brooklyn lines, a complete and comprehensive rapid transit system for the accommodation of the entire city. And the construction of such roads was deemed and was and has been an imperative necessity for the comfort and conveyance of the residents and taxpayers of the city.

The cost of construction of such new roads was upwards of $235,000,000 and their equipment $44,000,000. The city had no available money and could not borrow the necessary moneys for a large part of such construction or equipment without exceeding its legal and constitutional debt limit by many million dollars.

To utilize the old with the new systems upon a 5-cent fare basis and to overcome the difficulties and delays for lack of funds and accomplish the early construction and operation of the system on the best possible terms for the city, negotiations were entered into between the Public Service Commission and the city authorities on the one [179] part and the Interborough Company and the Brooklyn Company on the other part with a view of formulating and entering into contracts with the companies for the provision of funds for the construction and operation of roads.

A form of contract was finally agreed upon and a contract was duly signed, executed and delivered by the Interborough Company on the one part and the Public Service Commission in behalf of the city on the other part, on or about March 19, 1913.

As a result of the negotiations another contract was entered into with the New York Municipal Railway Company, which had been formed in the interest of the Brooklyn Company, whereby the latter company agreed to contribute toward the cost of construction and equipment and to lease and operate a portion of the roads in conjunction with the then existing system. There is an enumeration of the provisions of the contracts and the amounts to be contributed by the companies and for the lease of the routes.

The contracts were made a part of the public records and approved by the Board of Estimates and Apportionment and other proper authorities before execution.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—19.

The Public Service Commission has let and awarded each of the contracts for construction of the new routes and the Interborough Company became a party to many of them for the purpose stated in the contracts, that is, "solely for the purpose of paying out a part of its contribution towards the cost of construction of the said respective routes."

The new routes were duly approved by the proper authorities and the Public Service Commission in accordance with the general plan of the routes, either obtaining the consent of the property owners along the routes or, failing to obtain such consent, having commissioners appointed by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court to determine [180] and report whether the routes were to be constructed and operated according to the plans adopted. The commissioners reported favorably and their report was confirmed by the court, and the general plans "thereafter constituted and now are the routes and general plans of the so-called Dual System of Rapid Transit Railroads herein referred to."

In pursuance of the Rapid Transit Act the Public Service Commission prepared plans and specifications for the construction of the major portion of said routes in accordance with the general plans, and thereafter, before awarding any contract, advertised for proposals in the form of an invitation to contractors and in compliance with the Rapid Transit Act and the acts amending and supplementing it.

Bids were duly made and contracts duly awarded and approved by the proper authorities.

Each of the contracts contained the following provisions: "In obedience to the requirements of section 14 of the Labor Law, it is further provided that if the provisions of said section 14 are not complied with, this contract shall be void." A provision in identical language was contained in the invitation to bidders.

The requirement (it is alleged) both in the proposals and contracts is unconstitutional, void and of no effect, in that it is in conflict with § 2 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States (9 Fed. St. Ann. 158) (that is, "The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States") and with § 1 of Article XIV of the amendments to the Constitution (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416 et seq.) and with other sections and provisions; also in violation of the constitution of the State and in conflict with the treaty between the United States and Italy and various other treaties which contain "the Most Favored Nation Clause"—in other words, providing that the citizens of such countries shall enjoy all the privileges, rights and [181] immunities which the citizens of countries most favored in any existing treaty with the United States enjoy.

All of the contractors promptly made the necessary preparations for the execution of their contracts and all are in the process of performance at different stages, some of them having been performed to the extent of 75% and all performed to a very large extent. In no instance are any of the contractors in default.

In the course of construction each of the contractors has constantly employed and now employs a large number of laborers and mechanics who are residents of the city of New York but who were born in Italy and are subjects of its King, and also employed laborers who, though citizens of the United States, were not citizens of New York, and did not give preference to citizens of the State of New York over such laborers so employed who were not citizens of the State but citizens of the United States.

At the time of the proposals it was known to be and is necessary to employ a large number of such subjects of the King of Italy and citizens of other States and of other countries to perform said contracts within the time and at the prices stated in order to keep the construction and equipment of the Dual System within the total amount provided and specified in the contracts and plans.

The treaty between the United States and Italy of 1871 provides that the subjects of the King of Italy residing in the United States shall have and enjoy the same rights and privileges with respect to persons and property as are secured to the citizens of the United States residing in the United States.

At no time since the letting of such contracts has there been available a sufficient force or number of laborers, citizens of the United States or of the State of New York, to perform the work in accordance with such contracts; and no question was raised until a few days since of the right of the contractors to employ alien laborers, which [182] the contractors believed that they had a right to do, and they regarded the provision of the law and of the contract prohibiting the same as in effect null and void.

Within the past ten days complaint has been made to the Public Service Commission of the violation of the law and the alien labor provision in the contracts, and the Commission has threatened to refuse to approve further monthly estimates of amounts payable to contractors, thus depriving them of the means of prosecuting the work and the right to perform the same; indeed, have refused to approve certain monthly estimates, and, unless enjoined, will declare such contracts void and terminate the same.

The termination of the contracts will result in irreparable loss and damage and waste of money to the city, the work will be delayed or not done or the cost will be enormously increased because the supply of labor will be diminished, resulting necessarily in the diminution of labor available for the work which will greatly protract the same; and litigation with the contractors will be caused. Also damage will result because of the fact that a large percentage of capital and money necessary for the work is supplied by third parties under contract with the city to supply the same, which contracts were based upon estimates made in advance, and said contracts may be invalidated and the purpose for which they were made defeated.

The total capital to be supplied was $250,000,000, of which the said third parties agreed to supply $115,000,000 and the city the balance. If the contracts be declared void the capital so to be supplied will be inadequate for the work and the money already supplied by the city and the said third parties will have been wasted.

Injunction is prayed against declaring the contracts void and forfeited and refusing to prepare and certify vouchers of the amount of monthly estimates for work done.

[183] There was a demurrer to the bill, which was sustained by the Supreme Court, and injunction denied. The judgment was reversed by the Appellate Division and an injunction ordered, which action was reversed by the Court of Appeals and the bill ordered dismissed. 214 N. Y. 620.

Thomas F. Conrady and Thomas E. O'Brien for plaintiff in error Heim.

James F. McKinney for plaintiffs in error Cranford Company and Flinn-O'Rourke Company.

George S. Coleman for defendants in error.

[186] McKENNA, J. (after stating the facts).—There seems to have been no question raised as to the right of Heim to maintain the suit, although he is not one of the contractors nor a laborer of the excluded nationality or citizenship. The Appellate Division felt that there might be objection to the right, under the holding of a [187] cited case. The Court of Appeals, however, made no comment, and we must—certainly may—assume that Heim had a right of suit; and, so assuming, we pass to the merits.

The Supreme Court put its decision upon the power of the State "to provide what laborers shall be employed upon public works" and that "the State has the same right in conducting its business that an individual has" and had, therefore, "a perfect right to enact § 14 of the Labor Law, and it does not violate any rights of an alien under existing treaties"

The Appellate Division of the court, however, was of opinion that the law could not be sustained upon such consideration and saw in it such flagrant discrimination as to be offensive to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and so concluding, the court considered it unnecessary to discuss the effect of treaties.

The court also passed, without absolute decision, the question whether the Labor Law applies to the work of building subways for the Rapid Transit in the City of New York. It was, however, stated in the opinion of the court that in view of the language in a cited case, there was "much ground for saying that even if the State could lawfully impose the test of citizenship upon employees of its own contractors, and the contractors with the city engaged in what is properly state work, it has no more power to impose such test upon the persons employed in building a subway for the city than it would have if the subway were being constructed by a private corporation or individual." Two members of the court were clear that the State had no such power and concurred besides with the majority in holding that the Labor Law was "a violation of both the Federal and state constitutions."

The Court of Appeals reversed the action of the Appellate Division.

[188] The basic principle of the decision of the Court of Appeals was that the State is a recognized unit and those who are not citizens of it are not members of it. Thus recognized it is a body corporate and, "like any other body corporate, it may enter into contracts and hold and dispose of property. In doing this, it acts through agencies of government. These agencies, when contracting for the State, or expending the State's moneys, are trustees for the people of the State (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 13 S. Ct. 110, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 1018). It is the people, i. e., the members of the State, who are contracting or expending their own moneys through agencies of their own creation." And it was hence decided that in the control of such agencies and the expenditure of such moneys it could prefer its own citizens to aliens without incurring the condemnation of the National or the state constitution. "The statute is nothing more," said Chief Judge Bartlett, concurring in the judgment of the court "in effect than a resolve by an employer as to the character of its employees."

Notwithstanding the simplicity of the determining principle pronounced by the Court of Appeals, its decision is attacked in many and voluminous briefs.

The fundamental proposition of plaintiff in error Heim is that, assuming that § 14 applies to the subway construction contracts in question, it (the law) contravenes the provisions of the Constitution of the United States (a) in that it violates the corporate rights of the city and the rights of its residents and taxpayers, (b) the rights of the various subway contractors with the city, (c) the rights of aliens and citizens of other States resident in New York, and (d) it is in violation of treaty rights.

Plaintiffs in error Cranford Company and Flinn-O'Rourke Company were made defendants upon their motion at the argument for injunction. In the Appellate Division they, their counsel say, "neither assenting to nor denying the special allegations, doubtless urged by complainant's [189] counsel, . . . urged the single ground of the unconstitutionality of the law and its violation of treaties." And these grounds are again urged.

To sustain the charge of unconstitutionality the Fourteenth Amendment is adduced, and the specification is that the law abridges the privileges and immunities of the contractors and those of their alien employees in depriving them of their right of contracting for labor, and that the State of New York, by enacting and enforcing the law, deprives employers and employees of liberty and property without due process of law and denies to both the equal protection of the law.

The treaty that it is urged to be violated is that with Italy, which, it is contended, "put aliens within the State of New York upon an equality with citizens of the State with respect to the right to labor upon public works;" and that Congress has fortified the treaty by § 1977 of the Revised Statutes [2 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 126]—(a part of the Civil Rights legislation.)

The application of the law to the subway contracts, and whatever its effect and to what extent it affects the corporate rights of the city or of the subway contractors are local questions (Stewart v. Kansas City, 239 U. S. 14, 36 S. Ct. 15, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 120), and have in effect been decided adversely to plaintiffs in error by the Court of Appeals. The principle of its decision was, as we have seen, that the law expressed a condition to be observed in the construction of public works; and this necessarily involved the application of § 14 to subway construction and the subordinate relation in which the city stood to the State. Therefore, the contention of plaintiffs in error that the rapid transit lines have given the city rights superior to the control of the State, so far as the law in question is concerned, has met with adverse decision. Whatever of local law or considerations are involved in the decision we are bound by; whatever of dependence the decision has in the general power of a [190] State over its municipalities has support in many cases. We have recently decided the power exists, and we may be excused from further discussion of it. Stewart v. Kansas City, supra.

With the rejection of the asserted rights of the city must go the asserted rights of residents and taxpayers therein and the rights of subway contractors, so far as they depend upon the asserted freedom of the city from the control of the State.

The claim of a right in the city of such freedom is peculiar. The State created a scheme of rapid transit, constituted officers and invested them with powers to execute the scheme, yet, the contention is, that scheme, officers and powers have become in some way in their exercise and effect superior to the state law, or, according to the explicit contention (we say explicit contention, but it is rather a conclusion from an elaborate argument and much citation of cases) that the city's action in regard to the subway is proprietary in character, and, being such, the city can assert rights against the State, and that individual rights have accrued to residents of the city of which the city is the trustee and which "are so interwoven and bound up with the rapid transit system as to be 'beyond the control of the State.'" Counsel have not given us a sure test of when action by a city is governmental and when proprietary. We need not attempt a characterization. If it be granted that the city acted in the present case in a proprietary character and has secured proprietary rights, to what confusion are we brought! A taxpayer of the city, invoking the rights of the city, asserts against the control by the State of the proprietary action of the city the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment, and then against the proprietary action of the city that Amendment is urged in favor of the contractors with the city, and their exemption from the performance of their contracts declared. There seems to be a jumble of rights. [191] If the city is not an agent of the State (it is contended the city is not) but a private proprietor (it is contended the city is) it would seem as if it has the rights and powers of such a proprietor, and, as such, may make what contracts please it, including or excluding alien laborers.

But upon these suppositions we need not dwell. It is clear it is with the state law and the city's execution of it as agent of the State that we must deal and only on the assumption that the state law has been held to apply to the Court of Appeals, and, by a consideration of the power to enact it, determine the contentions of all of the plaintiffs in error.

The contentions of plaintiffs in error under the Constitution of the United States and the arguments advanced to support them were at one time formidable in discussion and decision. We can now answer them by authority. They were considered in Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 222, 223, 24 S. Ct. 124, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 148. It was there declared, and it was the principle of decision, that "it belongs to the State, as guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its affairs, to prescribe the condition, upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities." And it was said, "No court has authority to review its action in that respect. Regulations on this subject suggest only considerations of public policy. And with such considerations the courts have no concern."

This was the principle declared and applied by the Court of Appeals in the decision of the present case. Does the instance of the case justify the application of the principle? In Atkin v. Kansas the law attacked and sustained prescribed the hours (8) which should constitute a day's work for those employed by or on behalf of the State, or by or on behalf of any of its subdivisions. The Fourteenth Amendment was asserted against the law: indeed, there is not a contention made in this case that was not made in that. Immunity of municipal corporations from legislative [192] interference in their property and private contracts was contended for there (as here); also that employees of contractors were not employees of cities. It was contended there (as here) that the capacity in which the city acted, whether public or private, was a question of general law not dependent upon local considerations or statutes, and that this court was not bound by the decision of the state court. And there (as here) was asserted a right to contest the law, though the contracts were made subsequent to and apparently subject to it, upon the ground that they were entered into under the belief that the law was void. Finally the ultimate contention there was (as it is here) that the liberty of contract assured by the Fourteenth Amendment was infringed by the law. In all particulars except one the case was the prototype of this. There the hours of labor were prescribed; here the kind of laborers to be employed. The one is as much of the essence of the right regulated as the other, that is, the same elements are in both cases—the right of the individual employer and employee to contract as they shall see fit, the relation of the State to the matter regulated, that is, the public character of the work.

The power of regulation was decided to exist whether a State undertook a public work itself or whether it "invested one of its governmental agencies with power to care" for the work, which, it was said, "whether done by the State directly or by one of its instrumentalities," was "of a public, not private, character." And, being of public character, it (the law—the Kansas statute) did not "infringe the liberty of any one." The declaration was emphasized. "It cannot be deemed," it was said, "a part of the liberty of any contractor that he be allowed to do public work in any mode he may choose to adopt, without regard to the wishes of the State." And obversely it was said (as we have already quoted): "On the contrary, it belongs to the State, as the guardian of its people, and [193] having control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions [italics ours] upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities." See also Ellis v. U. S. 206 U. S. 246, 11 Ann. Cas. 589, 27 S. Ct. 600, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 1047. The contentions of plaintiffs in error, therefore, which are based on the Fourteenth Amendment cannot be sustained.

Are plaintiffs in error any better off under the treaty provision which they invoke in their bill? The treaty with Italy is the one especially applicable, for the aliens employed are subjects of the King of Italy. By that Treaty (1871) it is provided, Articles II and III, 17 Stat. 845, 846:

"The citizens of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to travel in the States and Territories of the other, to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to hire and occupy houses and warehouses, to employ agents of their choice, and generally to do anything incident to, or necessary for trade, upon the same terms as the natives of the country, submitting themselves to the laws there established."

"The citizens of each of the high contracting parties shall receive, in the States and Territories of the other, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, and shall enjoy in this respect the same rights and privileges as are or shall be granted to the natives, on their submitting themselves to the conditions imposed upon the natives." (7 Fed. St. Ann. 650.)

There were slight modifications of these provisions in the treaty of 1913, as follows: "That the citizens of each of the high contracting parties shall receive in the States and Territories of the other, the most constant security and protection for their persons and property and for their rights. . . ."

Construing the provision of 1871 the Court of Appeals decided that it "does not limit the power of the States, as a proprietor, to control the construction of its own works and the distribution of its moneys." The conclusion [194] is inevitable, we think, from the principles we have announced. We need not follow counsel in dissertation upon the treaty-making power or the obligations of treaties when made. The present case is concerned with construction, not power; and we have precedents to guide construction. The treaty with Italy was considered in Patstone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 145, 34 S. Ct. 281, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 539, and a convention with Switzerland (as in the present case) which was supposed to become a part of it. It was held that a law of Pennsylvania making it unlawful for unnaturalized foreign born residents to kill game and to that end making the possession of shotguns and rifles unlawful, did not violate the treaty. Adopting the declaration of the court below, it was said "that the equality of rights that the treaty assures is equality only in respect of protection and security for persons and property." And the ruling was given point by a citation of the power of the State over its wild game which might be preserved for its own citizens. In other words, the ruling was given point by the special power of the State over the subject-matter, a power which exists in the case at bar, as we have seen.

From these premises we conclude that the Labor Law of New York and its threatened enforcement do not violate the Fourteenth Amendment or the rights of plaintiffs in error thereunder nor under the provisions of the treaty with Italy.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case sustains the validity of a New York statute forbidding the employment of aliens on public works. The decision proceeds on the ground that a state has a plenary power to prescribe the conditions on which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf or on behalf of one of its municipalities. The cases discussing the validity of a regulation prohibiting the employment of alien labor on public work are reviewed in the note to People v. Crane, Ann. Cas. 1915B 1254, 1271. As to statutes discriminating against aliens in private employment see the note to Truax v. Raich, reported ante, this volume, at page 283.

BAINBRIDGE.

Kansas Supreme Court—March 6, 1915.

94 Kan. 518; 146 Pac. 1165.

Landlord and Tenant — Termination of Lease — Destruction of Building.

Whether or not a building has been totally destroyed is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913A 1095.]

Same.

A tenant, occupying a part of a building under a written lease, may continue to hold under the lease, although the part occupied has become uninhabitable by reason of a partial destruction by fire.

Termination by Consent.

The cancellation of a lease, by act of the parties, must have the consent of both lessor and lessee.

[See generally, Ann. Cas. 1916B 306.]

Damages — Refusal to Permit Tenant to Occupy — Loss of Profits.

Loss of profits, when they can be ascertained, is a proper measure of damages for wrongfully refusing to permit a tenant to occupy the premises covered by a lease.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915B 805.]

Instructions Approved.

An examination of the instructions discloses no error.

Words and Phrases — "Damage by the Elements."

Fire is one of the elements included in the expression "damages by the elements expected," where that phrase is used in a lease of a building.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal and Error — Questions Reviewed — Necessity of Motion for New Trial.

Before the supreme court can reverse a judgment on account of the exclusion of evidence, that evidence must be presented to the trial court when the motion for a new trial is heard.

Trial — Taking Case from Jury.

Judgment on the evidence should not be rendered by a trial court when a jury is a matter of right and there is evidence sufficient to submit to the jury.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Ford county: FINLEY, Judge.

Action by James F. O'Neal et al., doing business as O'Neal & O'Neal, plaintiffs, against Carrie R. Bainbridge, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Arthur C. Scates, Albert Watkins, Frank L. Martin and Van M. Martin for appellant.
L. A. Madison, Carl Van Riper and F. Dumont Smith for appellees.

[519] MARSHALL, J.—Plaintiffs brought this action and recovered a judgment for $800 as damages. The defendant appeals.

The action is based upon the alleged breach of the covenants of a lease by which the defendant leased the plaintiffs the first floor and basement of a building in Dodge City, Kan. On the 10th of March, 1912, the building was partially destroyed by fire. The roof was totally destroyed; a portion of the east wall was burned; the falling of the roof broke through an old skylight, and a portion of the second-story floor was burned through. No damage was done to the foundation; the entire west wall, two stories and basement, being a party wall, was uninjured, and was used in rebuilding. All of the north and south ends, except three or four feet necessary to tie in to the second story of the new east wall, were used. The jury found that [520] the building was not totally destroyed, that the loss was 75 per cent. The fire, unquestionably, left part of the building untenable. The basement continued to be occupied. The plaintiffs allege that the premises occupied by them became uninhabitable, and that they were compelled to remove their fixtures, billiard and pool tables, and stock of goods. After the building was burned, the defendant started to rebuild it, and had some talk with one of the plaintiffs, when she told him she was going to fix the building, and intended for him to go in. Later, she told the plaintiffs that she was going to erect a building for other purposes, and that they could not occupy it. It is alleged that the defendant was bound and obligated to repair the building and place it in a habitable condition, but there is no such covenant in the lease. The building was ready for occupancy about January 1, 1913.

Before the fire the plaintiffs had sublet the basement, and after the fire directed the subtenant to pay the rent directly to the defendant. After the fire the defendant demanded no rent, and the plaintiffs paid none.

At the trial the plaintiffs introduced evidence as to the nature of the business the year before the fire, testified how much business they did, how much money they put in, and how much profit they made.

The court tried the case on the theory that it required a total destruction of the building to terminate and cancel the lease, and submitted the question to the jury as to whether or not the building was totally destroyed. The jury found that there was not a total destruction of the building, that it was 75 per cent destroyed, and found a verdict against the defendant for $800.

The points relied on by the defendant are:

"1. The destruction of the building by fire to the extent of 75 per cent, which rendered it untenable, and uninhabitable, cancelled and terminated the lease.

[521] "2. After the fire, both parties to the contract recognized and treated the lease as cancelled, and the building as untenable.

"3. The loss of profits, in any event, is not the true measure of damages.

"4. The instructions of the court were erroneous.

"5. The court erred in sustaining objections to competent testimony offered by the defendant.

"6. The court erred in overruling the defendant's motion for judgment on the evidence."

1. Whether or not the building had been totally destroyed was a matter for the jury to determine. Counsel have drawn different conclusions from the evidence on this point. Where different conclusions can be reached, the jury must decide. (Johnson v. Leggett, 28 Kan. 590, 607; Brown v. Atchison, etc. R. Co. 31 Kan. 1, 16, 1 Pac. 605; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Matthews, 58 Kan. 447, 452, 49 Pac. 602; Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 12 S. Ct. 679, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 485; 38 Cyc. 1517.)

2. Was the lease canceled and terminated because of the building becoming untenable and uninhabitable by the 75 per cent destruction thereof? The fire rendered the rooms occupied by the plaintiffs untenable and uninhabitable until repairs were made. If the tenants desired to continue the lease, they could do so, by the payment of rent, whether the landlord so desired or not, because the building was not destroyed, although rendered unfit for occupation. (24 Cyc. 1379.)

In Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. U. S. 21 Ct. Cl. 195, Davis, J., said:

"Covenants terminating a lease should the buildings be destroyed are strictly construed as against the lessee, and are held not to relieve him from liability in case of injury to the building short of destruction; that is, if the injury be of such a nature that the property may be repaired without rebuilding the structure, there is no destruction within the meaning of such a covenant, even if the building be temporarily uninhabitable." (p. 201; Vanderpoel v. Smith, 2 Daly 135; Wall v. Hinds, 4 Gray (Mass.) 256, 64 Am. Dec. 64; Izon v. Gorton, 5 Bing. N. Cas. 501, 35 E. C. L. 198; Smith v. McLean, [522] 123 Ill. 210, 14 N. E. 50; Turner v. Mantonya, 27 Ill. App. 500; Monotuck Silk Co. v. Shay, 37 Ill. App. 542; Note, 22 L.R.A. 613.)

3. Did the parties to this lease treat it as canceled after the fire? This is not alleged in the answer, is not embraced in the instructions requested, nor in those given. Some evidence on this question was introduced, but that evidence does not warrant the conclusion that the plaintiffs considered the lease at an end. They did not consent to its cancellation. Where a lease or other contract is canceled by act of the parties, both parties must consent to such cancellation. The evidence fails to show such consent on the part of the plaintiffs. It rather tends to show that the plaintiffs insisted on the performance of the contract. The defendant refused to let the plaintiffs occupy the building after it was repaired.

4. Is loss of profits a proper measure of damages?

"Damages for loss of profits may be recovered where the amount of such loss and the fact that it resulted by defendant's refusal to comply with the alternative writ can be determined by the court with reasonable certainty." (Larabee Flour Mills Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 85 Kan. 214, syl. ¶ 7, 116 Pac. 901.)

This principle was followed in Mensing v. Wright, 86 Kan. 98, 119 Pac. 374, where this court said:

"Where the business of conducting a skating rink is wrongfully interrupted, damages for loss of profits which are neither speculative nor uncertain but can be determined with reasonable certainty may be recovered." (Syl. ¶ 1.)

Loss of increase in the growth and weight of cattle has been held to be a proper measure of damages in an action to recover for failure to furnish the amount of pasture contracted for. (Skinner v. Gibson, 86 Kan. 431, 121 Pac. 513.) The same rule has been applied where cattle have been wrongfully disturbed and frightened. (Davis v. Kansas Gas, etc. Co. 85 Kan. 195, 115 Pac. 977.)

[523] Following these decisions, it was proper for the court to instruct the jury that:

"The measure of damages in such case will be the amount of profit that the plaintiffs would have made in their said business for the remainder of the term of the lease, less the rents for the premises from the time of the fire to the date when again ready for occupancy. In arriving at said profit you may take into consideration the gross receipts for the period up to the time of the fire, the total expenses to be deducted from such gross receipts, and arrive as nearly as possible at the average net profits of the plaintiffs.

"You are not bound to take the net profits of the plaintiffs as the absolute measure of their damage, but may take into consideration the probability or improbability of such profit continuing for the remainder of the term."

5. It is next urged that the instructions of the court were erroneous. Complaint is made of the instruction concerning the measure of damages. That is disposed of. The next matter presented is, that the instruction requiring the defendant to prove a total destruction of the building was erroneous. The defendant plead total destruction of the building. That question was specially submitted to the jury. The jury found that the building had not been totally destroyed. Other instructions are complained of. We have examined them and find no error therein.

6. It is contended that the plaintiffs were bound to repair the building, if it could be repaired. The lease, in part, reads:

"And the said parties of the second part [plaintiffs] . . . agrees that they will, at their own expense, during the continuance of this Lease, keep the said premises and every part thereof in good repair . . . reasonable use and wear thereof and damages by the elements excepted."

Is fire one of the elements within the meaning of this stipulation? In 15 Cyc. 482, it is said: "Elements. In common speech, earth, air, fire and water." In Van [524] Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 363, 16 N. W. 686, 47 Am. Rep. 582, it was held that "damages by the elements" excepted from a lessee's covenant to repair, includes destruction by fire without the lessee's fault." (Headnote, 47 Am. Rep. 582.) See Note in 53 L.R.A. 673-678, on "What constitutes damages 'by the elements' within the meaning of contracts with stipulations referring thereto." We are of the opinion that the tenants in this case, the plaintiffs, were not under any obligation to repair the leased premises after the fire.

7. Complaint is made of the exclusion of certain evidence. It does not appear that the evidence excluded was produced in any way at the hearing of the motion for a new trial. (Civ. Code, § 307.) This matter cannot be considered at this time. (Davidson v. Timmons, 88 Kan. 553, 558, 129 Pac. 133; Walter v. Calhoun, 88 Kan. 801, 805, 129 Pac. 1176; Williams v. Withington, 88 Kan. 809, 812, 129 Pac. 1148; Cheek v. Missouri, etc. R. Co. 89 Kan. 247, 257, 131 Pac. 617.)

8. The lost complaint made is that the court erred in denying the defendant's motion for judgment on the evidence. This was properly a jury trial. Evidence sufficient to warrant submitting the case to the jury was introduced. The motion was properly denied.

We have examined all the matters complained of, and do not find anything upon which to base a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

NOTE.

Construction of Phrase "Damage by Elements" or Similar Phrase as Used in Contract.

Generally, 296.

Damage by Fire, 296.

Damage by Water, 297.

Damage by Decay, 298.

Generally.

Construing the term "damages by the elements," the court in Van Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 363, 16 N. W. 686, 47 Am. Rep.

582, said: "'Damages by the elements' must be conceded to be a somewhat uncertain expression. Strictly speaking, the elements are ultimate, undecomposable parts which unite to form anything; as the gases which form air and water are the elements respectively of those substances. But the term is used in many other senses, and the definitions of lexicographers would be of little service to us in this case. Anciently it was supposed there were four elements of material things—earth, air, fire and water; and when it came to be known that this classification had no scientific basis, the term had found a place in common speech which it still retains. Injuries to buildings by wind, rain, frosts and heat are spoken of as injuries by the elements, and all the ordinary decay from natural causes is classed in the same category. Probably no one would make any question respecting this. . . . If a flood had destroyed this building the defendants would not be held responsible, because it would have been said the damage is of a sort that must be referred to the elements within the understanding of the parties in entering into this covenant. If a tornado had destroyed it, the same would have been said. We cannot suppose the parties intended to except natural and ordinary decay from wind and rain, and not the more sudden and grievous calamities proceeding from the same sources. . . . In the popular acceptance of the phrase, injuries by the elements are such injuries as result from the operation of the most common destructive forces of nature against which buildings need to be protected."

However the expression excludes the idea of human agency, and if it appears that a given loss has happened in any way through the intervention of man, it cannot be held to have been caused by the elements. Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 95 Am. Dec. 115; Pope v. Farmers' Union, etc. Co. 130 Cal. 139, 62 Pac. 384, 80 Am. St. Rep. 87, 53 L.R.A. 673; Harris v. Corlies, 40 Minn. 106, 41 N. W. 940, 2 L.R.A. 349.

The terms "damage by the elements" and "damage by the act of God" have been held to be convertible. Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 423, 95 Am. Dec. 115; Pope v. Farmers' Union, etc. Co. 130 Cal. 139, 62 Pac. 384, 80 Am. St. Rep. 87, 53 L.R.A. 673. In Polack v. Pioche, supra, it was said: "The elements are the means by which God acts, and we are unable to perceive why 'damages by the elements' and 'damages by the acts of God' are not convertible expressions in the law of leases."

Damage by Fire.

Damage by fire is generally held to be included within the term "damages by the elements" provided the fire is unexplainable or is not caused by human agency. Pope v. Farmers' Union, etc. Co. 130 Cal. 139, 62 Pac. 384, 80 Am. St. Rep. 87, 53 L.R.A. 673; Allen v. Quann, 80 Ill. App. 547; Van Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 363, 16 N. W. 686, 47 Am. Rep. 582. And see the reported case. In Van Wormer v. Crane, supra, wherein the question at issue was whether the destruction of a house by fire came within the phrase "damages by the elements," it was said: "The injury in this case was caused by fire. No fault in connection with it is charged upon the defendants, and it seems to be taken for granted on both sides that the fire was accidental. We may therefore assume that the fire was one which occurred without traceable fault, and that it is to be classed as a calamity for which no one is responsible except as he may have expressly undertaken to be so. . . . We have no doubt the parties intended by this exception to include all damages resulting from fire, as much as those attributable to air or water, unless traceable to the agency of man. The purpose was to excuse the lessees in cases where the damages from the causes mentioned had happened without their fault, and a popular phrase was made use of to express this intent, instead of specifying the particular injuries which were in mind. In the popular acceptance of the phrase, injuries by the elements are such injuries as result from the operation of the most common destructive forces of nature against which buildings need to be protected; and of these fire is the chief."

So, fire was held to be embraced in the term "elements" in Allen v. Quann, 80 Ill. App. 547, involving a contract of sale of certain canned corn wherein it was provided that the seller should not be responsible for nondelivery "in case of destruction of cannery by the elements."

Construing a warehouse contract providing for the return of wheat stored, on surrender of the certificate, "damage by the elements excepted," the court in Pope v. Farmers' Union, etc. Co. 130 Cal. 139, 62 Pac. 384, 80 Am. St. Rep. 87, 53 L.R.A. 673, said: "'Damage by the elements' is the equivalent of the phrase 'act of God.' . . . As no effort was made by defendant to reform this contract in any way, it must stand, so far as this case is concerned, exactly as it was written; and, so construing it, it is open to but one interpretation, namely, that defendant's liability to return the wheat was absolute, unless it was prevented from so doing by the act of God. Under this construction of the contract it was no defense for defendant to say, or to show, that the wheat was destroyed without negligence upon its part. It was incumbent upon it to show that the wheat was in fact destroyed or damaged by the elements. The evidence which it adduced tended merely to prove that the fire was of incendiary origin, and thus absolutely to negative the idea that the destruction of the grain was caused by the act of God."

But in Spalding v. Munford, 37 Mo. App. 281, wherein it appeared that a lease required the tenant to repair all damage to the property, the usual wear and tear and "providential destruction or destruction by fire," excepted, and by a further stipulation provided that in the event of the destruction of the premises by fire the rent should cease, it was held that the clause in the lease meant a total destruction such as would require a rebuilding as distinguished from a repairing, and did not include damage to the roof by fire with the consequent damage from cutting holes in the leased premises and the use of water in fighting the fire.

Damage by Water.

Damages caused by the sudden and unexpected action of water such as freshets, floods, etc., are generally held to be included within the term "damages by the elements." Gleason v. U. S. 33 Ct. Cl. 65; Van Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 363, 16 N. W. 686, 47 Am. Rep. 582; Sweezy v. Collins Northern Ice Co. 171 Mich. 75, 137 N. W. 84.

But damage caused by a flood resulting from the breaking of a reservoir has been held not to be included in the term "damages by the elements" as used in a covenant for repair in a lease where the flood was due to the act of a stranger in interfering with the embankment of the reservoir where the water was stored. Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 95 Am. Dec. 115. And in Harris v. Corlies, 40 Minn. 106, 41 N. W. 940, 2 L.R.A. 349, the construction of a lease providing for the repair by the landlord where the premises were rendered untenable "by fire or the elements" was in issue. In answer to the contention that water percolating and oozing through and under the basement walls whereby the building became so wet and unhealthy as to become untenable, came within the phrase injury by "the elements" it was said: "We think that the language of the lease refers only to some sudden, unusual, or unexpected action of the elements occurring during the term, such as floods, tornadoes, or the like; extraordinary disasters, not anticipated by either party, the efficient cause of which originated after the term began, and which either destroyed the building, or left it in a materially and essentially worse condition than it was in when leased. We think this is substantially the sense in which such expression in leases have always been used, and in which they would now be ordinarily understood by business men in executing such contracts."

Damage by Decay.

The courts are not in accord as to whether damages caused by gradual decay are included in the term "damage by the elements" as used in contracts to fix or relieve from responsibility. Thus in some jurisdictions it is held that the term "damage by the elements" includes only some sudden, unexpected and unavoidable violence of nature and that ordinary decay cannot be considered of such a nature. Hatch v. Stamper, 42 Conn. 28, 30; Kirby v. Wylie, 108 Md. 501, 70 Atl. 213, 129 Am. St. Rep. 451, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 129; Harris v. Corlies, 40 Minn. 106, 41 N. W. 940, 2 L.R.A. 349; Waddell v. De Jet, 76 Miss. 104, 23 So. 437; Suydam v. Jackson, 54 N. Y. 450; Lansing v. Thompson, 8 App. Div. 54, 40 N. Y. S. 425; Bigelow v. Collamore, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 226. See also Myers v. Hussenbuth, 32 Misc. 717, 65 N. Y. S. 1026. In Harris v. Corlies, supra, it was said: "It can hardly be said that the parties intended by these clauses of the lease literally to include every case of untenantableness or partial untenantableness 'by the elements.' Every case of damage to or destruction of human structures, not caused by animal force, may, in one sense, be said to be caused by the elements, as, for example, ordinary gradual decay. But it would hardly be claimed that such a case would be within the meaning of the provisions of the lease." And in Kirby v. Wylie, 108 Md. 501, 70 Atl. 213, 215, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 129, 129 Am. St. Rep. 451, it was held that the term "elements and act of God" did not include the destruction of a building by order of the authorities who based their action on the unsafe condition of the building caused by gradual decay from natural causes.

But in other jurisdictions it is held that the term "damages by the elements" is sufficiently broad to include all damage caused by the action of nature and that gradual decay must be considered to be within the meaning of the term. Van Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 363, 16 N. W. 686, 47 Am. Rep. 582; Swezy v. Collins Northern Ice Co. 171 Mich. 75, 137 N. W. 84; Hanchett v. O'Reilly, 72 N. J. L. 212, 68 Atl. 1066. In Swezy v. Collins Northern Ice Co. supra, the rule was stated as follows: "'Damage by the elements' includes all injury by wind, rain, snow, frost, and heat as well as all ordinary decay from natural causes." In Hanchett v. O'Reilly, supra, in answer to the contention that a clause in a lease providing that the landlord should make repairs when the premises become untenable because of damage from the elements did not include ordinary decay, the court said: "The defendant urges that the covenant to repair, when properly construed, means that the injury by the elements, causing an untenable condition of the premises, must be such as shall be brought about by a sudden, forcible, unusual and unforeseen disturbance, and must exclude such deterioration which is the result of the ordinary action of rain, heat, cold, etc. Such has been the construction of these words in cases arising under the statutes declaring that rent shall cease where premises become untenable by fire or the elements, for the reason that it was not the object of such statutes to alter the relation between landlord and tenant as they exist at common law. . . . But the reasoning does not apply where there is an express covenant by the lessor to repair."

MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

v.

SWETT ET AL.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Sixth Circuit—April 12, 1915.

222 Fed. 200.

Life Insurance — Rights of Beneficiary —Power of Insured to Change Beneficiary.

Under an ordinary policy of life insurance, in which there is no reservation of the right to cut off or modify the interest of the beneficiary, the policy and the money to become due thereunder belong, from the time it is issued, to the person named in it as the beneficiary, and insured is without power by deed, assignment, will, surrender of the policy for a new one, or by any other act of his, to transfer to any other person the interest of the person so named as beneficiary.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 684; 11 Ann. Cas. 49; Ann. Cas. 1912B 1144.]

Same.

Under a life insurance policy reserving to insured the right, without the consent of the beneficiary, to change the beneficiary, the beneficiary had no vested right, but only a mere expectancy during the lifetime of insured, and insured's control over the policy was, subject to its terms, as complete as if he himself had been the beneficiary.

Assignment of Policy — Assignment by Wife of Insurance in Her Favor.

As a wife designated as beneficiary in a policy on her husband's life, which reserved to the husband the right to change the beneficiary, had no vested right, but a mere expectancy only, she did not, by joining in her husband's assignment of the policy as security for his indebtedness, become a surety for him; the absolute right to assign the policy being lodged in him, and it was not necessary that she should receive a consideration for joining in the assignment in order to bind her.

[See note at end of this case.]

Power to Make Second Assignment.

Where, though an assignment of a $15,000 life insurance policy as security for a debt recited that it was to secure an indebtedness of $15,000, it was the intention to protect the assignee as to insured's entire liability to it, a letter subsequently written the assignee by him, directing that in case of his death the proceeds, after the satisfaction of a $10,000 note, should be applied to relieve an accommodation indorser from liability on account of another note for $6,000, was explanatory and confirmatory of the original intent, and passed by way of assignment whatever value the policy possessed after the delivery of the first assignment, as insured was not restricted to a single assignment of the policy, which by its terms was assignable.

Distinction between Assignment and Change of Beneficiary.

An "assignment" of a life insurance policy and a "change of beneficiary" are different things, as an "assignment" is the transfer by one of his right or interest in property to another, and rests upon contract, and, generally speaking, the delivery of the thing assigned is necessary to its validity, while the power to change the beneficiary is the power to appoint, and must be exercised in the manner agreed upon in the contract of insurance.

Right of Assignee to Reassign.

Where insured, who had assigned the policy to secure an indebtedness to the assignee, wrote the assignee, directing it, in case of his death, to apply the proceeds in payment of a $10,000 note, and the balance to relieve an accommodation indorser from liability on another $6,000 note, such letter was sufficient authorization to the assignee to assign an interest in the policy to the executors of the accommodation indorser, who had been compelled to pay the note on which they were liable, and they thereby acquired such a title as was necessary to enable them to hold the policy as collateral security for the debt which they had paid, and to sustain an action upon the policy.

Same.

Where a policy was assigned to secure certain notes held by the assignee, an assignment of an interest therein to the executors of an accommodation indorser on one of the notes, who were required to pay the note, was valid and binding on the beneficiary, in the absence of any authorization from insured to make such assignment; the policy having reserved the right to insured to change the beneficiary.

Renewal of Notes Secured by Assignment — Effect.

Where a life insurance policy was assigned to a bank to secure insured's notes held by it, the renewal of such notes did not destroy the assignment, in the absence of any intention on the part of the insured and the bank that the renewal should have that effect.

Validity of Assignment — Consent of Insurer — Right of Third Person to Urge Nonconsent.

Where, after the assignment of an insurance policy to secure an indebtedness, insured wrote the assignee relative to the disposition of the proceeds of the policy in case of his death, such letter, considered as an additional assignment, was not ineffective as against a beneficiary, though neither it nor a copy of it was filed with or assented to by the company, as required by the policy, as the provision in the policy requiring notice to the company was for its protection, and could not be set up by any one else to defeat an assignment made without compliance therewith.

Bankruptcy — What Property Passes — Life Insurance Policy.

As the holder of a life insurance policy, reserving to him the right to change the beneficiary, and which by its terms was assignable, had a transferable interest in the policy, if, notwithstanding an assignment thereof by him, an interest in the policy still remained in him, such interest passed to his trustee in bankruptcy as of the date of the adjudication, and a purchaser of his right, title, and interest acquired a right superior to that of the beneficiary.

Appeal from United States District Court for Southern Division of Western District of Michigan: SESSIONS, Judge.

Action by Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, plaintiff, against Myra M. Swett et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant named appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Lewis Brucker, and E. L. Beach for appellant.

Jacob Kleinhans and Wallace Foote for appellees.

Sitting: WARRINGTON, Circuit Judge and SATER and HOLLISTER, District Judges.

[202] SATER, J.—The question for decision is: Are the Hackley National Bank of Muskegon, Mich., and the executors of Charles H. Hackley, deceased, entitled to the proceeds of the $15,000 policy issued by the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company of Newark, N. J., to Edward R. Sweet on September 4, 1900, and made payable "to Myra M. Swett, his wife, if living, otherwise to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the said insured;" or do such proceeds belong to Mrs. Swett, who was named as his beneficiary and is now his widow? The case is here on her appeal from a decree against her.

The policy by its terms was assignable, but provided that no assignment of it should be effective until written notice of it was given [203] to the company. One of the special privileges accorded by it was that the insured, at any time while the policy was in force and not assigned, might change the beneficiary by returning the policy to the company with his written request for its appropriate indorsement of such change on the policy. The policy by apt language defines the owner of it to be either the person who is made such by its terms or who becomes such by its assignment. At the time the policy was issued, the bank held Swett's notes for borrowed money to the amount of $16,305, one of which, for $10,305, was unsecured. On the $6,000 note, Hackley was an accommodation indorser. Both were soon to mature. As Swett was not able to pay them, he agreed with the bank to take out a policy to secure them. He also agreed in 1896 to insure his life to protect his wife on her loan to him of some $14,000 or $15,000, which he had a few months previous given to her. She claims that the policy, whose proceeds are in question, was, in pursuance of such promise, for her benefit. On September 18, two weeks after the policy issued, Swett and his wife, without protest on her part, executed and delivered to the bank a written assignment of the policy and of "all sum or sums of money, interest, benefit and advantage whatsoever now due or hereafter to arise, or to be had or made by virtue hereof, to have and to hold unto the said Hackley National Bank to secure an indebtedness of $15,000." On September 28 the company filed a copy of the assignment in its office, and also indorsed on the original assignment the fact that a copy had been so filed, and that, if the assignment should be thereafter canceled, the bank should return the original to the company. The policy was delivered to the bank, and was never in the wife's possession, nor did she ever make any inquiry concerning it or her husband's bank indebtedness. On October 25 Swett by letter directed the cashier of the bank, in case of his death, to apply the proceeds of the policy, first, to the payment of the $10,000 note and interest; and, second, to the protection of Hackley on his indorsement of Swett's paper as he (Hackley) might direct. A copy of the letter was not transmitted to the company.

When the larger note became due, Swett paid $305 and renewed the note for the residue, which was the original principal sum. This note, and also that for $6,000, were periodically renewed, but neither of them was reduced or paid prior to his death, which occurred in October, 1906. Hackley died in February, 1905. The bank presented to his executors the $6,000 note as a claim; on June 3 following, it was paid. The bank subsequently executed and delivered an assignment of an undivided one-third interest in the policy to such executors. Shortly prior to his death Swett was adjudged a bankrupt. The trustee in bankruptcy, in consideration of $500, sold and transferred all of the right, title, and interest of Swett in and to the policy to the executors of Hackley. As the bank and Hackley's executors on the one hand, and the widow on the other, each claimed the entire proceeds of the policy ($17,448.41), the insurance company by its bill caused the respective claimants of the fund to interplead and deposited the value of the policy in court. Appropriate pleadings were interposed, and on the final hearing the result heretofore mentioned was obtained.

[204] The contentions of the widow, in so far as they need be noticed, are that, upon the issuance of the policy, she became the sole owner, or, at least, acquired a vested interest in it, of which she could not be divested without her consent; that the assignment of the policy to the bank was, as to her, without consideration; that, if the assignment was valid, she occupied merely the position of a surety, in consequence of which the lien on the policy was released and discharged by the subsequent extensions, without her knowledge and consent, of the time of the payment of the notes held by the bank; that no change of beneficiary was possible after the policy had been assigned, and that, therefore, Swett's letter of September 25 to the bank was ineffective for any purpose; that the Hackley executors took nothing by the purchase of her husband's interest, if any, from the trustee in bankruptcy; and that in any event she is entitled to all of the funds in excess of $10,000, for the reason that the assignment of the policy was to secure only the $10,000 note due the bank. Her several claims are controverted by the bank and the Hackley executors.

The rule is well settled that, under an ordinary policy of life insurance in which there is no reservation of a right to cut off or modify the interest of the beneficiary, the policy and the money to become due under it belong, from the time it issued, to the person named in it as the beneficiary, and that the insured is without power, whether by deed, assignment or will, or by surrender of the policy for a new one, or by any other act of his, to transfer to any other person the interest of the person so named as beneficiary. In such a policy the beneficiary acquires, the moment it is issued, a vested right which cannot be affected by any act of the insured subsequent to the execution of the policy, except it be a breach of condition. Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 206, 9

S. Ct. 41, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 370, 375; May on Ins., § 399L (4th ed.); Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, 3755. If, however, by the terms of the policy itself there is reserved to the insured the right, without the consent of the beneficiary, to change the appointee with the assent of the insurer, the beneficiary acquires only an expectancy and not a vested interest during the life of the insured. May on Ins., § 399M; Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Ins. 3755; Elliott on Ins. § 355; Kerr on Ins. § 231; Hopkins v. Northwestern L. Assur. Co. 99 Fed. 199, 40 C. C. A. 1; Hogan v. Fauerbach Brewing Co. 194 Fed. 846, 848, 114 C. C. A. 634; Lamb v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Ass'n, 106 Fed. 637; Robinson v. U. S. Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 68 Fed. 825; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. O'Brien, 92 Mich. 584, 52 N. W. 1012; Golden Star Fraternity v. Martin, 59 N. J. L. 207, 216, 35 Atl. 908.

The right so reserved rests upon the terms of the contract, and is the same as that conferred on the insured by the certificate, charter, or by-laws of a mutual or benefit association, when insurance is effected in such an organization. As the policy to Swett stipulated that he might, on his written request of the company for its appropriate indorsement on the policy, change the beneficiary, his wife did not acquire a permanent or vested interest in it. The existence of such an interest during her husband's lifetime was made impossible by the [205] control over the contract of insurance given to him, independent of her will. Her right was inchoate, a mere expectancy during his lifetime, dependent on the will and pleasure of her husband as holder of the policy, and could not vest until his death happened with the policy unchanged. His control over the policy was, subject to its terms, as complete as if he himself had been the beneficiary. Denver L. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 19 Colo. App. 191, 200, 73 Pac. 875. The wife had no vested interest which she could assign until the death of her husband—no assignable or transferable interest in the policy until some right of action on it accrued in her favor. May on Ins. § 399F; Sabin v. Phinney, 134 N. Y. 423, 428, 31 N. E. 1087, 30 Am. St. Rep. 681. As she had but a mere expectancy at the time of the assignment, she did not become surety for her husband, because the absolute right to assign the policy was lodged in him. Having no property right in the policy (Golden Star Fraternity v. Martin, 59 N. J. L. 207, 216, 35 Atl. 908), she pledged nothing for his debts; nor was it necessary that she should receive a consideration for her joining with him in the assignment in order to bind her, because in so doing she parted with nothing of appreciable value. The bank's rights were as secure without her joinder as with it. The ownership of the policy was not in her, but in her husband. The policy recognizes that ownership of it may be acquired by assignment. The bank by the assignment became its qualified owner, to the full extent necessary to satisfy the husband's indebtedness from its proceeds.

The claim that the evidence of the cashier shows that the policy was assigned to protect only the $10,000 note cannot be sustained, whether his evidence, or the agreed statement of facts, or both, be considered. The assignment, it is true, named an indebtedness of but $15,000; but it is clear from the record that Swett intended to protect the bank as to his entire liability to it. His letter of September 25 to the cashier expressly directing that, after the satisfaction in full of the $10,000 note, the residue of the proceeds of the policy should be applied to relieve Hackley from liability on account of his indebtedness, was explanatory and confirmatory of his original intent and passed by way of assignment whatever value the policy possessed remaining after the delivery of the instrument jointly executed by himself and wife. He was not restricted to a single assignment of the policy. Manton v. Robinson, 10 R. I. 405, 34 Atl. 148.

Whether, on account of Swett's indebtedness to the bank exceeding the amount of the policy, the assignment was in effect a change of beneficiary, is not in our judgment important to determine. However, the assignment of a policy and a change of beneficiary are not the same, but different, things. An assignment is the transfer by one of his right or interest in property to another. It rests upon contract, and, generally speaking, the delivery of the thing assigned is necessary to its validity. The power to change the beneficiary is the power to appoint. The power of appointment must be exercised in the manner agreed upon in the contract of insurance. Niblack, Benefit Societies & Acc. Ins. (2d ed.) § 173. Swett made an assignment of the policy. He did not exercise or attempt to exercise the power to appoint [206] another beneficiary. His wife still remained such. She takes nothing as beneficiary, but that is because the debts, which the policy was assigned to secure, consumed the entire proceeds of the policy.

The bank assigned an undivided one-third interest in the policy to the Hackley executors, for the reason that they had been obliged to pay to it Swett's $6,000 note which Hackley had indorsed. Swett's letter of September 25 was sufficient authorization for its so doing. The interest thus acquired by the executors vested the title in the executors, so far as that was necessary to enable them to hold the policy as collateral security for the debt which they had paid and to sustain an action upon the policy. In the absence of such an authorization, the assignment to them was valid and binding on the beneficiary. Corcoran v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 183 Pa. St. 443, 39 Atl. 50.

In the absence of any evidence of an intention on the part of the bank and Swett that the renewals of his notes evidencing his indebtedness to the bank should destroy the assignment of the policy, such renewals did not have that effect. Corcoran v. Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra.

The claim that Swett's letter of September 25, considering it as an additional assignment, was ineffective to confer any right on the bank, because neither it nor a copy of it was submitted to, filed with, or assented to by the company, is not meritorious. A provision in a life insurance policy that an assignment of it shall not become effective until written notice of it is given to the company is for its protection, and cannot be set up by any one else to defeat an assignment made without compliance therewith. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 96; May on Ins. § 396; Hewins v. Baker, 161 Mass. 320, 37 N. E. 441; Marcus v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 68 N. Y. 625.

As Swett had a transferable interest in the policy and the authority to change the beneficiary at will, if, notwithstanding his assignment to the bank, any interest still remained in him, such interest passed to his trustee in bankruptcy as of the date of adjudication. Loveland, Bank. (4th ed.) 817, 818. Whether the Hackley executors believed the title which passed to the trustee to possess intrinsic value or merely desired to safeguard the interest in it which they had already acquired is immaterial. For a valuable consideration they purchased whatever the trustee had. His assignment and transfer to them of all of Swett's right, title, and interest in and to the policy gave them a right superior to that of his widow.

Other claims made by the widow have been considered, but need not be noticed. We find no error in the record.

The trial court is affirmed.

Canada.—Graham v. Canada L. Assur. Co. 24 Ont. 607.

In Pomeroy v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 40 Ill. 398, the court, after setting out the Illinois married women's act, said: "The application for this policy was in the name of Mrs. Pomeroy, and it was issued to her, and it is not denied that it was her sole and separate property, and if so, under this act it was at her disposal and under her control, and no reason is perceived why her assignment to appellee was not binding in equity, and if so, she cannot repudiate her act. Under the statute she is entitled to the benefits it confers, and must be held liable for her acts performed in pursuance of the authority it confers. If it gives the rights of sole ownership it must impose the liabilities incident to such a right." And in Mente v. Townsend, 68 Ark. 391, 59 S. W. 41, a similar conclusion was reached, the court saying: "Under these statutes and other laws of this state, which vest her with all the rights of an unmarried woman as to her separate property, and make no exceptions as to policies of insurance upon the life of her husband, we can see no good reason why she cannot assign such policies as a man or single woman can transfer."

And see the reported case, wherein it is held that, where by the terms of the policy the husband is given the right to change the beneficiary, the wife acquires no vested interest in the policy and that it is not necessary that she shall receive a consideration in order to be bound by an assignment of the policy by the husband in which she joins.

Nor does a statute protecting the interest of the wife and children in an insurance policy from the claims of the husband's creditors operate to deprive the wife of the right to assign her interest in the policy as her separate property. Newcomb v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 9 Ins. Law J. 124, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,147; Mente v. Townsend, 68 Ark. 391, 59 S. W. 41; Emerick v. Coakley, 35 Md. 188; De Ronge v. Elliott, 23 N. J. Eq. 486; Canterbury v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 124 Wis. 169, 102 N. W. 1096. In Newcomb v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. supra, the court, applying the Massachusetts married women's separate property act and construing a statute protecting the interest of the wife and children for whose benefit insurance policies had been issued, said: "Is a policy of life insurance an exception to the general rule—that the owner of property may convey it? Our statute of 1864 (chapter 197) enacts that a policy upon the life of any person, duly assigned, transferable or made payable to a married woman, or to any person in trust for her, shall inure to her separate use and benefit and that of her children, independently of her husband or his creditors, or of the person effecting or transferring the same or his creditors provided that if any premium is paid in fraud of creditors, an equal amount (of the insurance money) shall inure to the benefit of said creditors. . . . Looking at the whole scope of the act, I am much inclined to think that its intent is merely to guard the interests of the wife against the husband and his creditors, and that she is to be the absolute owner during her life, with only a contingent interest in her children. If this be not so, the legislature have undertaken in a most arbitrary fashion to limit the right of a married woman to buy or receive the gift of a policy insurance, an injustice which I should not willingly impute to them. The courts of all the states which have passed upon this question under statutes more or less like ours, excepting the court of appeals of New York, have held that the married woman has the full domain over the policy, and may sell, assign, or pledge it like her other separate property." In Emerick v. Coakley, 35 Md. 188, the court, holding that the protective statute did not effect the wife's right to assign a policy on her husband's life, said: "It is urged, however, that the power given to the wife to insure the life of the husband for her sole use, was intended to provide the means of support for the wife and children after the husband's death, and that, therefore, such a policy stands upon a different footing from all other separate property of the wife, and that an assignment of it is against public policy; and the case of Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 11, 15, 17, 18, is relied upon as conclusive authority upon this point, especially as the statute of New York, in regard to such life policies, is substantially the same as ours. In view, however, of the 11th section of article 45 of the Code, and the decisions of this court respecting the disposition by married women of their separate property, to which we have before referred, we cannot recognize the decision in Eadie v. Slimmon as law in this state."

But in some jurisdictions it has been held that under a statute providing that a policy of insurance on the life of the husband for the benefit of the wife shall be free from the claims of the husband's creditors, the wife has no power to change the beneficiary in the policy by assignment. Smith v. Head, 75 Ga. 755.

In Pratt v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 17 S. W. 352, it was held that as the contract was made under the New York statute of 1840 it must be governed by the New York decisions construing that statute which declared such a policy to be unassignable by the wife. See the decisions under the New York statute of 1840, set out infra, in the subdivision Rule in New York.

Where by the terms of a policy the wife's right to assign is specifically provided for, as for instance where the policy is made payable to the wife or her assigns, the courts have uniformly recognized the right and upheld assignments under it. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Westervelt, 52 Conn. 586; Pomeroy v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 40 Ill. 398; Damron v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 99 Ind. 478; Emerick v. Coakley, 35 Md. 188; Dungan v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 38 Md. 242; Whitridge v. Barry, 42 Md. 140.

But as the power of a married woman to transfer her separate property was prior to the separate property acts subject to the common-law rule that a feme covert could not bind herself by an executory contract, where an assignment of a policy was made by a married woman to secure her own executory contract, the assignment was invalid. Godfrey v. Wilson, 70 Ind. 50.

An assignment of an insurance policy made by a wife to secure the payment of a judgment which did not exist has been held to be invalid for want of consideration. Price v. Atchison First Nat. Bank, 62 Kan. 743, 64 Pac. 639.

As Affected by Interest of Children.

The wife's right to assign an insurance policy on the life of her husband may be restricted by a provision of the policy or of a statute that the policy shall inure to the benefit of the children as well as the wife. In such a case the wife cannot defeat the interest of the children by an assignment of the policy, and any assignment by her is limited strictly to whatever interest she may have. Newcomb v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 9 Ins. Law J. 124, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,147; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 34 Conn. 305, 91 Am. Dec. 725; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 46 Conn. 79, 33 Am. Rep. 14; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Weitz, 99 Mass. 157; Wilde v. Wilde, 209 Mass. 205, 95 N. E. 295; Reed v. Painter, 129 Mo. 674, 31 S. W. 919 (overruling Baker v. Young, 47 Mo. 453, in so far as it held that the children of the wife for whose benefit the husband's life had been insured had no interest in the policy); Wanschaff v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 41 Mo. App. 206; Henry v. Thompson, 78 N. J. Eq. 142, 78 Atl. 14; Brown's Appeal, 125 Pa. St. 303, 17 Atl. 419, 11 Am. St. Rep. 900; Entwistle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 202 Pa. St. 141, 51 Atl. 759, reversing 17 Pa. Super Ct. 180; Herr v. Reineohl, 209 Pa. St. 483, 58 Atl. 662; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 15 R. I. 106, 23 Atl. 105; Scobey v. Waters, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 551. See also Boyd v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 153 Mass. 544, 27 N. E. 669. In Brown's Appeal, supra, it was said: "The assignment is formal and her husband joined her in its execution. Whatever title she had therefore passed to her assignee. The extent and character of her title appeared plainly on the face of the policy. She was the payee named in the first instance, but the promise to her was not an absolute and unconditional promise to pay to her, or to her administrators, executors or assigns, but a promise to pay to her upon condition that she was living when the policy should fall due. If she survived her husband the insurance money was payable to her, but if she did not it was payable to her children then living. Their right to the money depended upon the terms of the contract, which was payable to them if she was not living at the death of the insured. They were parties to the contract, as truly as she was, and with as clear a right to sue upon it, upon the happening of the contingency that made them the payees, as she could have had if living. Her assignment put her assignee in no better position than she occupied, and conferred upon him no greater interest in the policy. Her death in the lifetime of her husband extinguished her interest in the policy, and it can no more survive in the hands of her assignee than in her administrator. The condition on which her right to recover was to end, and that of her children was to arise, has happened, and the contract of the insurance company is now with the children, and must be enforced by them for their benefit."

A provision that the policy shall inure to the benefit of the children is of course ineffective to limit the wife's right to assign where there are no children. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 46 Conn. 79, 33 Am. Rep. 14; Henry v. Thompson, 78 N. J. Eq. 142, 78 Atl. 14.

Assignment for Debt of Husband.

Where the assignment by the wife of an insurance policy on the life of her husband is made to pay or secure the payment of his debts, its validity depends on the construction of the particular statutes relating to the separate property of married women. Thus, under the statutes of some jurisdictions, it is held that a married woman may assign her interest in an insurance policy on the life of her husband for her benefit even though the purpose of the assignment is to secure the payment of his debts. Mente v. Townsend, 68 Ark. 391, 59 S. W. 41; Collins v. Dawley, 4 Colo. 138, 34 Am. Rep. 72; Pomeroy v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 40 Ill. 398; Norwood v. Guerdon, 60 Ill. 253; Wirgman v. Miller, 98 Ky. 620, 33 S. W. 937; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 230, 56 S. W. 975; Emerick v. Coakley, 35 Md. 188; Allis v. Ware, 28 Minn. 166, 9 N. W. 666. In Collins v. Dawley, supra, it was said: "That a policy of insurance upon the life of the husband for the benefit of the wife may be assigned or pledged as collateral security by her for the debt of her husband, unless prohibited by local statute, is, we think, settled by the great weight of authority. The policy was a writing obligatory for the payment of money, and may be assigned at law as well as in equity."

In Pennsylvania it has been held that the prohibition in the statute (Act of June, 1893, P. L. 344) against a married woman making a technical contract of indorsement, suretyship or guaranty does not disable her from transferring her property as security for the debt of another, and so assignments by her of policies on her husband's life for her benefit to secure his debts are held to be valid. Kulp v. Brant, 162 Pa. St. 222, 29 Atl. 729; Dusenberry v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 188 Pa. St. 454, 41 Atl. 736; Herr v. Reinoehl, 209 Pa. St. 483, 58 Atl. 862.

But in other jurisdictions under statutes forbidding a married woman to make a contract or conveyance as surety or guaranty for her husband, as assignment of a policy on her husband's life for her benefit as security for his debts is held to be invalid. Smith v. Head, 75 Ga. 755; Damron v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 99 Ind. 478; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Woods, 11 Ind. App. 335, 37 N. E. 180, 39 N. E. 205; Putnam v. New York L. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 739, 7 So. 602; Stokell v. Kimball, 59 N. H. 13.

For a general discussion of the right of a married woman to become surety for her husband's debt, see the note to Montpelier First Nat. Bank v. Bertoli, reported post, this volume, at page 587.

Rule in New York.

In New York prior to the statutes of 1873 (Laws 1873, ch. 821) and 1879 (Laws 1879, ch. 248) it was uniformly held that insurance policies issued under the Act of 1840 (Laws 1840, ch. 80), providing for the insurance of the husband's life for the benefit of the wife and children, were unassignable by the wife. Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 9, 82 Am. Dec. 395; Barry v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 59 N. Y. 587; Fowler v. Butterly, 78 N. Y. 68, 34 Am. Rep. 507; Brummer v. Cohn, 86 N. Y. 11, 40 Am. Traver*, 87 Misc. 644, 148 N. Y. S. 200; People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 15 Abb. N. Cas. 75, affirmed 96 N. Y. 675; Wilson v. Lawrence, 8 Hun 593; 13 Hun 238. The reason for the rule was stated in Eadie v. Slimmon, supra, as follows: "We think the intent of the statute was to make these policies a security to the family of any married man, and a provision for their use and benefit, and that this intent would be defeated if they were held to be assignable by the wife like ordinary choses in action belonging to her in her own right as her separate property. . . . By the common law, a person could insure his own life for any sum for which he might choose to pay the premium, and which the insurers would engage to insure; but if one desired to insure the life of another, he could only insure the interest which he had in such other life. If he undertook to insure a gross sum, and the contract was not susceptible of a construction which would limit the recovery to the actual damages sustained, the contract would be void under the statutes against betting and gaming. This principle the legislature, by the Act of 1840 (Laws, p. 59), relaxed in respect to insurance as affected by a married woman, for any sum which she and the insurance company might see fit to contract for. It was provided that, in the case of her surviving her husband, the amount payable by the terms of the policy should be payable to her for her own use, free from all claims of the representatives of her husband or of his creditors. There is another feature in the act which shows that it was an enabling and not a declaratory provision. By the general rules of law a policy on the life of one sustaining only a domestic relationship to the insured would become inoperative by the death of such insured in the lifetime of cestui que vie; or if it could be considered as existing for any purpose after that event, it would be for the benefit of the personal representatives of the insured; but by this act the contract may be continued in favor of the children of the insured wife after her death. These features distinguish this case from that of an ordinary chose in action belonging to a married woman as her separate estate. The provision is special and peculiar, and looks to a provision for a state of widowhood, and for orphan children; and it would be a violation of the spirit of the provision to hold that a wife, insured under this act, could sell or traffic with her policy as though it were realized personal property or an ordinary security for money." In Barry v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 59 N. Y. 587, it was held that legislation enlarging the legal status of married women did not operate to empower the wife to assign an insurance policy issued on the life of her husband pursuant to the Act of 1840. In Frank v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 266, 6 N. E. 667, 55 Am. Rep. 807, the fact that the wife paid the premium on the policy out of her separate estate was held not to affect her want of authority to assign the policy. However it was held in Robinson v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 16 Blatchf. 194, 9 Ins. Law J. 73, 8 Rep. 613, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,961, that the New York statute of 1840 did not apply to an insurance policy containing an express contract between the wife and the company, providing that on the death of the husband the money should be paid to her "or assigns," and that an assignment by the wife and husband of such a policy was valid. In Brummer v. Cohn, 86 N. Y. 11, 40 Am. Rep. 503, it was held that to bring a policy on the life of the husband within the operation of the Act of 1840 and render it unassignable by the wife, it was not necessary that it should appear by the terms of the policy that it was the intention of the parties to avail themselves of the provisions of the act, as this would be presumed. See to the same effect Frank v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 266, 6 N. E. 667, 55 Am. Rep. 807. During the period of its running, it was held that an endowment policy was no exception to the general rule of nonassignability under the statute of 1840. Brummer v. Cohn, 86 N. Y. 11, 46 Am. Rep. 503. But after the lapse of the period fixed in an endowment policy within which the obligation of the insurer ran to the wife, children or personal representatives, it was held that the wife had no right to receive payment under it, and an assignment by the husband and wife then became valid. Miller v. Campbell, 140 N. Y. 457, 35 N. E. 651. The fact that the insurer was a foreign corporation was held not to affect the nonassignability of a policy issued pursuant to the Act of 1840. Miller v. Campbell, 140 N. Y. 457, 35 N. E. 651. And where both husband and wife were nonresidents of the state of New York, it was held that her right to assign a policy issued by a New York insurance company was governed by the statutes of New York. Bloomingtondale v. Lisberger, 24 Hun 355; Milhous v. Johnson, 51 Hun 639, mem. 4 N. Y. S. 199. The right to avoid an assignment has been held to be confined to the wife, creditors having no right to attack its validity on the ground that the policy was unassignable by the wife under the Act of 1840. Smillie v. Quinn, 90 N. Y. 492. And it has been held that her right to avoid an invalid assignment was not lost by the surrender of the policy by the assignee. Frank v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 266, 6 N. E. 667, 55 Am. Rep. 807. Nor was her right to avoid the assignment precluded by the fact that the assignment contained a covenant to the effect that it was valid and sufficient and that she would, whenever, required, do any act necessary to carry out the terms of the assignment. Brick v. Campbell, 122 N. Y. 337, 25 N. E. 493, 10 L.R.A. 259. It was also held in that case that the wife's right to avoid an invalid assignment of a policy on her husband's life was not barred by delay in seeking to reclaim the policy of a period within that prescribed by the statute of limitations. To the same effect see Frank v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 266, 6 N. E. 667, 55 Am. Rep. 807. However, where the wife elected to avoid an invalid assignment of a policy on her husband's life, it was held that a repayment of the premiums paid by the assignee should be made a condition of granting relief. Frank v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 266, 6 N. E. 667, 55 Am. Rep. 807; Brick v. Campbell, 122 N. Y. 337, 25 N. E. 493, 10 L.R.A. 259.

By the Act of 1873 (Laws 1873, ch. 821) power was conferred on the wife to assign an insurance policy on the life of the husband in her favor, provided she had no children or any issue of children living. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Healey, 86 Hun 524, 33 N. Y. S. 911; Brick v. Campbell, 122 N. Y. 337, 25 N. E. 493, 10 L.R.A. 259.

Under the Act of 1879 (Domestic Relations Law, § 52, Book 14 McKinney's Consol. Laws, p. 107) the wife was given the power to assign an insurance policy on her husband's life in her favor, whether there were children or not, the only limitation on her power being that the assignment must be with the written consent of the husband. Anderson v. Goldsmidt, 103 N. Y. 617, 9 N. E. 495; Spencer v. Myers, 150 N. Y. 269, 44 N. E. 942, 55 Am. St. Rep. 675, 34 L.R.A. 175, affirming 73 Hun 274, 26 N. Y. S. 371; Dannhauser v. Supreme Council, etc. 97 App. Div. 545, 90 N. Y. S. 292; Dudley v. Fifth Ave. Trust Co. 115 App. Div. 396, 100 N. Y. S. 934, affirmed in 188 N. Y. 565, 80 N. E. 1109; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Van Campen, 57 Hun 592, mem. 11 N. Y. S. 103; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Healey, 86 Hun 524, 33 N. Y. S. 911. See also Harvey v. Van Cott, 71 Hun 394, 25 N. Y. S. 25, affirmed in 149 N. Y. 579, 43 N. E. 987. The consent of the husband to an assignment by the wife of a policy in her favor is required by statute to be in writing, and it is generally held that in the absence of that written consent, any attempted assignment by a married woman is void and without effect. Anderson v. Goldsmidt, 103 N. Y. 617, 9 N. E. 495; Dannhauser v. Wallenstein, 169 N. Y. 199, 62 N. E. 160; Rathborne v. Hatch, 90 App. Div. 161, 85 N. Y. S. 775; Dudley v. Fifth Ave. Trust Co. 115 App. Div. 396, 100 N. Y. S. 934, affirmed 188 N. Y. 565, 80 N. E. 1109; Milhous v. Johnson, 51 Hun 639, mem. 4 N. Y. S. 199. And this has been held to be true even though the assignment was made to the husband. Dudley v. Fifth Ave. Trust Co. 115 App. Div. 396, 100 N. Y. S. 934, affirmed 188 N. Y. 565, 80 N. E. 1109. But where a policy was taken out by the husband, payable to his legal representatives and afterwards assigned by him to his wife it was held that she might assign the policy without his written consent, and that a paid up policy, payable to the wife taken out by her in lieu of the original policy under a clause in the latter conferring that right, was assignable by the wife without the consent of the husband. Dannhauser v. Wallenstein, 169 N. Y. 199, 62 N. E. 160. However, it has been held to be a sufficient compliance with the statute if the husband joins in the written assignment. Anderson v. Goldsmidt, 103 N. Y. 617, 9 N. E. 495. But the joinder of the husband in the note given for the debt was held to be insufficient in Milhous v. Johnson, 51 Hun 639 mem. 4 N. Y. S. 199. Under the Act of 1879 the restriction placed on the wife's right to assign by the existence of children was removed and she was empowered to assign, provided only that it was done with the written consent of the husband. Anderson v. Goldsmidt, 103 N. Y. 617, 9 N. E. 495. However, where the policy was payable to the children in case the wife predeceased the husband she could not assign it even with the consent of her husband so as to divest the contingent interest of the children. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Healey, 86 Hun 524, 33 N. Y. S. 911, reversing 28 N. Y. S. 478. The fact that the policy was issued by a foreign insurance company has been held not to render inapplicable the statute allowing the wife to assign the policy with the written consent of the husband. Fuller v. Kent, 13 App. Div. 529, 43 N. Y. S. 649. It has been held that, though a mutual benefit certificate is by its terms nonassignable so as to invest the assignee with the benefits accruing to a bona fide holder, the rights acquired by an assignment for value will operate as a valid enforceable agreement when the contingent interest has ripened into an existing vested right. Kimball v. Lester, 43 App. Div. 27, 59 N. Y. S. 540, affirmed 167 N. Y. 570, 60 N. E. 1113; Dexter v. Supreme Council, etc. 97 App. Div. 545, 90 N. Y. S. 292. Compare McCord v. McCord, 40 App. Div. 275, 57 N. Y. S. 1049.

NUGENT.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—November 17, 1914.

159 Wis. 488; 149 N. W. 377.

Jury — Right to Jury Trial — Scope of Constitutional Guaranty.

Const. art. § 1, 5, providing that the right of "trial by jury" shall remain inviolate, merely guarantees such right to a jury trial as existed before Wisconsin became a state, which was a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction by a jury of twelve men impartially selected.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 703.]

Denial of Jury Trial — Appeal Not Triable by Jury.

Const. art. 1, § 5, providing that the right to jury trial shall remain inviolate, guarantees only one jury trial; hence the Civil Court Act (Laws 1909, c. 549), which provides for jury trial in the civil court of Milwaukee, but authorizes the circuit court on appeal to affirm or modify judgments of that tribunal without jury trial, is valid.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912C 1109.]

Requirement of Jury Fees — Validity.

Civil Court Act (Laws 1909, c. 549) § 19, requiring a party desiring a jury trial in the civil court of Milwaukee to pay a fee of $12, which is to be taxed as costs if successful in the action, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 5, declaring that the right to jury trial shall remain inviolate, particularly as jury fees were required in territorial days.

[See note at end of this case.]

Statutes — Invalidity of Amendment — Effect on Original Act.

The invalidity of an amending statute, which merely added a provision to the original statute, does not avoid the original.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Milwaukee county: HALSEY, Judge.

Action by Reliance Auto Repair Company, plaintiff, against Michael Nugent, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[489] Plaintiff sued in the civil court of Milwaukee county to recover $93.35 for repairs upon and storage of defendant's automobile and recovered judgment therefor after a trial by the court, a jury trial having been waived.

The defendant appealed to the circuit court, where the judgment was affirmed upon the record notwithstanding the defendant's demand for a trial by jury. The defendant appeals from that judgment.

William J. Kershaw and R. I. Kenney for appellant.

Michael Levin, for respondent.

WINSLOW, C. J.—The defendant's chief contention is that under sec. 5 of art. 1 of the state constitution, which provides that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," he was entitled to a jury trial in the circuit court, and that so much of the Civil Court Act (ch. 549, Laws of 1909) as purports to authorize the circuit court on appeal to affirm or modify judgments of the first named court upon the record without a jury trial is unconstitutional.

The Civil Court Act provides (sec. 19, ch. 549, supra) that either party to a civil action in that court may demand and have a trial by a jury of twelve men, to be drawn from the jury list of the county, upon paying to the clerk of the court $12, which sum is to be recovered as costs if he prevails. As appears from the statement of facts, the appellant waived his right to this jury trial.

The following propositions are decided in this case:

1. The jury trial guaranteed by the constitution is the jury trial which existed in the territory at the time of the adoption of the constitution, i. e. a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction before a jury of twelve men impartially selected. Norval v. Rice, 2 Wis. 22; Gaston v. Babcock, 6 Wis. 503; Klein v. Valerius, 87 Wis. 54, 57 N. W. 1112, 22 L.R.A. 609.

[490] 2. The jury trial provided for in the civil court of Milwaukee county satisfies this guaranty; and, as the guaranty only contemplates one jury trial, the provisions of law authorizing the affirmance of judgments of the civil court without new trial do not transgress the constitution in this regard.

3. The requirement that the party demanding a jury shall pay into the court a jury fee of $12, to be recovered by him in the cost bill if successful in the action, is not an unreasonable regulation of the right, nor is it an invasion of sec. 9, art. I, of the constitution, which provides that "every person . . . ought to obtain justice freely, and without being obliged to purchase it." Christianson v. Pioneer Furniture Co. 101 Wis. 343, 77 N. W. 174, 917; Harrigan v. Gilchrist, 121 Wis. 127, 99 N. W. 909 at p. 215; Conneau v. Geis, 73 Cal. 176, 14 Pac. 580, 2 Am. St. Rep. 785; Adams v. Corriston, 7 Minn. 456; Adae v. Zangs, 41 Ia. 536; Venine v. Archibald, 3 Colo. 163; State v. Neterer, 33 Wash. 535, 74 Pac. 668; Randall v. Kehlor, 60 Me. 37, 11 Am. Rep. 169. Furthermore, it appears that under the territorial statutes of Wisconsin any party recovering a verdict was required to pay into court for the benefit of the county $3 before the declaration of the verdict. Terr. Stats. 1839, p. 399, sec. 23. Under the Revised Statutes of 1849 and 1858, every plaintiff was required to pay into the court for the use of the county $3 immediately after the swearing of the jury. R. S. 1849, ch. 131, sec. 28; R. S. 1858, ch. 133, sec. 33. Considering the greater purchasing power of money during those earlier years, this sum is not markedly greater than the sum now required to be advanced by the party demanding a jury. It is to be remembered also that under the present law the sum advanced is recovered as costs in case of success in the case.

4. It is unnecessary to pass upon the contention that ch. 261, Laws of 1913, amending the Civil Court Act, denies to defendants residing in Milwaukee county the equal protection [491] of the laws. By this act it is provided that in cases where the defendant resides in another county he may have the place of trial of the appeal changed to the circuit court of his own county and be entitled to a new trial in the same cases as in case of appeal from justice's court. If the objection were sound (a point concerning which we express no opinion), its only effect would be to condemn the amending law,—not the act which it attempts to amend.

BY THE COURT.—Judgment affirmed.

A motion for a rehearing was denied, with $20 costs, on February 9, 1915.

NOTE.

Constitutionality of Statutes Requiring Prepayment or Taxation as Costs of Jury Fees.

The earlier decisions passing on the constitutionality of a statute requiring the prepayment or taxation as costs of jury fees are collated in the notes to Humphrey v. Eakeley, 5 Ann. Cas. 929; Williams v. Gottschalk, 12 Ann. Cas. 376, and Eckrich v. St. Louis Transit Co. 98 Am. St. Rep. 517. In two recent decisions besides the reported case such statutes have been upheld as not being a denial or abridgment of the constitutional right of trial by jury. Morrison Hotel, etc. Co. v. Kirsner, 245 Ill. 431, 92 N. E. 285, 137 Am. St. Rep. 335; Gottschall v. Campbell, 234 Pa. St. 347, 83 Atl. 286. Thus, in the case first cited the court reaffirmed the validity of the provisions of the municipal court act (Hurd's Rev. St. 1909, c. 37, § 319) requiring a party to a suit in that court, at the time of entering his appearance, to file with the clerk a demand in writing for a trial by jury, and to pay six dollars for jury fees. The court declared that the act was not a denial of or encroachment on the right to a jury trial, on the authority of Williams v. Gottschalk, 231 Ill. 175, 12 Ann. Cas. 376, 83 N. E. 141.

The holding in the reported case is to the effect that a statute (Civil Court Act, Laws 1909, c. 549, § 19) providing that either party to a civil action in that court may demand and have a trial by a jury of twelve men, to be drawn from the jury list of the county, on paying to the clerk of the court twelve dollars, which sum is to be recovered as costs if he prevails, is constitutional. The court holds that the jury trial provided for in the statute satisfies the constitutional guaranty that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate" (Const. art. 1, § 5), which is merely a guaranty of the jury trial which existed in the territory at the time of the adoption of the constitution, i. e., a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction before a jury of twelve men impartially selected; and that the requirement that the party demanding a jury trial shall pay into court a fee of twelve dollars, to be recovered by him in his cost bill, if successful in the action, is neither an unreasonable regulation of the right to a trial by a jury, nor an invasion of the constitutional provision that "every person . . . ought to obtain justice freely, and without being obliged to purchase it." (Const. art. 1, § 9.) In Gottschall v. Campbell, 234 Pa. St. 347, 83 Atl. 286, in holding to be valid a similar statute [Act of May 5, 1911, § 8 (P. L. 201)] the court said: "In section 8, provision is made for a jury trial on request of either party, and the payment of the jury fee in advance. It is suggested that this provision is an abridgement of the constitutional right of trial by jury. But under the long settled practice in this state, under the Act of March 29, 1805, sec. 13, 4 Sm. L. 237, a jury fee must be paid before judgment can be entered on a verdict. A verdict is of little value unless judgment be entered upon it, and it is but a slight step further to require payment of the jury fee before the trial, instead of before judgment. It might as well be argued that the plaintiff was denied the right to a jury trial because compelled to pay for the issuing and service of a summons, before such trial can be had."

v.

BROMBERG.

Iowa Supreme Court—April 8, 1915.

169 Iowa 736; 151 N. W. 1073.

Evidence — Opinion — Estimate of Quantity.

Where, in an action under Code, § 2423, to recover payments made for liquor illegally sold by defendant to plaintiff, a witness testified that he delivered liquor to plaintiff, but kept no account of the sales or the quantity, and turned over to defendant the amount each night, it is proper to permit the witness to give his opinion as to the amount of liquor delivered to plaintiff.

Witnesses — Cross-examination — Quantity of Liquor Delivered.

Where, in an action under Code, § 2423, to recover payments made for liquor illegally sold by defendant to plaintiff, the testimony of a witness delivering liquor for defendant to plaintiff and collecting the money therefor was indefinite as to the quantity of liquor sold, refusal to permit defendant to show on the cross-examination of the witness that he worked for other liquor houses and delivered their liquor to the plaintiff was error.

Intoxicating Liquors — Keeping for Illegal Sale — Presumption from Payment of Federal Tax.

Code, § 2427, making receipts of payment of United States liquor taxes presumptive evidence that the person owning the receipt is engaged in keeping liquor for sale "contrary to the provisions of this chapter," applies to an action under section 2423 to recover payments made for liquor illegally sold, for the two sections are in the same chapter.

Same.

The presumption created by Code, § 2427, arising from a receipt of payment of United States liquor taxes, may be rebutted.

Argument of Counsel — Reference to Wealth of Party.

Where, in an action under Code, § 2423, to recover money paid for liquor illegally sold by defendant to plaintiff, defendant on cross-examination stated that he had made good money in real estate, and further questions on cross-examination insinuated that he had become wealthy out of illegal sales of liquor, the argument of plaintiff's counsel, that defendant became rich collecting money on liquor which he sold, is prejudicial, and the misconduct is not cured by the court stating that it made no difference whether defendant was rich or not.

[See note at end of this case.]

Witnesses — Cross-examination of Party As to Wealth.

In an action under Code, § 2423, to recover money paid for liquor illegally sold by defendant to plaintiff, questions on the cross-examination of defendant as to his having become rich by taking orders for liquor are improper.

Appeal from District Court, Appanoose county: VERMILLION, Judge.

Action to recover for liquors illegally sold to plaintiff by defendant. Joseph Cvitanovich, plaintiff, and David Bromberg, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Wilson & Smith for appellant.

C. A. Baker for appellee.

[737] PRESTON, J.—1. We have had some difficulty in determining the merits of the controversy because of the confusion in the record. Twenty-four witnesses were examined, but their names appear sixty-seven times in the abstract and two additional abstracts. Substantially all the witnesses on both sides were recalled on the trial, some of them as many as four or five times. Their evidence is abstracted in the same way and set out in different places in the abstract, and again in the same manner in the additional abstracts. Some of the corrections of the testimony in the additional abstracts do not refer to the page where the testimony is set out in the abstract, or the first additional abstract. It might be well, perhaps, for trial judges, when counsel on both sides get into the habit of only partly examining their witnesses and excusing them, and then recalling all, or substantially all, of them, [738] to suggest to the attorneys that they exhaust the testimony of the witness before excusing him, subject, of course, to the right to recall a witness if something has been really overlooked. We have been compelled to abstract the abstracts and spend some time in straightening out the record that we could have very well used in investigating the points presented.

2. Appellant argues that the plaintiff is a self-confessed bootlegger and that his client, the defendant, claims that this case is a plain and simple holdup; that plaintiff was convicted of selling liquor and went to jail, and, because defendant would not pay his fine of three hundred dollars, this suit was brought; and that there was a conspiracy between plaintiff and one Hershberg, who was angry at defendant, and that the case rests largely upon the testimony of Hershberg, who, as defendant alleges, was discredited and impeached; that but for the prejudice against a person in the liquor business, there would have been no verdict.

Appellee admits in argument that plaintiff was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor, as he says, because defendant had induced him to sell, and promised plaintiff that he would protect him and that plaintiff would not have to go to jail; and that then defendant refused to pay appellee's fine and protect him, as he had promised; but, though witnesses gave impeaching testimony against Hershberg, and we are assured by counsel for appellee that plaintiff is a Croatian, speaking no English, and was induced by the defendant to purchase intoxicating liquors from him (defendant) and sell the same at his residence, where plaintiff's wife kept boarders, all foreign-speaking people, and that thus he became a "self-confessed bootlegger," from the record we are convinced that the transactions are not creditable to either plaintiff or defendant, and that neither is as innocent as he pretends. They were both selling liquor contrary to law.

3. The third assignment of error is that the court erred in permitting the witness Hershberg to express an opinion [739] as to the amount of beer and whisky delivered to plaintiff during the time in controversy, for that his answer was simply a guess or speculation. It must be admitted that the evidence is somewhat indefinite, but it is not altogether the expression of an opinion, as contended by appellant, but the statement of facts. The claim is that this witness, under instructions from defendant, delivered beer and whisky to the plaintiff. Witness testifies that he kept no account of the sales or the quantity of liquor sold, but that he turned in to defendant the amount each night. His estimate is that he delivered about so many cases of each, beer and whisky, to defendant and that plaintiff paid the defendant during the time in question a certain amount on each coal mine pay day. Under the circumstances, it would be difficult to get at it in any other way. But we are of opinion that it was a question for the jury from all the evidence in the case. It was also a question for the jury, under the instructions of the court, of which no complaint is made, as to whether the sales were made in Iowa.

4. Complaint is made because Exhibit "P-3" was admitted in evidence. This purports to be an account between plaintiff and the Rochester Brewery, and the wife of plaintiff testifies that the defendant gave it to her.

5. Hershberg testified that he was working all the time for the Rochester Brewing Company, and defendant assigns as error that the court limited the cross-examination of this witness as to handling of liquors for other concerns during the time it is alleged Hershberg was delivering liquor for defendant. The record is:

Q. "What other breweries were you acting for in 1909 and 1910, if any?"

Objected to as assuming, immaterial, not proper cross-examination. The objection was sustained, but witness seems to have answered. The abstract shows:

[740] A. "I was working all the time for the Rochester Brewing Company."

Q. "Don't you know that you handled Simon Lewis whisky at Rock Island?"

Objected to as incompetent, not proper cross-examination, immaterial. Sustained.

Q. "Don't you know that you delivered the Simon Lewis liquor to Joe Cvitanovich during the time you have said you were working for the Rochester Brewing Company?"

Objected to as not proper cross-examination. Sustained.

We think the court might well have permitted a more liberal cross-examination of the witness, under the circumstances. As before stated, the evidence of the witness was somewhat indefinite as to the amount of liquor sold, and we think if, during the time witness claims he was working for one concern and delivering liquor to plaintiff for defendant, he was selling liquor to plaintiff from other houses, it would have a bearing on the question of amount of liquor sold by defendant. We would not reverse for this alone, although we think defendant was entitled to a cross-examination of the witness on that subject. But witness Simon Lewis testified as a witness for defendant, without objection, that he was in the liquor business at Rock Island, and that Hershberg was working for him in 1909, and that he was collecting for liquor sold in the territory where plaintiff was selling; this witness also testified that he shipped liquor to a man named Joseph Cvitanovich from June, 1908, to November, 1910. We think defendant was entitled to cross-examine the witness on the subject, notwithstanding the evidence of Lewis.

6. Appellant complains that the court erred in admitting testimony as to possession by defendant of a government stamp. Appellant cites no cases, but contends that the statute does not apply to a civil proceeding for the recovery of the purchase price of liquor, but only to criminal proceedings [741] under the chapter relative to selling or keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors. Sec. 2427 provides, in part:

"In all actions, prosecutions and proceedings under the provisions of this chapter, proof of the actual manufacture, sale or gift in evasion of the statute of intoxicating liquors by a person not authorized to manufacture, sell or give the same shall be presumptive evidence of illegal manufacture or sale, etc. . . . The fact that any person not authorized to keep for sale and to sell intoxicating liquors for lawful purposes, engaged in any kind of business, has or keeps posted in or about his place of business a receipt or stamp showing payment of the special tax levied under the laws of the United States upon the business of selling distilled, malt or fermented liquors, or shall have paid such special tax for the sale of such liquors in this state, shall be presumptive evidence that the person owning or controlling such receipt or stamp, or having paid such special tax, is engaged in keeping for sale or selling intoxicating liquors contrary to the provisions of this chapter."

The trial court instructed in accordance with this provision of the statute. This action, as before stated, was brought under Sec. 2423 of the Code, which is in the same chapter as the section quoted, and we think it applies here.

7. But it is said by appellant that the court erred in refusing to permit defendant's explanation of his possession of a government stamp or license. The statute quoted makes the possession of the government stamp, or payment of the tax, presumptive, and not conclusive, evidence. We think a party is entitled to explain in regard to this. In Jones v. Welch, 167 Ia. 443, 149 N. W. 515, the holder of the stamp was permitted to give his explanation, but it was not determined that he had a right to do so. Under the record in this case, it is doubtful whether appellant is in a position to complain. Defendant testified that he never sold any liquor at all, and then this question was asked:

[742] Q. "And, by the way, was it your understanding that the Government required that a collection agent have a Government license?"

Plaintiff objects as immaterial. The objection sustained.

This is all the record shows on this subject. There was no offer to prove that such was the understanding of the witness. Possibly we should infer that the witness would have answered "yes," but he could have answered the question by either "yes" or "no." If the answer to the question should be "no," then, of course, it would not be an explanation at all.

8. The next two assignments of error may be considered together. They are: First, that the court erred in overruling defendant's objections to questions as to defendant's becoming rich by the taking of orders for beer and whisky; and second, that counsel for plaintiff was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in argument to the jury in referring to the same matter. The learned trial court seems to have tried the case carefully and, doubtless, in the hurry of the trial, overlooked the record as it is in regard to this matter. We think these two exceptions must be sustained. We had always supposed that litigants were entitled to a trial of their cases on the merits, regardless of the question as to whether they are rich or poor. The record shows that, when defendant was on the stand, counsel for plaintiff, in cross-examination, asked:

Q. "The facts are, Mr. Bromberg, that you have grown rich from taking orders for beer and whisky in this county, haven't you? (Defendant objects as prejudicial, improper and misconduct. Overruled.) A. I make good money in the real estate. Not in the whisky. That comes on the side. Q. Oh, whisky is on the side? A. Yes, sir. Q. How much money did you make in the year 1909 in real estate? (Objected to as immaterial, and sustained.) Q. How much money did you make in 1909 selling beer and whisky? (Objected to as assuming and immaterial. Sustained.)"

[743] In the argument to the jury, counsel for plaintiff said:

"I say that Bromberg got rich collecting money on beer and whisky which he sold to people in Appanoose County, Iowa. (Defendant objects to the statement as improper, prejudicial, etc.) Court: It doesn't make any difference whether Mr. Bromberg is rich or not; it has nothing to do with the case. Counsel for Defendant: We except to the remark of counsel for the reason stated."

It should be said that, before witness had completed his answer, and after he had said, "I make good money in the real estate," counsel for plaintiff moved to strike the answer as not responsive, which was overruled, and the witness continued with the rest of that answer without any further question being asked.

Counsel for appellee state in argument here that the question was asked for the purpose of having witness admit that he had taken orders for beer and whisky and was selling it, and was so considered by the trial judge, and that the statement by the trial court that it doesn't make any difference whether Bromberg is rich or not cures the error, if any there was. But we are of opinion that this is not sufficient. If counsel for plaintiff had only referred in his argument to the financial condition of defendant, and the court had promptly made the statement it did, and this had been all there was to it, it is possible that the error should be considered as cured, although there are cases holding that even then a case should be reversed for such a remark.

In Westercamp v. Brooks, 115 Ia. 159, 88 N. W. 372, an objectionable remark was made by one of the attorneys in the opening argument, and, upon objection being made, the court stated that he would instruct the jury not to consider any statements outside the record, and the court did so instruct in one of its written instructions, and co-counsel in the closing argument withdrew the remarks complained of and requested the jury not to consider any matter outside the record. Under such [744] circumstances, it was held that there was no prejudice, and there are other cases to substantially the same effect. But in this case, the evidence was in the record that defendant had made money in real estate, and this was in answer to a question as to whether he had not grown rich from taking orders for beer and whisky. In addition to that, the matter was emphasized by two other questions, objections to which were sustained. We are of opinion that there was reversible error at this point. As bearing upon this question, see: Sullivan v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 119 Ia. 464, 93 N. W. 367; Wheeler, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Sterrett, 94 Ia. 158, 62 N. W. 675; Henry v. Sioux City, etc. R. Co. 70 Ia. 233, 30 N. W. 630; Almon v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 163 Ia. 449, 144 N. W. 997.

In the instant case, as before stated, there was not only the statement of counsel in argument to the jury that defendant was rich, but there was evidence in the record as to his having made money, and insinuations in other questions, some of which were answered and some not answered. We have already indicated that the evidence is somewhat doubtful at some points, and there are other close questions in the case, and, on the whole record, we think it ought not to be said that the record as heretofore set out in regard to the wealth of the defendant was not prejudicial.

It is thought sometimes that in some of the cases a reversal has been had in civil actions for less serious misconduct than misconduct in some of the criminal cases where the conviction was affirmed. It would appear, perhaps, that the rule ought to be the other way, and yet a possible explanation of this is that, as is well known, in criminal cases counsel for defendant go outside the record in order to secure an acquittal, knowing that a new trial may not be granted under such circumstances, and that counsel for the state have a right to reply to such improper statements, and that, as long as the argument for the state is confined to a reply to improper argument by counsel for defendant, a reversal will not be had. If the state has no right to reply to such argument, then an acquittal might be obtained in a great many cases on matters [745] entirely outside the record, if the trial court does not control the trial. In civil cases, however, a new trial may be granted either party for prejudicial misconduct.

Some other matters have been argued, but we do not regard them as of controlling importance. Appellant's motion to strike the additional abstract is overruled.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

NOTE.

Propriety of Argument of Counsel Referring to Poverty or Wealth of Party to Action.

General Rule, 312.

Qualification of Rule, 314.

Prejudicial Error, 315.

General Rule.

For counsel in argument to go outside the record of the case and call to the jury's attention the financial condition of either of the parties to the action or to make reference to or draw a contrast between the relative wealth of the parties is generally deemed to be improper. The impropriety of remarks of that character is said to result from the fact that they hinder the jury in deciding the action on its merits since they incite the jurors' minds and passions and appeal to their emotions and sympathy.

In the note to Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Payne, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1291, a review may be found of the cases passing on the propriety and effect of a reference by counsel to the wealth of a corporate party when the evident purpose of the remarks is to draw attention to the fact that the party referred to is a corporation.

In Southern R. Co. v. Bulleit, 40 Ind. App. 457, 82 N. E. 474, the following remark was held to be improper: "Give him [plaintiff] $2,000. The defendant will make that much money in the time you are signing your verdict."

In Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Proctor, 122 Ky. 92, 89 S. W. 714, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 598, the words complained of and condemned were as follows: "No verdict you can render, gentlemen, will ever sufficiently compensate him for what he has suffered. The wealth the millions upon millions owned by this defendant, if it were given to him, would not make good to him the loss that he has sustained. I had no stenographer to take down your speech. Poor Proctor could afford no such luxury."

In Jenkins v. North Carolina Ore Dressing Co. 65 N. C. 563, it was held to be improper for the plaintiff's counsel to speak of his client as a "poor widow" and of the defendant as "a wealthy corporation, attempting to cheat her out of her rights."

In Caverhill v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 77 N. H. 330, 91 Atl. 917, an argument of the plaintiff's counsel that the verdict asked for was not a very serious matter to the railroad, "taking from them a few coppers," but meaning "a good deal to her," was held to exceed the limits of legitimate argument.

In Miller v. Burgess (Tex.) 136 S. W. 1174, the objectionable words used were as follows: "Why shouldn't this defendant, P. J. Miller, pay to this poor working boy the amount of his note, when he (meaning Miller) lives on his ranch in Jones county and counts his white-faced Hereford cattle by the hundreds, and controls property and people like a feudal lord; when he owes to his plaintiff the amount of his debt, which represents hard, honest toil on his part."

In Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Swann, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 127 S. W. 1164, it was held to be improper for counsel to say that the amount appellee sought to recover was a "little thing" to the appellant but a "big thing" to the appellee.

In Norris v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 239 Mo. 695, 144 S. W. 783, the plaintiff's counsel in argument said: "Gentlemen, this young girl comes to you, not of the silk stocking aristocracy. . . . Now, when she was asked about resigning, Judge Robinson says, 'Did you write out your resignation?' And she answered, 'Why, no. Of course not.' She is not like one of those big railroad officials. When a railroad lawyer or a railroad president resigns, they write it out and have a big red seal on it and a pink ribbon and all that." In condemning the use of such words the court said: "The trial court should not permit argument which amounts to an appeal to the jury to give judgment for one party on account of his poverty or the wealth of the opposite party; and trial courts should promptly rebuke counsel who indulge in such arguments."

In Campbell v. Prieto (Tex.) 143 S. W. 668, the defendant's counsel called attention to the fact that the plaintiff was a man well to do and financially able to lose the suit and that the defendant was a poor, poverty-stricken Mexican peddler, and was unable to withstand any loss in the suit. The court said: "The relative financial conditions of the parties had not been proved, and could not properly have been proved, and any reference to such matters was not permissible, and it should have been promptly condemned and checked by the court."

In Neumeister v. Goddard, 133 Wis. 405, 113 N. W. 733, the plaintiff's counsel used the following language: "Hi Goddard can spend a thousand dollars to their hundred."

Half the money spent in this litigation would heal the wound he has made in the financial standing and position of these people in the world. He would not pay them, but rather spend it on lawyers. The time may come when you will come up against the power of money." The court expressed its disapproval as follows: "The use of such language to a jury cannot be too severely censured. It is not argument. It is rather insinuation pregnant with unfair suggestion. The restraints of self-respect and the rules of forensic argument alike forbid it. The field for argument and illustration is broad and inviting. . . . There is no justification or excuse for leaving it and selecting instead improper suggestions."

Qualification of Rule.

Where the poverty or wealth of a party to an action is shown by the evidence and a reference thereto has some legitimate bearing on the case it does not constitute improper argument. Thus in Norris v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 239 Mo. 695, 144 S. W. 783, the plaintiff's counsel said: "Years ago the father of this brave little woman died of consumption, and left her to make her own way in the world." The fact that the plaintiff's father had died of consumption leaving the plaintiff an orphan, having been brought out in the evidence by the defendant, as tending to show a probable cause for the decline of the plaintiff's health, was held to leave no ground for objection to the remark. In Gilman v. Laconia, 71 N. H. 212, 51 Atl. 631, it was shown by the evidence that the plaintiff was a person who "ran a small baggage express" with one horse, and the defendant was a municipal corporation. The following remark of the plaintiff's counsel in his closing argument was held not to be improper: "I do not ask for a verdict for my client because he is a poor man, nor because the city is rich and powerful; I only ask for a verdict if he is entitled to one under the law and the evidence." In Hersey v. Hutchins, 70 N. H. 130, 46 Atl. 33, the plaintiff's counsel in his closing argument, replying to some comment of the defendant's counsel on certain plans of the plaintiff and the defendant, said: "Our client here is a woman of small means; she couldn't be at the expense the defendant has in making surveys." In holding such remarks to be proper the court said: "The argument that the plaintiff, having small means, could not be to so great an expense as the defendant had been to in procuring plans, stated no fact that was not in evidence. It was proper to suggest to the jury that the rudeness of her plans was not due to a purpose of withholding information from them, but to her want of means to procure more elaborate ones. This view was properly urged upon the jury as an answer to the defendant's comments upon the comparison of his plans with hers. . . . The instruction that the case was not to be decided upon the fact as to the comparative wealth or poverty of the parties was correct; but the direction to the jury to entirely disregard the remark of counsel, took from the plaintiff her right to have the circumstance of her limited means considered upon the question of why she did not furnish more or better plans." In Winston v. Terrace, 78 Wash. 140, 138 Pac. 673, wherein the respondent's counsel referred to the appellant as a "millionaire" and as being "a rich man," the remarks were held to be within the scope of legitimate argument when consideration was given to the fact that the appellant had pleaded in his answer in the action which was for trespass and assault that he was known in the community where he lived "to be worth a considerable sum of money and to have considerable property," which facts were testified to on his behalf in support of his claim that the action of the respondents was the result of a conspiracy on the part of the respondents to obtain some part of his property. In Baker v. Madison, 62 Wis. 147, 22 N. W. 141, 583, counsel was held to have used with propriety the following words: "I am careful not to get error into the case. If my client was a rich man, I should like to litigate this matter for the next twenty-five years, and I think it would give me a good support; but my client is poor, and we live in Minneapolis, and every time we come down here it costs him a hundred dollars." The court said: "The remark that plaintiff was a poor man, and the allusion to the expense of the litigation in connection with that fact, if unproved, would have been improper, not because such statement was pertinent to the issue—for it was not—but because it might have tended unduly to influence the minds of the jurors in favor of the plaintiff, which, on principle, is as objectionable as prejudice against the defendant. But we think it a fair inference from the testimony that the plaintiff is not rich. He was a farm laborer, working for others for hire in summer, before and after he was injured, and sometimes taught school in the winter. He had no mechanical trade. It is not unreasonable to infer from his condition and employment that he was poor. The rule we are considering does not prohibit a statement by counsel of a fact proved in the case, even though such fact is outside the issue."

Where the wealth of a party is referred to for a purpose which is under the circumstances plausible argument, the remarks are not open to objection. McKinnie v. Lane, 133 Ill. App. 438, affirmed 230 Ill. 544, 82 N. E. 878, 120 Am. St. Rep. 338, wherein reference to the standing and position of the appellant was made for the purpose of showing the confidence of the appellee in the appellant when he signed and delivered a receipt though it was alleged that the bill had not been paid. In Cook v. Smith-Lowe Co. 135 Ia. 31, 109 N. W. 798, it was contended that the fact that the plaintiff returned to work too quickly retarded his complete recovery from an injury for which he sought to recover. It was held that the statements of counsel in argument that "miners do not have a very large bank account" and that "he had a wife and family, and he had to get daily bread" were not improper but legitimate argument to show that the plaintiff's return to work before he had completely recovered and at a time when physical exertion would be injurious to him should not be construed against him in determining the amount of his recovery.

In an action for the death of a husband and father by wrongful act, since the jury may consider the financial loss accruing from the deprivation of the society, comfort, care, and protection of the deceased as well as of his support, it has been held that counsel may properly in his address to the jury "picture to the imagination the probable pecuniary privations and condition of the bereaved widow and child resulting from the absence of the supporting care and protection of the deceased." Under such circumstances the argument is directed to an element of damage allowed by law. Hale v. San Bernardino Val. Traction Co. 156 Cal. 713, 106 Pac. 83.

Where the party complaining is the first to offend the court will refuse to entertain any complaint with regard to the alleged objectionable words. Patton v. Lund, 114 Ia. 201, 86 N. W. 296, wherein the plaintiff's counsel declared that the defendant was not a poor widow in answer to a statement by her counsel that she was.

Prejudicial Error.

Improper remarks of counsel referring to the wealth or poverty of the parties have generally been held to constitute ground for a reversal of the judgment where the remarks are objected to and there is no instruction by the court that they are to be disregarded by the jury. Taylor v. Harris, 68 Ill. App. 92; U. S. Cement Co. v. Cooper, 172 Ind. 599, 88 N. E. 69; Almon v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 163 Ia. 449, 144 N. W. 997; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Proctor, 122 Ky. 92, 80 S. W. 714, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 598; Carter Coal Co. v. Hill, 166 Ky. 213, 179 S. W. 2; Smith v. Jennings, 121 Mich. 393, 80 N. W. 236; Holmes v. Loud, 149 Mich. 410, 112 N. W. 1109; Willis v. McNeill, 57 Tex. 465; Texas, etc. R. Co. v. Jarrell, 60 Tex. 267; The Oriental v. Barclay, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 193, 41 S. W. 117; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Langston, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 568, 47 S. W. 1027, 48 S. W. 610; Ft. Worth Belt R. Co. v. Johnson, 59 Tex. Civ. App. 105, 125 S. W. 387; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Swann, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 127 S. W. 1164; Bitterman v. Hearn (Tex.) 32 S. W. 341; Southwestern Tel. etc. Co. v. Taylor (Tex.) 118 S. W. 188; Miller v. Burgess (Tex.) 136 S. W. 1174; Campbell v. Prieto (Tex.) 143 S. W. 668; Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. Culver (Tex.) 168 S. W. 514. Compare Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Morgan, 110 Ky. 740, 62 S. W. 736. Thus in U. S. Cement Co. v. Cooper, supra, it appeared that counsel said: "The plaintiff is not rich. He was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth. He cannot sit in a richly adorned chair with silver and gold piled about his plate. He cannot ride in fine chariots. He does not have millions, like the defendant, made from the labor of other men." In holding that the impropriety was fatal to the judgment the court said: "The appellant, in the presence of the jury, objected to the language at the time, and moved that the court withdraw the same from the jury, which motion was overruled. Appellant thereupon moved that the court withdraw the case from the jury and set aside the submission, which motion was also overruled, and an exception properly reserved. The language complained of was not directed to any issue or legitimate evidence in the case, and was of a prejudicial character. There could have been no justification for its use, and it cannot now be said that it did not affect the result."

However, in some cases remarks of that character have been held not to constitute reversible error where it did not clearly appear that they had prejudiced the rights of and worked an injury to the adverse party. Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. Fox (Tex.) 6 S. W. 569; Dugan v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 85 Wis. 609, 55 N. W. 894. See also Texas Cent. R. Co. v. Pledger, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 248, 81 S. W. 755.

The effect of the impropriety of uttering remarks as to the wealth or poverty of the parties has been held to be cured by an emphatic instruction of the court to the jury that statements of that nature are to be disregarded. Jones v. Tucker, 3 Boyce (Del.) 422, 84 Atl. 4, 1012; Whitehead v. Springfield Light, etc. Co. 161 Ill. App. 564; Southern R. Co. v. Bulleit, 40 Ind. App. 457, 92 N. E. 474; Hamlin v. Philbrook (N. H.) 97 Atl. 977; Duerler Mfg. Co. v. Eichhorn, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 638, 99 S. W. 715; McKenzie v. Boutwell, 79 Vt. 383, 65 Atl. 99; Neumeister v. Goddard, 133 Wis. 405, 113 N. W. 733. See also Felix v. Scharnweber, 119 Ill. 448, 10 N. E. 16; Graves v. Bonness, 97 Minn. 278, 107 N. W. 163; Bitterman v. Hearn (Tex.) 32 S. W. 341; Southwestern Tel. etc. Co. v. Taylor (Tex.) 118 S. W. 188. And see the reported case. Compare Griffith v. American Bridge Co. 163 App. Div. 597, 148 N. Y. S. 994. Thus in Duerler Mfg. Co. v. Eichhorn, supra, it was said: "But counsel, in his speech to the jury, spoke of Miss Eichhorn as a 'penniless girl.' He ought not to have done that. A verdict should not be sought upon anything save evidence in the record pertinent to the issues in the case, for it rests upon nothing else. The strongest guard that conscience can muster should be placed over a jury where there is 'a woman in the case,' and her lawyer ought to be satisfied with the fact that his client is a woman, and not 'roll it under his tongue as a sweet morsel' that she 'is penniless' and throw it out for the jury to ruminate upon, lest it excite the sympathy of its members and put conscience to flight and warp their judgment. But as 'a wise man forseeth danger and shunneth it,' the trial judge instructed the jury not to consider the remark of counsel as to her being a 'penniless girl,' saying that plaintiff's condition had nothing to do with her right to recover. . . . It should be presumed, therefore, that the jury regarded the instruction of the court, and its verdict was not influenced by the remark."

Where it appears that an instruction to disregard statements of counsel as to the wealth or poverty of the parties was given by the court it will be presumed to have been obeyed by the jury. Jones v. Tucker, 3 Boyce (Del.) 422, 84 Atl. 4, 1012; Southern R. Co. v. Bulleit, 40 Ind. App. 457, 92 N. E. 474; Hamlin v. Philbrook (N. H.) 97 Atl. 977; Duerler Mfg. Co. v. Eichhorn, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 638, 99 S. W. 715. Compare Griffith v. American Bridge Co. 163 App. Div. 597, 148 N. Y. S. 944. And see Sullivan v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 119 Ia. 464, 93 N. W. 367, wherein it was held that the effect of words of that nature was not remedied by the trial court merely saying: "It is an improper statement to the jury to even call their attention to a matter of that character." The appellate court said: "Jurors, as a rule, do not come to the trial of causes with minds trained to a proper discrimination between what are and what are not relevant matters; and, by reason of the lack of legal education and experience, they are oftentimes innocently, and even unconsciously, controlled in their view of causes submitted to them by influences that would have no place in the consideration of one familiar with the ethics of the law, and accustomed to the work of legal decision. . . . It does not always follow that a direction by the court to disregard certain improper matters, to which attention has been called during the trial, has the desired effect. The juror may honestly endeavor to keep the improper matter out of sight, and believe that he has done so, and yet unconsciously it may enter as an element into the composition of its verdict. If we expect to retain the benefits of our jury system, great care must be taken not only by the court, but by attorneys as well, to see to it that only matters proper for their consideration are brought to the attention of juries."

It has been held that the error committed by uttering improper remarks as to the wealth or poverty of the parties was remedied where the court told the jury that the parties must be regarded as on an equal footing, and no request for further instructions was made. Davis v. Adrian, 147 Mich. 300, 110 N. W. 1084. And in White v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 145 Ia. 408, 124 N. W. 309, the error was held to be cured by a withdrawal of the remarks by the counsel even in the absence of an instruction from the court. The court said: "Whether by design or inadvertently in the heat of argument counsel succeeded in getting before the jury (1) the poverty of plaintiff; (2) the wealth of defendant. . . . True there was some evidence that plaintiff was without means, but this did not authorize counsel to make use of the circumstance as a basis of argument contrasting his poverty with defendant's wealth. Neither circumstance was entitled to the slightest weight in determining the amount of damages to be allowed. But counsel withdrew the remark concerning defendant's millions in a way to obviate any prejudice, for what he said plainly indicated that this was not for the jury's consideration." But in Williamson v. Hirsh, 147 Ill. App. 500, wherein it appeared that "the court ruled against the remarks" of the plaintiff's counsel to the effect that the defendants were "large manufacturers, a wealthy concern," and stated in addition that there was nothing in the record showing the defendants to be a wealthy concern, it was held that the remarks constituted ground for reversal, it not being safe to say that the words were not prejudicial.

In Caverhill v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 77 N. H. 330, 91 Atl. 917, and Lemay v. Demers, 77 N. H. 563, 94 Atl. 262, it was held that an improper statement referring to wealth or poverty having been objected to, it was incumbent on the party making the same in order to remedy the error to withdraw it, and to obtain an instruction to the jury not to consider it and a finding of fact from the presiding justice that the trial was not rendered unfair thereby, a failure to comply fully with those details being fatal to the verdict.

In Jenkins v. North Carolina Ore Dressing Co. 65 N. C. 563, it was held that except where there is a gross abuse of privilege the trial court need not stop the counsel and reprove him at the time of the utterance on being requested to so do by opposing counsel, but may make the correction along with other matters in his charge. The appellate court said: "Zealous advocates are apt to run into improprieties; and it must generally be left to the discretion of the judge, whether it best comports with 'decency and order,' to correct the error at the time, by stopping or reproving the counsel; or wait until he can set the matter right in his charge. It must often happen that the judge cannot anticipate that the counsel is going to say anything improper; and it may be said before the judge can prevent it, as in this case. The judge could not know that the counsel was going to speak of his client as a 'poor widow.' And then the question was, whether he was obliged to stop the counsel then and there, and reprove him, and tell the jury that they must not consider that, or whether he would wait and correct that, and all other errors, when he came to charge the jury. Ordinarily this must be left to the discretion of the judge. But still it may be laid down as law, and not merely discretionary, that where the counsel grossly abuses his privilege to the manifest prejudice of the opposite party, it is the duty of the judge to stop him then and there. And if he fails to do so, and the impropriety is gross, it is good ground for a new trial. In the case before us the impropriety was not gross."

An objection to improper references as to wealth or poverty is held to be essential to a party's right to complaint thereof on appeal. Norris v. Whyte, 158 Mo. 20, 57 S. W. 1037; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 43 Okla. 268, 142 Pac. 1111. And the objection, it appears, should be made at the time the utterance is made. Norris v. Whyte, supra, wherein it was said: "The argument of counsel to the jury is part of the proceedings in the case, an incident of the trial, just as much so as the testimony of the witnesses or any other step that is taken in the trial, and any objection to remarks of counsel must be made at the time the remarks are made and a ruling of the court obtained or asked therein just as is required when a question to a witness is objected to, so that the error may be prevented or its effect corrected by the court, and a failure to do so at the time is fatal to the right to object to it afterwards."

But under the rules governing the Texas district courts it has been held to be discretionary whether objection shall be made at the time of the utterance of the remarks or whether the question shall be raised by the bill of exceptions presented as ground for a new trial. Willis v. McNeill, 57 Tex. 465, wherein it was said: "This discretion given to counsel, as to whether he will make the objection at the time, was doubtless based upon the well-known embarrassments and often prejudice which generally attend the interruption of the argument of one counsel by another; and was intended to place that as a duty where it properly belongs—upon the presiding judge."

In Norris v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 239 Mo. 695, 144 S. W. 783, it was held that a mere objection and exception was not enough on which to base a reversal, but that a request should be made to have the offending counsel disciplined and an exception taken to a refusal of that request. The court said: "Except in extreme cases, it is not sufficient to secure reversal, for an attorney to merely object and except to the remarks of opposing counsel. He should request that the transgressing counsel be rebuked by the court; and where the proper rebuke is not administered, he should except to the court's failure to rebuke; otherwise, this court will be disinclined to grant a new trial based on improper remarks of counsel."

WALSH

v.

CITY OF BRIDGEPORT.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—
October 8, 1914.

88 Conn. 528; 91 Atl. 969.

Appeal and Error — Assignments of Error — Sufficiency — Erroneous Assumption.

Where the allegations of a complaint and the findings of fact were materially different in several particulars, assignments of error assuming that the record showed that the allegations of the complaint had been found proven are improper.

Fire Department — Pay of Fireman — Absence on Account of Sickness.

Bridgeport City Ordinance March 15, 1909, § 134, provides that the board of fire commissioners may continue, in their discretion, the salary of any officer or member of the fire department who shall have received any injury while in the performance of his duty, incapacitating him from performing his usual duties in the department. It is held that such provision gives rise to a conclusive inference that firemen will not be entitled to salary during absence because of incapacity to perform their duties not received while in the performance of duty.

Same.

Bridgeport City Ordinance March 15, 1909, § 134, provides for the regulation of the fire department of the city by a board of fire commissioners, prescribes the manner of paying their salaries, and declares that the board may continue the salary of a member of the department unable to perform his duties by reason of incapacity received while performing the usual duties of the department. In April, 1910, the city adopted an ordinance by which members of the fire department were divided into three classes, section 2 of which provided the yearly salaries of each grade, but made no reference to the method of compensation, the time when it was to be paid, or the power of the commissioners to continue the salary of a member when incapacitated from service. It is held that such later ordinance did not operate as an implied repeal of the former, so as to warrant payment of salary to a fireman while absent from duty because of illness not contracted in the service of the department.

Ordinances — Implied Repeal.

Where a later ordinance contains no repealing clause, it will not repeal a former ordinance unless the later one is clearly intended as a substitute for the earlier, or there is an irreconcilable conflict between them, and then only so far as the inconsistency extends.

Words and Phrases — "Wages" and "Salary" Distinguished.

The word "salary," as used in a city ordinance providing for the compensation of firemen, is synonymous with "wages," though the word "salary" is sometimes understood to relate to compensation for official or other services, as distinguished from "wages," which is the compensation for labor.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from City Court of Bridgeport:
COUGHLIN, Judge.

Action by Thomas Walsh, plaintiff, against City of Bridgeport, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Hugh J. Lavery and Laurence S. Finkelstone for appellant.

John S. Pullman for appellee.

[529] RORABACK, J.—This is an action brought by Thomas Walsh, a fireman of the city of Bridgeport. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that there is a certain sum of money due him as a portion of his salary as a fireman of the defendant city, which it, through its board of fire commissioners, refused to pay.

The record shows that this case was tried in the City Court of Bridgeport at its March term, 1914; that the court, having heard the parties, found the issues for the defendant, and adjudged that the defendant recover of the plaintiff its costs.

The plaintiff appealed, and the parties agreed to a finding of facts in the case, which the trial court adopted.

Upon appeal to this court the only errors assigned are: (1) "That the court erred and mistook the law in ruling that upon the allegations of the complaint alleged and proved, said Thomas Walsh was not a salaried public officer of the City of Bridgeport. (2) That the court erred and mistook the law in ruling that upon the allegations of the complaint alleged and proved, the said Thomas Walsh was not entitled to his salary during the time he was absent from duty by reason of illness. (3) That the court erred and mistook the law in ruling that upon the allegations of the complaint alleged and proved, the ordinance of the City of Bridgeport, which became effective on the first day of April, 1910, said ordinance regulating the pay of firemen [530] of said city, did not repeal such portions of Section 134 of the ordinances of the City of Bridgeport, as amended on March 15th, 1909, as gives the Fire Commissioners the power to deduct pay from the salary of the said Thomas Walsh, while the said Thomas Walsh was absent from duty by reason of illness."

The plaintiff, in his assignment of errors, assumes that the record showed that the allegations of the complaint have been found to be proven. This assumption is not true. The record discloses no foundation for any such claim. The allegations of the complaint and the finding of facts in several particulars are materially different. Assignments of error should be supported by the record. Palmer v. Hartford Dredging Co. 73 Conn. 182, 190, 47 Atl. 125.

The third reason of appeal, although improperly framed, we shall treat, as both parties have treated it, as if properly made for the purpose of considering the action of the trial court in holding that the ordinance which took effect in April, 1910, raising the firemen's pay, did not repeal § 134 of the ordinance of 1909, which requires "an accurate semi-monthly pay roll of the officers and members of the fire department, in which shall be designated the date and period of service of each officer and member and the amount due each of them up to the first and 16th days of each month respectively."

The charter of the city of Bridgeport authorizes the common council to make, alter and repeal orders and ordinances regulating the fire department and fixing the salaries of its members. 15 Special Law, p. 513, § 53. Pursuant to this power the common council has from time to time passed ordinances changing the pay of the city firemen and regulating the manner in which the pay rolls of the fire department should be made up.

In May, 1907, the plaintiff was duly appointed a [531] fireman of the city of Bridgeport and is still a member of that department.

On March 15th, 1909, the ordinance upon this subject was amended to read, in part, as follows: "Section 134. The board of fire commissioners shall keep a record of the officers and members of the department and of each separate company thereof. They shall also keep an accurate semi-monthly payroll of the officers and members of the fire department, in which shall be designated the date and period of service of each officer and member and the amount due each of them up to the first and 16th days of each month respectively, and said pay roll shall be delivered to the city auditor on or before the 1st and 16th days of each month to be kept on file. The city clerk is hereby authorized and empowered to draw his order on the city treasurer on the 1st and 16th days of each month respectively, for the amount of such pay rolls in favor of the clerk of the board of fire commissioners or of the president of the board of commissioners and the amount so received by said clerk of the board of fire commissioners shall be disbursed by him to the officers and members of the fire department in the manner herein provided, but in the absence or disability of said clerk, by the president of the board of fire commissioners or such person as the fire commissioners shall designate. On the 1st and 16th days of each month, respectively, said clerk of the board of fire commissioners shall pay to each officer and member of the fire department that sum of money which is due to each of them on said days, and when payment is so made said clerk shall take a receipt upon said pay roll of each officer and member so paid for the amount paid to him and said pay roll thus receipted shall be lodged with the city auditor and kept on file by him. The board of fire commissioners may continue, in their discretion, the salary of any officer or member of the [532] fire department who shall have received any injury while in the performance of his duty incapacitating him from performing his usual duties in said department."

The last clause, which gives the board of fire commissioners power, in their discretion, to continue the salaries of members during their incapacity resulting from injuries received while in the performance of their duties, makes the inference conclusive that but for this provision they would not be entitled to their salaries during such incapacity, nor during the time they failed to perform their duties because of incapacity not received while in the performance of their duties.

This ordinance took effect April 1st, 1909, and has never been repealed unless by the adoption of a regulation made by the defendant city, which provided: "Section 1. After April 1, 1910, the permanent drivers, hosemen, stokers, linemen, laddermen and tillermen shall be divided in three grades, the highest to be known as Grade A, the next to be known as Grade B, and the lowest to be known as Grade C. All permanent drivers, hosemen, stokers, linemen, laddermen and tillermen appointed after this ordinance takes effect shall serve the first year in Grade C, the next succeeding year in Grade B, and each succeeding year thereafter in Grade A. Each driver, hoseman, stoker, lineman, ladderman and tillerman, who is a member of the regular force on April 1, 1910, shall then be placed in that one of the grades herein provided for, to which his length of service preceding April 1, 1910, entitles him to belong. Drivers, horsemen, stokers, linemen, laddermen and tillermen may be reduced at the discretion of the board of fire commissioners from one grade to another lower grade as a punishment for any offense coming under the jurisdiction of the board of fire commissioners. Section 2. Commencing April 1, 1910, the yearly salaries [533] of the members of the fire department, indicated below, shall be as follows: Captains, $1,400; engineers, $1,300; lieutenants, $1,250. And Grade A, drivers, hoseman, stokers, linemen, ladder-men and tillermen, $1,200. Grade B, drivers, hosemen, stokers, linemen, ladder-men and tillermen, $1,100. Grade C, drivers, hosemen, stokers, linemen, ladder-men and tillermen, $1,000. Section 3. This ordinance shall take effect April 1, 1910, and all ordinances or parts of ordinances heretofore enacted and inconsistent herewith, are hereby repealed, to take effect April 1, 1910."

Under this ordinance the plaintiff became a member of Grade A of the fire department, so-called, and was entitled to a salary at a yearly rate of $1,200. On April 11th, 1910, the plaintiff became ill from eczema which did not arise out of his employment as fireman, and by reason of such illness was incapacitated from duty and did not report for duty until April 25th, 1910. The bi-monthly pay-rolls of the fire department for the month of April, 1910 (as called for in §134 of the ordinances), did not call for any payment to the plaintiff for services from April 11th, 1910, to and including April 25th, 1910. The omission of salary due to the plaintiff on the pay rolls from April 11th, 1910, to April 25th, 1910, was due to the fact that the plaintiff did not report for duty. The plaintiff would have received from the city the sum of $46.66 more than he did actually receive for services in the month of April, 1910, if no deduction had been made in his pay roll for the two weeks he was off duty.

It is conceded that the controlling question in the case is as to the effect of the ordinance of April, 1910, upon the ordinance of 1909 (§ 134). If the provisions of the ordinance of 1909 (§ 134) are repealed by the ordinance of 1910, the plaintiff has the right to recover; if not, this action cannot be maintained.

[534] "All statutes, whether remedial or penal, should be construed according to the apparent intention of the legislature, to be gathered from the entire language used, in connection with the subject and purpose of the law." Bissell v. Beckwith, 32 Conn. 509, 516. The ordinance of April, 1910, embraces but one part of the general subject of the compensation of firemen. It deals with the different grades of firemen and the annual rates of compensation or salary. It makes no reference to the method of compensation, the time when it is to be paid, or the power of the commissioners to continue the salary of a member of the fire department when incapacitated from service. When two Acts are not in terms repugnant, yet if the later one covers the whole subject-matter of the former, and embraces new provisions plainly showing that it was intended as a substitute for the former, the latter will operate as a repeal of the former. U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall 88, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 153. No such conditions exist in the present case. There is no inconsistency or repugnancy between any of the provisions of the two ordinances. When the provisions of the ordinance of 1910 are read in connection with the provisions of the ordinance of 1909, it is apparent that there was no intention that the ordinance of 1910 should in any way supersede the provisions of the ordinance of 1909. They can both stand and have concurrent operation. The two ordinances can and must be read together, that the defendant municipality may administer its finances relating to this department in an orderly and intelligent manner.

It is plain that there is no repeal of § 134, as amended in 1909, unless, as the plaintiff claims, by implication. Such repeals are not favored, and will not be extended beyond the reason therefor, nor presumed where the old and new statute may well stand together. Windham County Sav. Bank v. Hines, 55 Conn. 433, 12 Atl. [535] 517; Bissell v. Dickerson, 64 Conn. 61, 29 Atl. 226; Kallahan v. Osborne, 37 Conn. 488; Central Ry. etc. Co.'s Appeal, 67 Conn. 197, 35 Atl. 32. If both the earlier and the later statute can be reconciled, they must stand and have concurrent operation. Goodman v. Jewett, 24 Conn. 588; Kallahan v. Osborne, 37 Conn. 488; Talcott v. Glastonbury, 64 Conn. 575, 30 Atl. 764. The repugnancy between the two statutes must be clear and manifest, to warrant a court in holding that the later repeals the former. Hartford Bridge Co. v. East Hartford, 16 Conn. 149; Middletown v. New York, etc. R. Co. 62 Conn. 492, 27 Atl. 119. A statute is not repealed by a later affirmative one containing no repealing clause, unless there is irreconcilable conflict, or the later statute is clearly intended as a substitute for the earlier. Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U. S. 596, 1 S. Ct. 434, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 251; Henderson's Tobacco, 11 Wall. 652, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 235. Repeals by implication extend to only so much of the prior statute as is within the reason of repeal. They are never extended further than the inconsistency compels. New Haven, etc. Counties v. Milford, 64 Conn. 568, 30 Atl. 768.

It is impossible to read the two ordinances together and come to the conclusion that there was any intention, either express or implied, in the ordinance of 1910, to change the method of regulating the compensation of the members of the fire department, or to deprive the board of fire commissioners of the discretionary power vested in them to disallow a claim for services which have never been rendered. The ordinance of 1910 deals with no such subjects directly or indirectly.

The word "salary" has not that inflexibility which the plaintiff claims for it. According to some lexicographers the words "wages" and "salary" are synonymous. The words seem to be synonymous, convertible [536] terms, though use and acceptance under certain circumstances may have given the word "salary" a significance somewhat different from the word "wages" in this: that the former is understood to relate to compensation given for official or other services as distinguishable from "wages," the compensation for labor. In the present case it makes but little difference whether the distinction here suggested be recognized or not. We are dealing with a case where the board of fire commissioners of Bridgeport, in their discretion, had the right to continue the salary of a member of the fire department when it should appear that he was injured while in the performance of his duty. The finding shows that Walsh became ill from eczema, which did not arise out of his employment, and that by reason of such illness he did not report for duty or render any services during the time for which he now claims to recover for services. The omission of the city of Bridgeport to pay was on this account.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

NOTE.

Distinction between "Salary" and "Wages."

"Salary" and "Wages" Distinguished.

It has been held that the term "wages," as distinguished from "salary," applies to the compensation for manual labor, skilled or unskilled, paid at stated times, and measured by the day, week, month or season, while "salary" denotes a higher degree of employment, or a superior grade of services, and implies a position or office; that, by contrast, the term "wages" indicates inconsiderable pay for a lower and less responsible character of employment, while "salary" is suggestive of a larger and more permanent or fixed compensation for more important services. Gordon v. Jennings, 9 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 45, 51 L. J. Q. B. 417, 46 J. P. 519, 46 L. T. N. S. 534, 30 W. R. 704; Wilkes-Barre First Nat. Bank v. Barnum, 160 Fed. 245; Gay v. Hudson River Electric Power Co. 178 Fed. 499; South, etc. R. Co. v. Falkner, 49 Ala. 115; In re Stryker, 158 N. Y. 526, 53 N. E. 525, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489; People v. Brookfield, 13 Misc. 566, 34 N. Y. S. 674; People v. Remington, 45 Hun 329, affirmed 109 N. Y. 631, 16 N. E. 680; Meyers v. New York, 69 Hun 291, 23 N. Y. S. 484. See also People v. Myers, 25 Abb. N. Cas. 368, 11 N. Y. S. 217, 42 Alb. Ann. Cas. 1917B.—21.

L. J. 332; Cochran v. A. S. Baker Co. 30 Misc. 48, 61 N. Y. S. 724; Bell v. Indian Live Stock Co. (Tex.) 11 S. W. 344, 3 L.R.A. 642. And see the reported case. So, it has been said that the word "wages," in its application to laborers and employees, certainly conveys the idea of a subordinate occupation which is not very remunerative—one of not much independent responsibility, but subject rather to immediate supervision. South, etc. R. Co. v. Falkner, 49 Ala. 115; In re Stryker, 158 N. Y. 526, 53 N. E. 525, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489. And it has also been said that the word "wages" is applied in common parlance specifically to the payment made for mechanical labor, or other labor of a manual kind, as distinguished from "salary," which denotes compensation paid to professional men. In re Stryker, 158 N. Y. 526, 53 N. E. 525, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489; Cochran v. A. S. Baker Co. 30 Misc. 48, 61 N. Y. S. 724.

In Gordon v. Jennings, 9 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 45, 51 L. J. Q. B. 417, 46 J. P. 519, 46 L. T. N. S. 534, 30 W. R. 704, it was held that the salary of the secretary of a corporation amounting to £200 a year, payable quarterly, was not "wages" within the meaning of the Wages Attachment Abolition Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 30, s. 1). Grove, J. said: "The intention of the act is to abolish the attachment of 'wages.' Now it may be that the term 'wages,' according to the etymological meaning of the word, may be correctly applied to any remuneration for services, but it seems to me that the popular signification must be looked to. The term 'wages' is not applied to the remuneration of a high or important office of the state or a company, for instance, but to that of domestic servants, laborers, and persons of a similar description. Taking the collocation of the word 'servant' with 'workman' and 'laborer,' it is obvious that the reasonable application of the act is to persons of small means—to servants, such as laborers and workmen receiving small wages at short periods. What is the position of the judgment debtor here? He is a secretary paid a salary of £200 a year by quarterly payments. I do not think his position and remuneration can be said to come within the same description as those of menial servants or laborers. His salary is more than sufficient to keep life up; his salary and employment are such as many persons in the position of gentlemen are sometimes glad to get." Lopes, J. said: "The question is whether the judgment debtor was a 'servant, laborer, or workman' receiving 'wages' within the meaning of the act. It is important to consider the object of the act in order to determine this question. It seems obvious from the terms used that the object was to except from the liability to attachment of debts the case of persons who would be likely to be deprived of their daily means of subsistence by having their earnings attached in the hands of their employers. I do not think that a person in the position of the judgment debtor comes within the language or the spirit of the act. To be within the act I think a person must be earning what would be popularly called 'wages.'" In the case of In re Stryker, 158 N. Y. 526, 53 N. E. 525, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489, the court said, in speaking of a statute giving a preference to claims for wages against an insolvent corporation: "The most important word in the statute is the word 'wages.' It was wages that the legislature intended to prefer in the distribution of the assets of the insolvent corporation, not salaries, nor earnings, nor compensation. It was not intended to prefer the claims of all employees, but it was manifestly intended to limit the preference to the particular class whose claims would be properly expressed by the use of the word wages. This word is applied in common parlance specifically to the payment made for manual labor, or other labor of menial or mechanic kind, as distinguished from salary and from fee, which denotes compensation paid to professional men. (Century Dictionary.) In its application to laborers and employees it conveys the idea of subordinate occupation which is not very remunerative, of not much independent responsibility, but rather subject to immediate supervision. This was the construction which this court placed upon the statute in the case of People v. Remington, 45 Hun 338, affirmed here on the opinion below, 109 N. Y. 631. It was said in that case that the statute was designed to secure the prompt payment of the wages of persons who, as a class, are dependent upon their earnings for the support of themselves and their families, and it was not designed to give a preference to the salaries and compensation due to officers and employees of a corporation occupying superior positions of trust or profit. I cannot doubt that this is a correct interpretation of the statute which conforms to the purpose which the legislature evidently had in view in its enactment. In order to give the preference provided by the statute, the claim must be for wages in the ordinary sense of that term. It was not, we think, the purpose of the statute to secure a preference for claims due to the clerical force engaged in transacting the business, nor to the superintendent, foremen or officers of the corporation who are compensated by a fixed yearly salary. Although the word employees is used, yet the purpose of the statute was to protect mechanics, operatives or laborers from loss of their wages in the event of the insolvency of the corporation. It is significant to note that insurance and moneyed corporations are excepted from the operation of the statute. There was no reason for excepting these corporations but for the fact, well known, that they do not employ labor, in the ordinary sense of that word. The conduct of the business of these corporations requires a large clerical force, graded and organized according to the extent and necessities of the business. If it was intended to protect the claims of this class of employees, there was no reason why all corporations should not be included within the scope of the statute. But it evidently was not. It was supposed that that class of employees could protect themselves, whereas the common laborer, operative or mechanic, would be left by the failure of the business in a much more helpless condition. The wages of laborers, mechanics and domestic servants has in modern times become the subject of protective legislation in this and many other countries, and whenever the law has been extended beyond these classes, so as to include the claims of parties performing clerical duties or work of a like character, it was by judicial construction based upon language much broader than is to be found in the enactment in question." But see Hopkins v. Cromwell, 89 App. Div. 481, 85 N. Y. S. 839, wherein it was held that the words "wages" and "salary," as used in a statute (Laws 1897, p. 772, c. 624, § 29), providing for the distribution of the assets of an insolvent corporation under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, should be construed as being practically synonymous. The court affirmed the decision in the lower court, wherein it was said: "It is to be noted that the Stryker case (like several others somewhat contra) construes an act of more restricted phrase, in that the apt words there are 'wages' and not 'wages or salaries,' while the subjects of the statute are designated as 'operatives and laborers' and not 'employees.' . . . Broadly, the word 'salary' means a recompense or consideration made to a person for his pains or industry in another man's business. Jacob, quoted in Abbott's Law Dictionary. Whether it be derived from 'salarium,' or more fancifully from 'sal,' the pay of the Roman soldier, it carries with the fundamental idea of compensation for services rendered. Indeed, there is eminent authority for holding that the words 'wages' and 'salary' are in essence synonymous. . . . I think the legislature employed the words 'wages or salaries' while practically equipollent, for the purpose of fully describing the compensation which is to be paid to employees, inasmuch as that term, while embracing operative or laborer, means something more. The final question in every case is whether the subordinate tested by the character of his services and the nature of his relation, is an employee within the protection of the statutes, whose compensation may be fairly said to be wages or salary, within the accepted scope of these terms; and the fact that the compensation in this case was practically paid for piece work, that is, for pickles after they were sorted, properly treated and forwarded for the principal as the result of plaintiff's manual labor, should not exclude the plaintiff from the benefits of this statute."

It has been held that the word "wages," in its ordinary acceptation, has a less extensive meaning than the word "salary;" that "wages" is ordinarily restricted to sums paid as hire or reward to domestic or menial servants and to sums paid to artisans, mechanics, laborers, and other employees of like class, as distinguished from the compensation of clerks, officers of public corporations, and public officers. Speilberger v. Brandes, 3 Ala. App. 590, 58 So. 75; Massie v. Cessna, 239 Ill. 352, 88 N. E. 152, 130 Am. St. Rep. 234, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1108. See also People v. Remington, 45 Hun 329, affirmed 109 N. Y. 631, 16 N. E. 680.

In Cowdin v. Huff, 10 Ind. 83, the court said: "There are now, and were at the adoption of our constitution, at least three modes in use of compensating persons engaged in the public service, viz., fees, salaries and wages. These modes are all different, each from the other; and the difference between them has been immemorially well understood. Fees are compensation for particular acts or services, as the fees of clerks, sheriffs, lawyers, physicians, etc. Wages are the compensation paid, or to be paid, for services by the day, week, etc., as of laborers, commissioners, etc. Salaries are the per annum compensation to men in official and some other situations. The word salary is derived from salarium, which is from the word sal, salt, being an article in which the Roman soldiers were paid. See (the dictionaries of) Richardson, Webster, Bouvier, and Wharton." To the same effect see Seiler v. State, 160 Ind. 605, 65 N. E. 922, 66 N. E. 946, 67 N. E. 448; Blick v. Mercantile Trust, etc. Co. 113 Md. 487, 77 Atl. 844. But in Board of School Com'rs v. Wasson, 74 Ind. 133, the court after quoting the foregoing passage from Cowdin v. Huff, said: "Looking to the dictionaries, we find in Webster's Unabridged the word 'salary' is defined to be 'the recompense or consideration, stipulated to be paid to a person for services; annual or periodical wages or pay; hire;' and the synonyms given are, 'stipend; pay; wages; allowance;' and in Worcester's Dictionary the definition is, 'an annual or periodical payment for services, a stipulated periodical recompense; a stipend; wages; hire; an allowance.'"

The distinction between wages and salary has also been expressed in the following language: "Salary and wages are in their legal application recognized as independent and distinct terms. 'Salary' has been defined to mean 'annual or periodical recompense or pay,' and 'wages' as a 'compensation given to a hired person for services rendered.' Webst. Dict. In ordinary language, the term 'wages' is applied to designate the sums paid to persons hired to perform manual labor; while the phrase 'salary' applies to those holding official station." Cane v. New York, 34 N. Y. S. 675. To the same effect see McLellan v. Young, 54 Ga. 399, 21 Am. Rep. 276; People v. Myers, 25 Abb. N. Cas. 368, 11 N. Y. S. 217, 42 Alb. L. J. 332. So, it has been held that a property clerk and assistant paymaster in a city department was not an "employee" of the city, "earning wages" within the meaning of the statute (Laws 1890, c. 388) requiring the weekly payment of wages. People v. Myers, 25 Abb. N. Cas. 368, 11 N. Y. S. 217, 42 Alb. L. J. 332.

The Georgia statute of 1872 with respect to exemption of "wages" from garnishment has been held to contemplate persons who have wages due them and whose wages were exempt from garnishment under previous acts, and it has been held that the salary of a public officer is in no fair sense of the word "wages." McLellan v. Young, 54 Ga. 399, 21 Am. Rep. 276.

In State v. Duncan, 1 Tenn. Ch. 334, in determining whether the defendant was a salaried employee of a quasi-public corporation, and therefore ineligible to hold any city office, the court said, after distinguishing between wages and salary: "The authorities that we have quoted differ to some extent but only with respect to the fullness or meagerness with which they state the contents of the thought in attempting to give a definition. If they all be taken together, we think the substance of the definition thus found, being at the same time the true result of all of these constructions, as well as by the common judgment of men, is that the term 'salary' contains three elements and that they are all required to round out and complete the thought. These three elements are. the dignity in popular estimation of the duty involved, as distinguished from purely mechanical or subaltern service; a fixed term, usually not less than one year; and compensation by contract. 'Salary' is therefore a compensation agreed upon between employer and employee (or settled by law in the case of public officers) for a fixed term of service of one year or some aliquot part thereof, as a half year or quarter year (usually, however, for a year) and for services that are not menial in their nature. We do not think that the periods of actual payment are material elements of the definition. . . . Now, let us apply the definition to the present case. So far as the nature of the service goes, Mr.

Duncan's employment easily falls within the definition. He not only had the duty of attending to the inspection and repair of the whole of the company's line of railway, but he had gang foremen and fifty men under him; and these men he employed and discharged at his discretion, and so long as they were in the service of the company he had the direction and supervision of their work. But the element of a contract for a fixed term of service is not proven. The fact that Mr. Duncan was paid weekly is not tantamount to saying that he was employed by the week, or the contrary. This fact is consistent with either a mere employment by the week or with a contract for a much longer term, say a year, payable in weekly instalments. Being consistent with each view, it proves neither. Nor does the fact that Mr. Duncan had been in the company's service for three years tend to prove the nature of his contract as to the term of service. He may have worked during all that time under an employment from week to week, or by the year. The latter is, of course, the more probable of the two, but in the state of the proof we are not justified in finding that such is the fact. Under the testimony, then, as it stands before us, we are unable to find whether he was a salaried employee of the company or not."

In the case of In re Gay, 233 Fed. 604, it was held that the salary of a mining engineer, who was employed as such at a salary of $4,000 per annum, payable monthly, which was unpaid at the time of the bankruptcy of the employer, was not entitled to priority under the Bankruptcy Act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 64b (4); 30 Stat. L. 563, 1 Fed. St. Ann. 685, as amended 1 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed) 1090), as being "wages due to a workman, clerk or servant." The court said: "In a sense, everybody who works may be said to be a workman, and everybody who serves to be a servant; but as used in this section the words have a much narrower meaning, and include only those who work, labor or serve in a more or less subordinate capacity. . . . I doubt whether the earnings of a professional man, employed primarily because of his learning and his ability to advise helpfully, are properly described as 'wages;' and I do not think that the man himself is a 'workman, clerk or servant,' within this section."

Under an Alabama statute (Acts 1868, p. 249) providing that "the wages of laborers and employees shall not be subject to garnishment or attachment, except for public dues," it has been held that the salary of the president of a railroad corporation was not exempt from garnishment or attachment though the president could not be said to be a laborer or employee within the meaning of the law. South, etc. R. Co. v. Falkner, 49 Ala. 115.

In the case of Ex p. Bowes, 34 N. Bruns. 76, it was held that the salary of a deputy sheriff and gaol keeper was not "wages" under the provisions of the statute (45 Vict. c. 17, § 33) providing for garnishee or trustee process, and so was not exempt thereunder.

The New York statute (Laws 1888, c. 119, as amended by Laws 1892, c. 577) providing that no honorably discharged soldier, sailor or marine, who "served as such in the Union army or navy during the War of the Rebellion, or the Mexican war," etc., who holds "a position by appointment in any city or county of this state, receiving a salary from such city or county," shall be removed except for cause shown after a hearing had, has been held to relate to salaried positions only and not to apply to persons employed by the day for wages. Meyers v. New York, 69 Hun 291, 23 N. Y. S. 484; Nuttall v. Simis, 22 Misc. 19, 47 N. Y. S. 1097, affirmed 31 App. Div. 503, 52 N. Y. S. 308.

In the case of In re Jones [1891] 2 Q. B. 231, it was held that the wages of a working man did not come within the words "salary or income" in the Bankruptcy Act (52 & 53 Vict. c. 52, sec. 53, sub-s. 2) and that therefore an order could not be made to pay any part of his earnings to his trustee in bankruptcy for the benefit of his creditors. In the case of In re Earle's Shipbuilding, etc. Co. [1901] W. N. 78, it appeared that workmen employed by the company were paid for their services in part by a fixed salary and in part by commissions on the tonnage of ships built in the yards. On the voluntary dissolution of the company; it was held that the amounts then due to and claimed by the employees, were "wages" and entitled to priority within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act (51 & 52 Vict. c. 62, sec. 1, sub-s. 1 (b)).

"Salary" and "Wages" Held to Be Synonymous.

It has been held in same cases that the words "salary" and "wages" are synonymous; that both mean a sum of money periodically paid for services rendered. White v. Hayden, 126 Cal. 621, 59 Pac. 118; San Juan County v. Oliver, 7 Colo. App. 515, 44 Pac. 362; Morse v. Robertson, 9 Hawaii 195; Koppen v. Union Iron, etc. Co. 181 Mo. App. 72, 163 S. W. 560; Com. v. Butler, 99 Pa. St. 535; Hartman v. Mitzel, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 22. See also Bovard v. Ford, 83 Mo. App. 498; Dayton v. Ewart, 28 Mont. 153, 72 Pac. 420, 98 Am. St. Rep. 549. And it is immaterial how the value of the services is ascertained. White v. Hayden, 126 Cal. 621, 59 Pac. 118. In Com. v. Butler, supra, the court said: "According to the most approved lexicographers, the words 'wages' and 'salary' are synonymous. They both mean one and the same thing: 'a sum of money periodically paid for services rendered.' . . . The truth is, and this the lexicographers seem to hold, that if there is any difference in the popular sense between 'salary' and 'wages,' it is only in the application of them to more or less honorable services. A farmer pays his farm hands in common speech wages—whether by the day, the week, the harvest, or the year. If for any reason he has occasion to employ an overseer, his compensation, no matter how measured, is called a salary. An ironmaster pays his workmen wages, his manager receives a salary. A merchant pays wages to his servant who sweeps the floor, makes the fire and runs his errands, but he compensates his salesman or clerk by a salary. How can it make any difference in what way the compensation is ascertained?" And in Hartman v. Mitzel, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 22, in construing a statute (Act of April 15, 1845) providing that "the wages of any laborers, or the salary of any person . . . shall not be liable to attachment," the court said: "'Wages' is defined to be 'a compensation given to the hired person for his or her services,' Bouvier's Law Dictionary; 'Compensation for services by the day, week or month; compensation to a hired person for services,' Kenney's Law Dictionary; 'The compensation agreed upon by the master to be paid to a servant, or to any other person hired to do business for him,' Wharton. 'Salary' is said to be 'a reward or recompense for services performed,' Bouvier's Law Dictionary; 'a recompense or consideration made to a person for his pains and industry in another person's business,' Cowel, Wharton. It will thus be seen that, according to these definitions, there is substantially no difference in the meaning of the words. The essential of both is compensation for services rendered. In the common use of those terms the word 'salary' is employed in referring to a stated allowance for services of a superior grade, or for longer than a daily period; while the word 'wages' seems to be applied generally to compensation for short periods or for smaller sums. Taken together, they are broad enough to cover all compensation for services rendered in whatever occupation or capacity, no matter how extended or short the period of employment, or how large or small the amount. Whatever may be paid as to the extension of the application of either, when considered separately, there can be no doubt that within their united scope is included all remuneration for services performed by one person for another. It seems that in some states a distinction is made as to their legal import, but they are practically regarded as synonymous by the court of Pennsylvania."

ing for the exemption from garnishment of wages due for the last thirty days' service which is restricted to the heads of families, it has been held that the word "wages" is synonymous with "salary" and includes the salary or compensation due a comptroller and auditor and a general manager of a corporation. Bovard v. Ford, 83 Mo. App. 498; Koppen v. Union Iron, etc. Co. 181 Mo. App. 72, 163 S. W. 560. In the case last cited, the court said: "Section 89, Rood on Garnishment (ed. 1896), is quoted approvingly in the Bovard case, supra. That section reads: 'The manifest object of the statutes is to exempt the personal earnings of the defendant, as contradistinguished from any income or profits derived from speculative, mercantile or other business transactions; and it makes no difference by what means they are reckoned or ascertained, or what they may be termed. "If there is any difference, in the popular sense, between 'salary' and 'wages,' it is only in the application of them to more or less honorable services. . . . A merchant pays wages to his servant who sweeps the floor, makes the fire, and runs on errands, but he compensates his salesman or clerk by a salary.'" It is further said by the same author (section 93): 'The courts have no authority to make restrictions or limitations upon the exemption statutes other than those contained in the statutes themselves. . . . Likewise, the benefits of the statute may be claimed by all classes of persons, professional men as well as laborers, unless the statute excludes them by its own limitations.' . . . There are decisions in other jurisdictions which draw a line between the terms 'wages' and 'salary,' but we think that appellate courts of our own state have adopted the much broader use of the words, treating them as synonymous. Surely that is the more reasonable rule. Every one who works for another in any capacity for a stated compensation is a wage earner and the compensation wages. We may, out of a kind of pride, call it compensation or salary, and claim we are employed, not hired, but after all it amounts to the same thing—when we are employed, working, doing service, whether menial or of a higher grade, for another for pay, we are hired and are working, rendering service, for wages." However, in Bigley v. Bellevue Borough, 158 Pa. St. 495, 28 Atl. 23, it was held that wages of two dollars a day paid a constable to light the street lamps and patrol the streets, could not be regarded as an official salary within a constitutional provision prohibiting the decrease of an officer's salary during his term of office. It has been said that strictly, a salary is an agreed compensation for services, payable at regular intervals, but that a more liberal meaning is frequently given to the word; and that its synonyms are stipend, hire, wages, pay, allowance. San Juan County v. Oliver, 7 Colo. App. 515, 44 Pac. 362; Com. v. Bailey, 3 Ky. L. Rep. 110.

In Com. v. Cuyler, 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 275, it was held that a tax on salaries was a tax on wages, no matter how it was disguised.

McKINNEY

v.

ADAMS.

Florida Supreme Court—November 6, 1914.

68 Fla. 208; 66 So. 988.

Bathing Resorts — Liability of Keeper — Failure to Provide Life Lines.

Under the laws of this state an action may be maintained against a person who operates or maintains a bathhouse where bathing suits are furnished for hire, at the seaside resorts in the state, for negligence in failing to maintain proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of his patrons, when the patrons who are not guilty of contributory negligence are injured as a proximate result of the negligence of such operator or his agents.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Duval county: GIBBS, Judge.

Action by Louise McKinney, administratrix, plaintiff, against W. H. Adams, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. REVERSED.

[209] The declaration herein is as follows: "Louise McKinney, as Administratrix of the Estate of Mary E. Proctor, deceased, plaintiff, by her attorneys, in this the first count of her second amended declaration, sues W. H. Adams, defendant, for that heretofore, on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, the said defendant was operating and maintaining a certain public bath house and bathing pavilion where bathing suits were furnished for hire or rent, at Pablo Beach, a seaside resort in the State of Florida, situated in the County of Duval and State of Florida; that the defendant had exclusive control and management of said bath house and bathing pavilion; that said bath house and bathing pavilion was situated at or near the waters of the Atlantic Ocean at said Pablo Beach; that said defendant extended an invitation to the public to rent from him bathing suits and to avail themselves of the dressing room and kindred facilities of the defendant at said pavilion; that the waters of the Atlantic Ocean situated directly in front of said pavilion and bath house and extending up and down the beach for a space of a few hundred feet on either side of said point directly in front of said bath house and pavilion were the facilities for bathing which the defendant offered to the patrons of his bath house and bathing pavilion; that said defendant, by renting said bathing suits, invited such members of the public as rented bathing suits from him, to avail themselves of the facilities aforementioned for bathing and to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in front of and adjacent to the said pavilion as aforesaid; that said waters aforesaid were the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, which the defendant well knew; that on, to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, one Mary E. Proctor, did [210] rent from the said defendant a bathing suit for a valuable consideration in that behalf; that it was the intention of the said Mary E. Proctor, which the defendant then and there well knew, then and there to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean adjacent to which the defendant's said bath house and bathing pavilion was located, and which waters constituted the facilities for bathing offered to defendant's patrons as aforesaid; that thereupon the said Mary E. Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic Ocean adjacent to said bath house and bathing pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limit of the waters of said Atlantic Ocean, which constituted defendant's facilities for bathing as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide and maintain proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of the patrons of its patrons, bathers at the said seaside resort, contrary to the statutes of the State of Florida in such cases made and provided: that by reason thereof and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant, and while within the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died, leaving neither husband nor minor child or children nor any person or persons dependent upon her, the said Mary E. Proctor, for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on to wit, the seventeenth day of July, 1912, duly appointed as Administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Proctor.

Wherefore, the plaintiff brings this her suit and claims Fifty Thousand ($50,000.00) Dollars damages.

2. And the plaintiff by her attorneys in this the second [211] count of her second amended declaration, sues W. H. Adams, defendant, for that heretofore, on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, the said defendant was operating and maintaining a certain public bath house and bathing pavilion where bathing suits were furnished for hire or rent at Pablo Beach, a seaside resort in the State of Florida, situated in the County of Duval and State of Florida; that the defendant had exclusive control and management of said bath house and bathing pavilion; that said bath house and bathing pavilion was situated at or near the waters of the Atlantic Ocean at said Pablo Beach; that said defendant extended an invitation to the public to rent from him bathing suits and to avail themselves of the dressing rooms and kindred facilities of the defendant at said pavilion; that the waters of the Atlantic Ocean situated directly in front of said pavilion and bath house and extending up and down the beach for a space of a few hundred feet on either side of said point directly in front of said bath house and pavilion were the facilities for bathing which the defendant offered to the patrons of his bath house and bathing pavilion; that said defendant, by renting said bathing suits, invited such members of the public as rented bathing suits from him, to avail themselves of the facilities aforementioned for bathing and to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in front of and adjacent to the said pavilion as aforesaid; that said waters aforesaid were the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, which the defendant well knew; that on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, one Mary E. Proctor, did rent from said defendant a bathing suit for a valuable consideration in that behalf; that it was the intention of the said Mary E. Proctor, which the defendant then and there well knew, then and there to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean [212] adjacent to which the defendant's said bath house and bathing pavilion was located, and which waters constituted the facilities for bathing offered to defendant's patrons as aforesaid; that thereupon the said Mary E. Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic Ocean adjacent to said bath house and pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limit of the waters of said Atlantic Ocean, which constituted defendant's facilities as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide suitable and proper persons to superintend and watch over bathing in the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, and in which waters deceased was bathing, and to watch over and superintend its, defendant's, patrons, who were bathing in such waters; that by reason thereof and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant, and while within the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died leaving neither husband nor minor child or children, nor any person or persons dependent upon her, the said Mary E. Proctor, for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on to wit, the seventeenth day of July, 1912, duly appointed as administratrix of the Estate of Mary E. Proctor.

Wherefore, the plaintiff brings this her suit, and claims Fifty Thousand ($50,000.00) Dollars damages.

3. And the plaintiff, by her attorneys, in this the third count of her second amended declaration, sues W. H. Adams, defendant, for that heretofore, on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, the said defendant was operating and maintaining a certain public bath house and bathing pavilion [213] where bathing suits were furnished for hire or rent at Pablo Beach, a seaside resort in the State of Florida, situated in the County of Duval and State of Florida; that the defendant had exclusive control and management of said bath house and bathing pavilion; that said bath house and bathing pavilion was situated at or near the waters of the Atlantic Ocean at said Pablo Beach; that said defendant extended an invitation to the public to rent from him bathing suits and to avail themselves of the dressing room and kindred facilities of the defendant at said pavilion; that the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, situated directly in front of said pavilion and bath house and extending up and down the beach for a space of a few hundred feet on either side of said point directly in front of said bath house and pavilion, were the facilities for bathing which the defendant offered to the patrons of his bath house and pavilion; that said defendant, by renting said bathing suits, invited such members of the public as rented bathing suits from him, to avail themselves of the facilities aforementioned for bathing and to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in front of and adjacent to the said pavilion as aforesaid; that said waters aforesaid were the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, which the defendant well knew; that on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, one Mary E. Proctor, did rent from the said defendant a bathing suit for a valuable consideration in that behalf; that it was the intention of the said Mary E. Proctor, which the defendant then and there well knew, then and there to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean adjacent to which the defendant's said bath house and bathing pavilion was located, and which waters constituted the facilities for bathing offered to defendant's patrons as aforesaid; that thereupon the said Mary E. Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic Ocean adjacent [214] to said bath house and bathing pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limits of the waters of said Atlantic Ocean which constituted defendant's facilities for bathing as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide proper persons or appliances to rescue his patrons in the said waters customarily used by his said patrons, which constituted the facilities for bathing offered to such patrons by the defendant, and in which waters deceased was bathing, when such patrons were or might have been in danger of drowning; that by reason thereof and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant and while within the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died, leaving neither husband nor minor child or children nor any person or persons dependent upon her for the said Mary E. Proctor for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on to wit, the seventeenth day of July, 1912, duly appointed administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Proctor.

Wherefore, the plaintiff brings this her suit and claims Fifty Thousand ($50,000.00) Dollars damages.

4. And the plaintiff by her attorneys in this the fourth count of her second amended declaration, sues W. H. Adams, defendant, for that heretofore, on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, the said defendant was operating and maintaining a certain public bath house and bathing pavilion where bathing suits were furnished for hire or rent at Pablo Beach, a seaside resort in the State of Florida, situated in the County of Duval and State of Florida; that the defendant had exclusive control and management [215] of said bath house and bathing pavilion at or near the waters of the Atlantic Ocean at said Pablo Beach; that said defendant extended an invitation to the public to rent from him bathing suits and to avail themselves of the dressing room and kindred facilities of the defendant at said pavilion; that the waters of the Atlantic Ocean situated directly in front of said pavilion and bath house and extending up and down the beach for a space of a few hundred feet on either side of said point directly in front of said bath house and pavilion were the facilities for bathing which the defendant offered to the patrons of his bath house and bathing pavilion; that said defendant by renting said bathing suits, invited such members of the public as rented bathing suits from him, to avail themselves of the facilities aforementioned for bathing and to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in front of and adjacent to the said pavilion as aforesaid, that said waters aforesaid were the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, which the defendant well knew; that on to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, one Mary E. Proctor, did rent from the said defendant a bathing suit for a valuable consideration in that behalf; that it was the intention of the said Mary E. Proctor, which the defendant then and there well knew, then and there to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean adjacent to which the defendant's said bath house and bathing pavilion was located, and which waters constituted the facilities for bathing offered to defendant's patrons as aforesaid; that thereupon the said Mary E. Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic Ocean adjacent to said bath house and bathing pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limit of the waters of said Atlantic Ocean which constituted defendant's facilities for bathing as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed [216] to provide a proper person or persons and to have such person or persons present on behalf of said defendant to search for and recover any of the patrons of said bath house, when such patrons were bathing in the waters customarily used by said patrons and which constituted the facilities for bathing offered said patrons by the defendant in which waters deceased was bathing, when such persons were or might have been in danger of drowning; that by reason thereof and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant and while within the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died leaving neither husband nor minor child or children nor any person or persons dependent upon her the said Mary E. Proctor for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on to wit the seventeenth day of July, 1912, duly appointed as Administratrix of the Estate of Mary E. Proctor.

Wherefore, the plaintiff brings this her suit and claims Fifty Thousand ($50,000.00) Dollars damages."

To this declaration the following demurrer was filed:

"1. The allegations of the second amended declaration show that the administratrix, as such, has no right of action in this cause.

2. The second amended declaration does not state any facts or circumstances or conditions that authorize an administratrix to maintain the action.

3. Each count of the second amended declaration shows and sets forth that the deceased intended to bathe and was attempting to bathe in the Atlantic Ocean, and [217] the Atlantic Ocean is in no sense a bathing place or resort operated or controlled by defendant.

4. The facts stated in the second amended declaration show and establish that the defendant could not and would not invite the deceased to bathe in any bathing resort controlled by defendant, and defendant is in no wise responsible for any alleged lack of facilities for bathing in the Atlantic Ocean, as mentioned in the second amended declaration.

5. The defendant, a private individual renting bathing suits, is not required to provide protection or safeguards for bathers in the Atlantic Ocean, as described in the second amended declaration.

6. The mere renting of a bathing suit to deceased, as mentioned in said second amended declaration, is not sufficient to create any obligation or duty on the part of the defendant to provide the alleged lines, persons, appliances, rafts or other safeguards, as alleged in the second amended declaration.

7. The duty, if any, to provide such safeguards or persons to guard or rescue bathers in the Atlantic Ocean is a public duty, if any such duty exists, incumbent upon the State or Municipality, but not upon private individuals.

8. The deceased, attempting to bathe in the Atlantic Ocean, took the risk of any damages in so doing and there is no obligations or duty upon any person or public authority to provide safeguards for such bathers in such ocean.

9. That the second amended declaration, and each count thereof, fails entirely to show or set forth that the deceased or the public were invited by the defendant to bathe in the Atlantic Ocean, or that the defendant had any such proprietorship over the Atlantic Ocean as that [218] he could or did invite bathers to bathe therein as to become responsible for any danger to such bathers from bathing in said ocean.

10. That persons bathing in the Atlantic Ocean are not the guests of the defendant, or under any protection of the defendant, or licensees of the defendant, but voluntarily bathe in the said ocean and take all risks therefrom.

11. That neither of the said counts allege or set forth any facts, by reason of which the plaintiff, as an administratrix, has any interest in or right of action on account of the said alleged death of the said Mary E. Proctor.

12. That the said counts and each of them fail to allege or state any facts showing that any estate of Mary E. Proctor would be added to or increased by reason of the said alleged facts set forth in said counts of said second amended declaration.

13. That the waters of the Atlantic Ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

14. That each count of said second amended declaration fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house were in the Atlantic Ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, but allege that same extended up and down the beach and not in the waters of the ocean.

AS TO FIRST COUNT.

In addition to the foregoing above mentioned grounds as to each of the counts of the second amended declaration, defendant states the following as to the first count:

[219] 1. Said count does not allege or set forth that at the time of the alleged renting of said bathing suit by the said Mary E. Proctor that the defendant owned or operated any private bathing place where the deceased, Mary E. Proctor, at that time intended to bathe or did bathe.

2. Said count does not allege or set forth that the defendant paid a consideration for any right to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean at said resort but only alleged that she hired from defendant a certain bathing suit.

3. That there is no valid and constitutional statute of the State of Florida that required defendant to maintain life lines or life rafts for the protection of bathers or of deceased attempting to bathe in the Atlantic Ocean.

4. That the said statute referred to in said first count is in violation of the Constitution of the State of Florida and of the Constitution of the United States in attempting to interfere with and restrict legitimate business, and deprives the person engaged in the business of renting suits of his property without due process of law, and is a taking of such property without due compensation.

5. The said statute is unconstitutional in that it undertakes to put a burden or tax upon said business therein mentioned not authorized by the Constitution of Florida.

6. That said statute of Florida referred to in said count does not provide or give private individuals any right of action or provide any penalty to be paid to private individuals for failure to comply therewith.

7. That said statute referred to is in violation of the Constitution of the State of Florida, in that it undertakes to compel persons renting bathing suits to perform certain public duties, to wit, to provide safeguards to bathers.

8. That the said statute has no application to and does [220] not relate to persons who themselves and of their own accord undertake to bathe in public waters, to wit, in the Atlantic Ocean.

9. That the waters of the Atlantic Ocean were in no sense the premises or property of the defendant and were not under his control, and were not, as matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

10. That the said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house was in the Atlantic Ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach and not in the waters of the ocean.

AS TO SECOND COUNT.

1. As to the second count defendant repeats each of the grounds hereinabove mentioned, and in addition the following:

That there is no duty or obligation, statutory or otherwise, upon the defendant to provide a suitable person or persons to superintend bathing in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean.

2. The said count does not show or set forth that the waters where deceased was bathing were the property of or controlled by or in the possession of the defendant.

3. That said count shows no duty or obligation of the defendant to the deceased at the time of said alleged drowning of deceased.

4. That the waters of the Atlantic Ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of [221] law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

5. That said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion or bath house was in the Atlantic Ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach and not in the waters of the ocean.

AS TO THIRD COUNT.

As to the third count defendant repeats each of the grounds hereinbefore mentioned, and in addition the following:

1. That there was no legal duty upon the defendant to provide persons or appliances to rescue persons bathing in the said waters of the Atlantic Ocean, as alleged in said count.

2. That said count states a conclusion in said allegation, to wit, that the defendant did not provide persons or appliances to rescue persons bathing in the waters customarily used by patrons of said bathing house.

3. That the said count does not show or set forth that the waters in which deceased was bathing were owned, possessed or controlled by the defendant, but does show that they were public waters of the Atlantic Ocean not under the control of the defendant.

4. That said count shows no duty or obligation of the defendant to the deceased at the time of such alleged drowning of deceased.

5. That the waters of the Atlantic Ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of [222] law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

6. That said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant, described as a pavilion and bath house, was in the Atlantic Ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach and not in the waters of the ocean.

AS TO FOURTH COUNT.

As to the fourth count defendant repeats each of the grounds hereinbefore mentioned, and in addition the following:

1. That there was no legal duty of or obligation on the defendant to provide a person or persons and to have such person or persons present on behalf of the defendant to search for and recover patrons of said bath house in said waters mentioned in said count.

2. That the waters of the Atlantic Ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

3. That said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house was in the Atlantic Ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach and not in the waters of the ocean."

The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff declining to plead further, final judgment on the demurrer was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff took writ of error.

Bryan & Carson and J. M. Carson for plaintiff in error.

John C. Cooper & Son for defendant in error.

[223] WHITFIELD, J. (after stating the facts).—This action is brought under Sections 3145 and 3146 of the General Statutes of 1906, to recover "such damages as the party entitled to sue may have sustained by reason of the death of the party killed." When the decedent could have recovered for her injury if her "death had not ensued," then her administrator has a right of action under the statute, the decedent leaving no husband or minor child, nor any person dependent on her for a support. The question here is the right to recover, not the amount of the "damages . . . sustained by reason of the death." Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, 45 So. 755, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451.

When this alleged cause of action accrued, the following statute had been enacted:

"Chapter 6189—(No. 70).

AN ACT to Require Persons, Firms and Corporations Maintaining and Operating Public Bath Houses, Bathing Pavilions, and Other Similar Places at Seaside Resorts, to Maintain Life Lines and Life Rafts for Protection of Bathers and Providing a Penalty for Failure to Do So.

Be It Enacted by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

Section 1. Any person, persons, firm or corporation operating or maintaining public bath houses, bathing pavilions, [224] or other similar places, where bathing suits are furnished for hire or rent, at the seaside resorts in the State of Florida, are hereby required to maintain at all times proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of the bathers at such seaside resorts.

Sec. 2. Any person or persons, and the officers of any corporation violating the provisions of Section 1 of this Act shall be subject to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court.

Approved May 23, 1911."

The effectiveness of this statute as defining a crime and prescribing a penalty for the offense cannot be considered here, but the policy of the statute has its influence upon the general principles of law applicable to the duties and correlative liabilities of persons engaged in business as is alleged in this case, even though the particular things required to be done may not have been required at common law. The statute recognizes the use of the public waters of the State, "by persons, firms and corporations who are" "operating or maintaining public bath houses, bathing pavilions, or other similar places, where bathing suits are furnished for hire or rent at the seaside resorts in the State of Florida," and defines specific duties required of those who so use the public waters of the State, which specific duties are designed to protect the patrons of the particular business and are not inconsistent with duties that may be imposed by implication of law upon those engaged in such business.

Where one assumes to offer the use of public waters for purposes of profit by establishing bath houses or dressing rooms on the shore and furnishing bathing suits for hire [225] to persons who are expressly or impliedly invited to use the bathing suits by bathing or swimming in the public waters, and a patron uses the waters in the usual and ordinary way consistent with the express or implied invitation, and without his fault, is injured because of the unsafe condition of the premises on which patrons are invited to bathe or swim, or because of the negligence of the proprietor in performing his duties to patrons, the one so offering the use of the waters for profit may be liable in damages for such injury.

The liability proceeds from the duty imposed by law upon one who thus assumes to offer the use of public waters for profit, to exercise due care to prevent injury to patrons who without fault use the waters in the customary way. One will not be permitted to establish for profit a business of furnishing facilities and inviting persons to use public waters for bathing or swimming and to escape liability for injuries caused by the unsafe condition of the premises so used, of which unsafe condition the patron may not know or have due appreciation, but of which proprietor of the business should know. The patron has a right to rely upon the due performance of the implied legal duty of the one furnishing the facilities and extending the implied invitation to use the premises, to keep the same in a reasonably safe condition or to give due warning as to and protection against dangers. Though the waters are public and no governmental authority be expressly given to so offer them for use, one who assumes to so offer the use of the waters also assumes the legal duties and liabilities that are commensurate with such offer of the use. The nature of the use fixes the duties and correlative liabilities. An invitation may be implied from a continued and general custom in using the premises by the patrons of the business. The nature of [226] the use and the extent of the premises covered by an implied invitation to use, may be determined by the continued and general custom of the patrons of the place.

It may not be presumed from an injury that the keeper of the place failed to do his legal duty and consequently was negligent; but negligence of the keeper that proximately caused the injury must be duly alleged and proven; and any applicable contributory negligence on the part of the person injured will bar a recovery for a merely negligent injury. In determining whether the injured person is guilty of contributory negligence the practical capabilities of such person for self-protection under the particular circumstances should be considered, together with facts if any that should charge the keeper of the place or his employees with notice or knowledge of the same, when the injured person was invited to use the premises.

If a negligent failure to perform a statutory or a common law duty with reference to the safe condition of the premises customarily used by the patrons of a particular business enterprise, is a proximate cause of an injury to a patron who is not guilty of contributory negligence, the proprietor of the business may be liable in damages for such negligent injury.

It is alleged that the defendant "was operating and maintaining a certain public bath house and bathing pavilion where bathing suits were furnished for hire or rent at Pablo Beach, a seaside resort in the State of Florida; . . . that the defendant had exclusive control and management of said bath house and bathing pavilion; that said bath house and bathing pavilion was situated at or near the waters of the Atlantic Ocean at said Pablo Beach; that said defendant extended an invitation to the public to rent from him bathing suits and [227] to avail themselves of the dressing room and kindred facilities of the defendant at said pavilion; that the waters of the Atlantic Ocean situated directly in front of said pavilion and bath house and extending up and down the beach for a space of a few hundred feet on either side of said point directly in front of said bath house and pavilion where the facilities for bathing which the defendant offered to the patrons of his bath house and bathing pavilion; that said defendant, by renting said bathing suit, invited such members of the public as rented bathing suits from him, to avail themselves of the facilities aforementioned for bathing and to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in front of and adjacent to the said pavilion as aforesaid; that said waters aforesaid were the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, which the defendant well knew; that on, to wit, July 7th, A. D. 1912, one Mary E. Proctor, did rent from the said defendant a bathing suit for a valuable consideration in that behalf; that it was the intention of the said Mary E. Proctor; which the defendant then and there well knew, then and there to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean adjacent to which the defendant's said bath house and bathing pavilion was located, and which waters constituted the facilities for bathing offered to defendant's patrons as aforesaid; that thereupon the said Mary E. Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic Ocean adjacent to said bath house and bathing pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limit of the waters of said Atlantic Ocean which constituted defendant's facilities for bathing as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide and maintain proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of the patrons of its patrons, bathers at the said seaside resort, contrary to the Statutes of the State of Florida in [228] such cases made and provided; and also (2) that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide suitable and proper persons to superintend and watch over bathing in the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, and in which waters deceased was bathing, and to watch over and superintend its, defendant's patrons who were bathing in such waters; and also (3) "that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide proper persons or appliances to rescue his patrons in the said waters customarily used by his said patrons, which constituted the facilities for bathing offered to such patrons by the defendant, and in which waters deceased was bathing, when such patrons were or might have been in danger of drowning; and also (4) that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide a proper person or persons and to have such person or persons present on behalf of said defendant to search for and recover any of the patrons of said bath house, when such patrons were bathing in the waters customarily used by said patrons and which constituted the facilities for bathing offered said patrons by the defendant in which waters deceased was bathing, when such persons were or might have been in danger of drowning; that by reason thereof and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant, and while within the waters of the Atlantic Ocean in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died leaving neither husband nor minor child or children nor any person or persons dependent upon her, the said Mary E. Proctor, for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on to wit, [229] the seventeenth day of July, 1912, duly appointed as Administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Proctor."

The facts alleged as to the relation of patron and operator of a public bath house and bathing pavilion at a seaside resort, where bathing suits are furnished for hire, make it under the quoted statute a breach of duty for the defendant operator of a public bathing place to "negligently and carelessly fail to provide and maintain proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of" his patrons. For this alleged breach of duty the defendant may be liable in damages, even if he is not liable for negligently and carelessly failing to provide proper supervision and proper persons and appliances to rescue his patrons in said waters customarily used by patrons, when such patrons are without their fault in danger of drowning. All of these precautions may be duties of the operator of the place who offers its use to the public if the circumstances make such precautions reasonably necessary or expedient for the safety to those who use the waters in the customary way. See Larkin v. Saltair Beach Co. 30 Utah 86, 83 Pac. 686, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 982, 8 Ann. Cas. 977, 116 Am. St. Rep. 818; Boyce v. Union Pac. R. Co. 8 Utah 353, 31 Pac. 450, 18 L.R.A. 353; Bass v. Reitdorf, 25 Ind. App. 650, 58 N. E. 95; Decatur Amusement Park Co. v. Porter, 137 Ill. App. 448; Turlington v. Tampa Electric Co. 62 Fla. 398, 56 So. 696, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 72, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1213, 1 Neg. & Comp. Cas. 490; Brotherton v. Manhattan Beach Imp. Co. 50 Neb. 214, 69 N. W. 757, 48 Neb. 563, 67 N. W. 479, 58 Am. St. Rep. 673, 33 L.R.A. 598; Dinnihan v. Lake Ontario Beach Imp. Co. 8 App. Div. 509, 40 N. Y. S. 764.

The defense of contributory negligence should be shown by the defendant.

Ownership of premises is not essential to liability for injuries proximately caused by the dangerous condition of premises, the use of which is expressly or impliedly offered [230] to others. Liability may be imposed upon those who offer the use of premises under such circumstances as raise a legal duty to those who accept the offer and are injured because of the dangerous condition of the premises, where the negligence of the injured party does not contribute to the injury.

If at any time peculiar conditions at the usual place for bathing and swimming make the customary use patently or obviously dangerous, it may be contributory negligence to encounter the dangers. When the negligence of a plaintiff or those whom he represents contributes appreciably in producing the injury complained of the law affords no right of recovery in the absence of a statute covering the case. If a patron who is injured is not free from fault both of omission and commission while using the bathing facilities, there can be no recovery of damages from the party who provides the facilities for hire and invites or offers the use of the waters, even though such party is negligent in performing his duty to the patron.

The declaration in this case is sufficient as a lawful basis for proofs consistent with the allegation of negligence in the performance of legal duties due to a patron from one who furnishes facilities and offers the use of public waters for bathing purposes. If negligence within the scope of the allegations is shown to have proximately caused the death of the plaintiff's decedent, and such decedent was free from fault, there may be a recovery of damages in a proper amount as contemplated by the statute. The judgment is reversed.

[231] HOCKER, J. (dissenting).—I dissent from the opinion in this case because I do not think the administratrix has shown any right to sue and for a thorough discussion of my views, see dissenting opinion in the case of Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, text 477, 45 So. 755, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451.

NOTE.

Duty to Patrons of Proprietor of Bathing Resort or Beach.

It was held in Turlington v. Tampa Electric Co. Ann. Cas. 1913D 1213, that the keeper of a public diving and swimming place who maintained a spring board for the use and accommodation of his patrons was burdened with the duty to exercise proper care, precaution and diligence to provide and maintain a reasonably suitable and safe spring board, and water of reasonably suitable and safe depth under and about the spring board.

It appears in the reported case that a Florida statute requires under a penalty of fine and imprisonment the operator of a public bathing place at seaside resorts, where bathing suits are furnished for hire or rent, to maintain at all times proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of bathers. It is held that a failure to comply with the statute was negligence warranting a recovery by the personal representative of a patron who was drowned by reason of the absence of the statutory precautions against accident.

Two recent decisions have laid down the rule that a person maintaining a natatorium which is open to the public for swimming, diving and bathing for hire should maintain it in a condition reasonably safe for such purposes. Johnson v. Hot Springs Land, etc. Co. 76 Ore. 333, 148 Pac. 1137, L.R.A.1915F 689; Anderson v. Seattle Park Co. 79 Wash. 575, 140 Pac. 698. In the case last cited it appeared that the respondent paid his entrance fee for the use of a natatorium owned and operated by the appellant, and shortly thereafter attempted to enter a large swimming tank by means of a flight of five concrete steps leading from the main floor of the natatorium. The steps were about fifteen or sixteen inches in width, with eight-inch risers. The concrete finish on each tread was smooth, and there was an iron handrail running down the side of the steps. The water in the tank was maintained at a level with the top of the third step, but when the tank was used by bathers, all the steps were wet. Respondent started down these steps without taking hold of the handrail, as bathers were in his way. He slipped upon the second step, and in falling sustained the injuries complained of. The respondent sought to show that the steps were in a slimy or slippery condition and that a concrete surface when wet constituted a dangerous footing. The appellant introduced uncontradicted evidence to the effect that the tank was emptied, washed and scrubbed three times a week; that there was a constant circulation of water at all times; that thousands of people had gone up and down the steps on which the respondent was injured without falling; that the steps were constructed in accordance with the universal custom of similar natatoriums; and that the steps were not found to be in a slimy or slippery condition by others who had used them at about the time of the accident. It was held that the undisputed evidence showed that the appellant had kept the steps and tank in a reasonably safe condition and that the respondent's fall was an accident. In Johnson v. Hot Springs Land, etc. Co. 76 Ore, 333, 148 Pac. 1137, L.R.A.1915F 689, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate, Arthur Johnson, dived from a spring-board into a public swimming pool maintained by the defendant, struck his head on the bottom, was seriously injured, and thereafter died from the effects of the injury. It further appeared that at the time of the injury the tank was being refilled and the water beneath the spring-board was not at its usual depth. The court held that if the water beneath the spring-board was so shallow as to make diving therefrom unsafe it was the defendant's duty to notify his patrons and his failure to do so would be negligence, but where as in the case of the plaintiff's intestate the dive was made with actual knowledge of the shallowness of the water no recovery could be had because of the patron's contributory negligence. The court said: "Where a person, however, provides accommodations of a public nature, that person is required to use reasonable care and diligence in furnishing and maintaining such accommodations in a reasonably safe condition for the purpose for which they are apparently designed and to which they are adapted. If for any reason the accommodations are not reasonably safe and suitable for the purposes for which they are ordinarily used in a customary way, then the public should be excluded entirely, or appropriate notice of the unsafe and unsuitable condition should be given, and persons warned of the dangers in using them. The spring-board and the water beneath it constituted the accommodations which the defendant furnished to the deceased, who was a patron for hire, and, as such, was using them for diving purposes, to which they were adapted, and in the way in which they were customarily used. Persons patronizing the natatorium have a right to assume that the defendant has performed its duty, and that reasonably safe and suitable accommodations have been furnished.

. . . If by reason of the shallowness of the water the spring-board and the water beneath it were not reasonably safe for diving, then it was the duty of defendant to warn Arthur Johnson of the unsafe condition in order that he might be made aware of the danger; and therefore, if defendant failed to perform its duty, it was guilty of negligence which would be actionable if proximately causing the injury, unless the deceased was himself chargeable with contributory negligence. . . . One of the objects of the rule requiring the owner of a place of amusement like the one maintained by defendant to warn patrons of danger is to acquaint the patron with the hazard so that he may avoid injury. If the deceased had knowledge of the shallowness of the water and the danger incident to diving from the spring-board, then he knew all and no less than he could have known had defendant expressly warned him of the risk. If the defendant had, in fact, cautioned Johnson against the peril, and, notwithstanding such warning, the latter dived off the spring-board, then, on the facts of the instant case, the defendant would not be liable because of the knowledge imparted to Johnson; and so, too, the same result follows if Johnson did, in fact, know of the danger, even though not told by the defendant. If, with knowledge of the danger, Johnson placed himself in peril, and, on account thereof, was injured, he was chargeable with contributory negligence.

. . . Arthur Johnson was a good diver; he had been in the plunge at least on two prior occasions when the water was at its usual depth of about seven feet; he and his friends were told, upon making inquiry, that the water was between 3 and 3½ feet deep, and that it was shallow, but that the water was coming in fast; he and his companions sat around and waited 'for the water to fill up,' because the shallowness was apparent; he could not well have avoided seeing his friends standing up in the water; and consequently he must have known the depth of the water. It is also clear that he knew and realized the danger of diving off the spring-board into the water at the same time because, as Halvorsen said, Johnson was going 'to make a long dive to make it shallow in the water,' and his feet slipped, or he lost his balance in the air, and he came down straight. . . . The fact that he attempted 'to make a long dive to make it shallow in the water' reflects the knowledge then had by the deceased. After making due allowance for the difference in temperament, knowledge and judgment of different men, it is plain that reasonable minds would draw no other inference or conclusion from the unchallenged facts than that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence because he dived off the spring-board with knowledge of the existing conditions and a realization of the hazard."

EX PARTE McDANIEL.

Texas Court of Criminal Appeals—February 3, 1915.

76 Tex. Crim. 184; 173 S. W. 1018.

Extradition — Scope of Inquiry — Guilt of Fugitive.

The court, on habeas corpus by one in custody under a requisition warrant for his arrest as a fugitive from the justice of another state, will not go into the facts of his guilt or innocence of the offense charged by the demanding state.

Who Is Fugitive.

A person who commits a crime in one state and departs therefrom and is found in another is a "fugitive from justice."

[See 7 Ann. Cas. 1076; 13 Ann. Cas. 907; 112 Am. St. Rep. 122.]

Legality of Warrant — Burden of Proof.

An extradition warrant for the arrest of a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state makes a prima facie case on habeas corpus for the discharge of accused, and the burden is on him to show that the warrant was not legally issued.

[See 112 Am. St. Rep. 124.]

Sufficiency of Warrant — Recital as to Affidavit.

An extradition warrant, which recites that the demand was accompanied by a "complaint," instead of by a copy of an affidavit duly certified as authentic by the governor of the demanding state, is sufficient on habeas corpus.

Presumption of Authority of Magistrate Taking Affidavit.

An extradition warrant, which recites that accused stands charged by complaint before the proper authorities of the demanding state and that the demand is accompanied by a copy of a complaint sworn to before a justice of the peace, duly certified as authentic by the governor of the demanding state, presents a prima facie case of the authority of a justice of the peace to act as magistrate, and accused has the burden of showing the contrary to obtain his discharge on habeas corpus.

[See generally, 16 Ann. Cas. 1100; Ann. Cas. 1916A 526.]

Persons Subject to Extradition — Person in Custody on Another Charge.

Where accused detained under an extradition warrant sought his discharge on habeas corpus and showed that two indictments found in the state were pending against him, the court must order the detention of accused until the indictments are disposed of, with direction for his delivery under the extradition warrant.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Fannin county: DENTON, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceeding. W. L. McDaniel relator. From judgment rendered, relator appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Cunningham & McMahon for appellant.
C. C. McDonald and R. T. Lipscomb for appellee.

[185] HARPER, J.—Upon application made by the Governor of New Mexico, His Excellency, Governor O. B. Colquitt, granted the requisition, in language as follows:

"IN THE NAME AND BY AUTHORITY OF THE STATE OF TEXAS.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

"To all and singular the sheriffs, constables, and other civil officers of said State:

"Whereas, It has been made known to me by the Governor of the State of New Mexico that W. L. McDaniel stands charged by complaint before the proper authorities, with the crime of drawing and uttering a worthless draft in the sum of four hundred dollars committed in said [186] State, and that the said defendant has taken refuge in the State of Texas; and, whereas, the said Governor, in pursuance of the Constitution and laws of the United States, has demanded of me that I cause the said fugitive to be arrested and delivered to James W. Johnson, who is, as is satisfactorily shown, duly authorized to receive him into custody and convey him back to said State; and, whereas, said demand is accompanied by copy of said complaint duly certified as authentic by the Governor of said State.

"Now, therefore, I, O. B. Colquitt, Governor of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of this State and the United States, do issue this my warrant, commanding all sheriffs, constables, and other civil officers of this State, to arrest and aid and assist in arresting said fugitive and to deliver W. L. McDaniel when arrested to the said agent in order that he may be taken back to said State to be dealt with for said crime.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto signed my name and have caused the seal of State to be hereon impressed, at Austin, Texas, this 14th day of January, A. D. 1915.

"O. B. Colquitt,

"Governor.

"By the Governor:

"D. A. Gregg,

Under this authority relator was arrested and delivered to Mr. Johnson. Relator sued out a writ of habeas corpus before Judge Denton. When a hearing was had Judge Denton remanded the relator to the custody of Mr. Johnson, from which judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

Upon the hearing relator desired to go into the facts upon which the complaint or affidavit was founded, and show that he was guilty of no offense. This the court declined to permit him, and he presents this matter for review by bills of exception. It has been uniformly held by this court and the Supreme Court of the United States that the question of the guilt or innocence of a person of the offense charged will not be inquired into on habeas corpus in this character of case. This question came before the Supreme Court recently in the case of Drew v. Thaw, 235 U. S. 432, and it was held that on the habeas corpus hearing the question of guilt or innocence will not be inquired into, that court saying: "When, as here, the identity of the person, the fact that he is a fugitive from justice, the demand in due form, the indictment by a grand jury for what it and the Governor of New York allege to be a crime in that State, and the reasonable possibility that it may be such, all appear, the constitutionally required surrender is not to be interfered with by the summary process of habeas corpus upon speculations as to what ought to be the result of a trial in the place where the Constitution provides for its taking place. We regard it as too clear for lengthy discussion that Thaw should be delivered up at once." In the same case the court also passed on the question that motive of the person in leaving the demanding State was wholly immaterial, it holding: "If [187] the conspiracy constituted a crime, there is no doubt that Thaw is a fugitive from justice. He was a party to the crime in New York, and afterwards left the State. It long has been established that, for purposes of extradition between the States, it does not matter what motive induced the departure. Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 544, 6 S. Ct. 291; Apple- yard v. Massachusetts, 203 U. S. 222, 226, 227, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 161-163, 27 S. Ct. 122, 7 Ann. Cas. 1073."

In Ex p. Denning, 50 Tex. Crim. 629, 100 S. W. 401, this court held it was not error to refuse to hear evidence as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, that being a question for the courts of the demanding State, the court saying: "The question of the guilt of the relator or any other ulterior purpose behind the prosecution cannot be inquired into." In Coleman v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. 93, 113 S. W. 17, and Hibler v. State, 43 Tex. 197, this court and the Supreme Court have both held that a person who commits a crime in one State and departs therefrom, and is found in another State, may be regarded as a fugitive from justice.

There is no contention that relator was not in the State of New Mexico when the crime charged is alleged to have been committed, and subsequently left and came to this State.

While in Ex p. Cheatham, 50 Tex. Crim. 51, 95 S. W. 1077, it is held that the courts may go behind the Governor's warrant and review the grounds upon which the Governor may have issued the warrant, and in that case, because the offense was alleged in the affidavit "upon information and belief" the relator was discharged, in this case the affidavit contains no such words, it being in the following language:

"STATE OF NEW MEXICO

vs.

W. L. McDANIEL.

"State of New Mexico,

"County of Chaves.

"On this 26th day of December, A. D. 1914, personally appeared Roy Ammerman before the court of R. D. Bell, justice of the peace in and for precinct No. 2 of the County of Chaves, in the State of New Mexico, and after having been duly sworn in conformity with law, says that W. L. McDaniel did violate the laws of New Mexico by giving to the First State Bank and Trust Company of Roswell, N. M., a check or draft in the sum of $400 on the Farmers Bank of New Hope, Texas, and receiving the money on same knowing the same would not be paid and that this happened on or near Roswell of the 10th day of December, A. D. 1914, in the County of Chaves and State of New Mexico, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State of New Mexico.

(Signed) "Roy Ammerman, "Complainant.

[188] "Sworn to and subscribed before me on the 26th day of December, A. D. 1914.

(Signed) "R. D. Bell,

"Justice of the Peace."

And while it is held that the courts may go behind the Governor's warrant, yet it has always been held that the warrant issued by the Governor makes a prima facie case on habeas corpus and the burden is on the defendant to show that the warrant was not legally issued. (Ex p. White, 39 Tex. Crim. 497, 46 S. W. 639; Hibler v. State, 43 Tex. 197; Ex p. Stanley, 25 Tex. App. 372, 8 S. W. 645.)

Relator indulges in a criticism of the Governor's warrant for using the word "complaint" instead of reciting that the "demand was accompanied by a copy of an affidavit duly certified as authentic by the Governor of New Mexico." This question was decided adversely to relator's contention in the case of Ex p. White, 39 Tex. Crim. 497, 46 S. W. 639. In addition to this, the complaint or affidavit was introduced in evidence, as heretofore shown, and it is such an affidavit as is required by law.

Relator also contends that as the affidavit was sworn to before a justice of the peace, it was incumbent on the State to show affirmatively that under the laws of New Mexico that a justice of the peace is a "magistrate" in that State. As the Governor's warrant recites, "relator stands charged by complaint before the proper authorities, and whereas said demand is accompanied by a copy of the complaint duly certified as authentic by the Governor of that State," it presents a prima facie case, and if in fact a justice of the peace is not a magistrate in New Mexico, it was incumbent upon relator to show that fact. Ex p. Stanley, 25 Tex. App. 372, 8 S. W. 645; White v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. 497, 46 S. W. 639.

The only other question we deem it necessary to discuss is the one wherein relator shows there are two indictments pending against him in the District Court of Fannin County; that he has been arrested on such indictments, and given bond, and he contends that he should not be turned over to the New Mexico authorities while such indictments are pending. This record discloses that the two indictments are pending in the court over which Judge Denton presides; that he was the judge who heard the application for habeas corpus, and when relator introduced the two indictments in evidence, the district attorney filed motions asking leave to dismiss both of said cases, giving reasons therefor, with the knowledge and consent of the district judge. In approving the bill showing these facts, Judge Denton states when the district attorney filed those motions to dismiss the cases, and he consented and agreed that he might do so, the relator objected to it being done in vacation, and this is the only reason why the order of dismissal was not entered at that time. He further states that the order of dismissal will be entered in term time. In the case of Ex p. Hobbs, 32 Tex. Crim. 312, 22 S. W. 1035, 40 Am. St. Rep. 782, wherein the relator was under arrest for an offense against the laws of this State, it was held that the relator should not be extradited during [189] the pendency of that case, but he should be held without bail until that case was disposed of and then surrendered to the Tennessee authorities. If relator objects to a dismissal being entered in vacation, under the authority of the Hobbs case, supra, he is not entitled to be released from custody, but should be remanded to jail in Fannin County to be held until the order of dismissal is entered, or the two cases pending against him are otherwise disposed of, and then be delivered by the sheriff of Fannin County to the officer authorized to receive him by the Governor's warrant, and it is so ordered.

Affirmed and relator is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Fannin County to be held and dealt with in accordance with this opinion.

Relator remanded to custody.

NOTE.

Person in Custody on Charge of Other Crime as Subject to Extradition.

Generally.

The Constitution of the United States (Art. 4, § 2; 9 Fed. St. Ann. 184) provides as follows: "A person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be bound in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime." That provision imposes an imperative duty on the governor of a state to deliver up a person charged in another state with treason, felony, or other crime who has fled from justice and is found in the state and is demanded by the executive authority of the state from which he has fled. In re Opinion of Justices, 201 Mass. 609, 89 N. E. 174, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799; State v. Allen, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 258. However, while the obvious purpose of the provision is to prevent an offender against the justice of one state from obtaining immunity from punishment by fleeing to another state, it does not create a preference in the enforcement of the laws in favor of the demanding state, and the duty to surrender imposed thereunder is not absolute and unqualified. In re Opinion of Justices, 201 Mass. 609, 89 N. E. 174, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799. See also Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. 366, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 287, affirming

36 Conn. 242, 4 Am. Rep. 58. Therefore, the foregoing section of the Constitution has no application to a case where the offender is, at the time, held to answer for an offense against the laws of the state in which he has taken refuge, and so long as he is held to answer to the demands of justice in the state wherein he is found, the demand of the executive authority of the other state is subordinate to the operation of the laws of his place of refuge. It is only after the demands of the laws of the latter have been satisfied that the duty of obedience to the constitutional provision to surrender the fugitive arises. Hence it is well settled that a state need not surrender, on the requisition of another state, and because of a crime committed by him therein, a prisoner held in actual custody under criminal process to answer to or suffer punishment for a crime committed within its jurisdiction. In re Opinion of Justices, 201 Mass. 609, 89 N. E. 174, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799; People v. Hagan, 34 Misc. 85, 15 N. Y. Crim. 346, 69 N. Y. S. 475; Ex p. Hobbs, 32 Tex. Crim. 312, 22 S. W. 1035, 40 Am. St. Rep. 782. See also Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. 366, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 287, affirming 36 Conn. 242, 4 Am. Rep. 58; Matter of Troutman, 24 N. J. L. 634; State v. Allen, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 258. And see the reported case. In Taylor v. Taintor, supra, an action against the sureties on a recognizance, the court said: "Where a demand is properly made by the governor of one state upon the governor of another, the duty to surrender is not absolute and unqualified. It depends upon the circumstances of the case. If the laws of the latter state have been put in force against the fugitive, and he is imprisoned there, the demands of those laws may first be satisfied. The duty of obedience then arises, and not before." And in People v. Hagan, 34 Misc. 85, 15 N. Y. Crim. 346, 69 N. Y. S. 475, after quoting the foregoing language from the opinion in Taylor v. Taintor, supra, the court said: "The fact that in this particular case the relator, although under conviction, is actually at large on bail, does not, in my opinion, affect the application of the rule. He still owes to this state a debt of imprisonment as a punishment for the crime against the laws of this state of which he has been convicted. He is still theoretically in the grasp and custody of the law. Having given bail, he is merely regarded as delivered into the custody of his sureties and their dominion over him is but a continuance of his original imprisonment. . . . It is not the fact of actual physical incarceration, but the fact that the person sought to be extradited has been held to answer for a debt due to the law of the state in which he is found, that justifies the refusal of that state to surrender him until its demands upon him have been satisfied. I have no doubt, therefore, that the proper authorities of this state could have lawfully refused to deliver up the relator to the state of New Jersey until he had served the term of imprisonment to which he has been sentenced, or, if his present conviction be reversed, until he had been finally acquitted of the crime with which he stands charged in this state."

In Hackney v. Welsh, 107 Ind. 253, 8 N. E. 141, 57 Am. Rep. 101, it appeared that the petitioner for a writ of habeas corpus had committed a crime in the state of Michigan, and fleeing from justice in that state, voluntarily came into Indiana, where he committed another felony, for which he was indicted, convicted and imprisoned. While he was in confinement in Indiana, a warrant issued on a requisition from the state of Michigan was received by the sheriff in whose custody he then was, but he escaped from jail and fled into Ohio, whence he was brought back to the jail from which he had escaped on a warrant issued on a requisition by the governor of Indiana. Subsequently a nolle prosequi was entered in Indiana. The court said: "If he had not escaped, it is quite clear that he could have been rightfully surrendered under the warrant issued by the governor of this state." And it was held that he was rightfully delivered to the state of Michigan on its requisition. In the case of Ex p. Walters, 106 Miss. 439, 64 So. 2, it was held that the contention of the relator in an application for a habeas corpus for his release from a warrant issued on a requisition from the governor of Louisiana, that he should not be delivered to Louisiana for trial because he was charged with the same offense in Mississippi, was answered by the fact that the charge pending in Mississippi had been dismissed on the motion of the district attorney and the county prosecuting attorney, before the date of the hearing of his habeas corpus application, with the result that when the case was heard he was not held in Mississippi for an alleged violation of a criminal law of that state.

Likewise, it is well settled that, if a person is on trial or in duresse for a criminal offense—that is, in actual custody—under the authority of a state court, no other state court and no United States court should, except in an urgent case, take him from that custody for trial for another crime, prior to an actual release or relinquishment of custody on the part of the court before which the matter is pending. Ex p. Marrin, 164 Fed. 631; Cozart v. Wolf (Ind.) 112 N. E. 241. See also People v. Benham, 71 Misc. 345, 128 N. Y. S. 610.

In England a distinction apparently is drawn by statute between the extradition of a person who is in custody there to another government by which his surrender has been demanded, and the surrender of a person charged with crime in one portion of the British Dominions, to another portion thereof. The first situation is provided for in the Extradition Act, 1870 [33 & 34 Vict. c. 52, sec. 3 (3)] which declares that "a fugitive criminal who has been accused or convicted of an offense within English jurisdiction other than that for which his surrender has been demanded by the foreign state cannot be surrendered until his acquittal or the expiry of his sentence, as the case may be." See 14 Halsbury's Laws of England, p. 417, par. 969, tit. Extradition. Provision is made for the second situation in the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 690, sec. 35) which declares that "where a person accused of an offense is in custody in some part of His Majesty's dominions, and the offense is one for or in respect of which, by reason of the nature thereof or of the place in which it was committed or otherwise, a person may be tried in some other part of His Majesty's dominions, in such case a superior court, and also, if such person is in the United Kingdom, a secretary of state, and, if he is in a British possession, the governor of that possession, if satisfied that, having regard to the place where the witnesses for the prosecution and for the defense are to be found and to all the circumstances of the case, it would be conducive to the interest of justice so to do, may by warrant direct the removal of such offender to some other part of His Majesty's dominions in which he can be tried, and the offender may be returned and, if not prosecuted or acquitted, sent back free of cost in like manner as if he were a fugitive returned in pursuance of part I. of the act, and the warrant were a warrant for the return of such fugitive, and the provisions of the Act apply accordingly." See 14 Halsbury's Laws of England, p. 426, par. 999, tit. Surrender of Fugitive Offenders.

Waiver by State Having Custody.

It has been said that the state in which a fugitive is found may waive its right to punish him for a violation of its own laws and deliver him to the authorities of the other state. In re Opinion of Justices, 201 Mass. 609, 89 N. E. 174, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 799. In that case it was, however, said that it does not follow that any one of the three departments, the executive, legislative or judicial, which together represent the sovereignty of the people in their government can waive this right alone. But see People v. Hagan, 34 Misc. 85, 15 N. Y. Crim. 346, 69 N. Y. S. 475, wherein the court said: "In the very nature of things, it is desirable that the power should rest somewhere in the state to refuse to give up a prisoner until he has satisfied the claims of the state against him or to waive the enforcement of those claims and surrender him to another state for the satisfaction of its laws. If such power did not exist, a criminal might easily evade, or postpone, his just punishment for the gravest of crimes committed in one state by the commission of a crime of much less magnitude in another. If a state may waive the enforcement of its claims upon a prisoner, in favor of the claims of another state upon him, it becomes important to determine who is authorized to act for the state in that regard. Herein is to be observed a distinction between persons held under civil, and those held under criminal process. In the first case the individuals having, under the laws of this state, the right to resort to the body of their debtor in satisfaction of their claims, are entitled to be protected in that right, and it is a proper function of the judicial authorities of the state to protect the rights of creditors even to the extent of preventing the extradition of a debtor until the claims against him, enforceable under our laws by process against his body, have been satisfied. . . . In such a case there can be no doubt that if the creditors see fit to consent to the debtor's enlargement, he would at once become amenable to the writ of extradition. In the case of a person held for an offense against the criminal law, there are no private rights to be considered and no claims to be satisfied except those of the state. The question whether or not those claims ought or ought not to be waived in favor of the claims of a sister state is no longer a question for the judicial but for the executive branch of the government. Indeed the determination of the question, in the case of a prisoner convicted of a crime as is the relator, rests necessarily with the governor, for even if the court should deem it to be its duty to release a convicted prisoner from the operation of a writ of extradition, because he owed the state a term of imprisonment in consequence of his conviction, the governor, if for any reason he deemed the extradition to be desirable, could by a pardon wipe out the conviction, the debt due to the state, and the only obstacle to the enforcement of the writ. So in the case of a prisoner held to answer, but who had not been convicted the district attorney could remove all obstacles to his extradition by procuring a dismissal of the indictment. Practically, therefore, it rests with the executive power of the state to determine whether a person who has committed crimes both in this state and in another should be held here to answer before he is extradited, or be extradited without considering the charge against him here, and in determining that question the offender has no voice, and will not be heard. In the present case the governor, by issuing the writ of extradition, has determined that this relator should be sent to answer for his crime in New Jersey. With his reason for that determination the court has nothing to do. If because of the relator's use of different names the writ was issued in ignorance of the fact that he stood convicted of crime here, the governor may, if he sees fit, revoke his warrant. So long as it stands unrevoked, however, it justifies the relator's detention."

Of course, the acceptance of bail while a prosecution is pending is a waiver of the right of the state, for the time being, to insist on the custody of the person of the accused, and a permission to go at large in such a way that his person is liable to be taken on any lawful warrant for his arrest. In re Opinion of Justices, 201 Mass. 609, 89 N. E. 174, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799. So, it has been held that, where the governor of a state issues his warrant under a requisition from another state against a person who is at large under bail and is therefore subject to arrest on a proper process, it not appearing that the governor has knowledge that a prosecution has been begun in his state and the offender held to bail, a delivery under a warrant so issued should be treated as a waiver of its right by the state that delivers up the fugitive. In re Hess, 5 Kan. App. 763, 48 Pac. 596; People v. Hagan, 34 Misc. 85, 15 N. Y. Crim. 346, 69 N. Y. S. 475. See also In re Opinion of Justices, 201 Mass. 609, 89 N. E. 174, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799; State v. Allen, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 258.

v.

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS POWDER COMPANY.

Kansas Supreme Court—February 6, 1915.

94 Kan. 268; 146 Pac. 320.

Explosives — Negligence — Leaving Small Quantity Exposed — Injury to Child.

It is gross negligence for an agent of a powder company, after shooting an oil well with solidified glycerine, to leave a quart of that explosive lying near the well; and the act of a workman, unskilled in the use of such substances, in removing the dangerous article and placing it in the stone fence of a nearby graveyard to prevent injury to himself and his fellow workmen, does not amount to an unrelated, intervening and efficient cause so as to excuse the powder company from its liability for damages to children who afterwards find the solidified glycerine and are injured by it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The owner of so inherently dangerous a commodity as solidified glycerine is required to exert the highest degree of care to keep it in close custody to prevent its doing mischief, and that duty never ceases; and such owner is liable for all the natural and probable consequences which flow from any breach of that duty.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The rules heretofore announced by this court for the determination of proximate cause adhered to.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Chautauqua county: AYERS, Judge.

Action by Steve Clark, plaintiff, against E. I. DuPont de Nemours Powder Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

J. E. Brooks, A. H. Skidmore and S. L. Walker for appellant.

W. H. Sproul, J. A. Farrell, Charles W. Pennel and Charles E. Webster for appellee.

[269] DAWSON, J.—This is an appeal from an award of $1632.75 as damages for expenses and loss of services to the appellee on account of injuries received by his two minor sons through an explosion of solidified glycerine which was the property of the appellant. The circumstances leading up to the unfortunate occurrence which gave rise to this lawsuit may be briefly stated: On November 25, 1909, one L. H. Small was engaged in drilling an oil well upon the farm of J. McDowell in Chautauqua county near the home of Steve Clark, the appellee. The appellant, E. I. Dupont de Nemours Powder Company, is a New Jersey corporation, authorized to do business in Kansas and engaged in the business of manufacture and sale of exploding powders, nitroglycerine, solidified glycerine, and shooting of oil and gas wells with nitroglycerine, solidified glycerine and other powerful explosives of the nature of dynamite. On said date the agent of the appellant, one Van Gray, came from Bartlesville, Okla., to shoot the well with solidified glycerine, and after this was done he carelessly left near the well about a quart of solidified glycerine. One Joe McDowell, a son of the owner of the farm, and who was in the employ of the contractor who was boring the well, saw the explosive lying near, and, fearing that it would cause injury to himself or his fellow workmen who were still busy about the well, took charge of it and carried it home with him at the dinner hour. His mother protested against keeping this dangerous article about the premises, and he immediately took the solidified glycerine to an abandoned graveyard on the McDowell [270] farm at some considerable distance from his home. The graveyard was quite small, containing only three or four bodies, and was surrounded by a stone fence. It had not been used as a burial ground for many years. Young McDowell climbed the stone fence and placed the dynamite in a crevice therein near the ground, and laid another stone in front of the recess in the fence, partially covering the explosive.

Neither the powder company nor its agent, Van Gray, ever gave the nitroglycerine any further concern, and it remained in the stone fence of the old graveyard for over two years, and until December 23, 1911, when it was found by the children of the appellee and two other boys who were passing that way. One of the sons of the appellee climbed over the stone fence and found the nitroglycerine and handed it to the boys on the outside. They did not know its nature, and after handling it to some extent they left it at the graveyard. That evening one of the boys, Fred Clark, spoke to his uncle about it and described it to him, and the uncle ventured the opinion that it was some sort of tallow and not dynamite. The next morning, Sunday, the two Clark boys and another boy were out hunting and returned to the graveyard and one of them picked up the article and hit it on a rock for the purpose of breaking off a piece to take home. This caused the explosion.

The father grounds his action upon actual damages on account of expenditures for medical and surgical services, medicine and drugs, for his own service and that of his wife and hired help in nursing and caring for his sons, and for the loss of the services of his sons for five months of each year until they are twenty-one years of age.

Appellant assigns error on various grounds, but they are all argued together and are conceded to be substantially the same or relating to the same principle [271] and may be considered as one question. What was the approximate cause of the injury to plaintiff's sons?

There can be no doubt of the negligence of the powder company and its agent, Van Gray, in carelessly leaving by the oil well an article so inherently dangerous as solidified glycerine. The highest degree of care is required of all responsible persons having ownership or control of dangerous explosives such as dynamite and firearms. The utmost prudence and caution should be exercised to see that so dangerous an instrumentality does not work mischief to persons or property. The degree of care must be commensurate with the dangerous character of the commodity, and the duty to exercise this highest degree of care in keeping close custody of an article like dynamite never ceases.

In Mattson v. Minnesota, etc. R. Co. 95 Minn. 477, 5 Ann. Cas. 498, 104 N. W. 443, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, 70 L.R.A. 503, it was said:

"The degree of care required of persons having the possession and control of dangerous explosives, such as dynamite, is of the highest. The utmost caution must be used to the end that harm may not come to others in coming in contact with them." (111 Am. St. Rep. 483, syl. ¶ 2.)

This principle is virtually admitted by appellant and its counsel, but in an exhaustive and scholarly brief they attempt to show that the negligence of the agent was not the proximate cause of the damage; and that there was an independent and efficient intervening agency growing out of the act of the young man McDowell, who to save himself and his fellow workmen from danger carried the dynamite first to his home, and then hid it in the abandoned graveyard; and that the acts of McDowell in removing the solidified glycerine from the place where he found it and in taking it home and hiding it in the old graveyard, where it was found by the children of appellee, innocent though young McDowell's acts might be, were the proximate cause of the damages which ensued.

[272] The doctrine of remote and proximate cause is well established, and the difficulty in this case does not arise from a dispute as to the principle but as to its application. In 1 Cooley on Torts it is said:

"If an injury has resulted in consequence of a certain wrongful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury followed as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damage to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which was more remote. The chief and sufficient reason for this rule is to be found in the impossibility of tracing consequences through successive steps to the remote cause, and the necessity of pausing in the investigation of the chain of events at the point beyond which experience and observation convince us we cannot press our inquiries with safety. To the proximate cause we may usually trace consequences with some degree of assurance; but beyond that we enter a field of conjecture, where the uncertainty renders the attempt at exact conclusions futile." (3d ed. p. 99.)

Our attention is directed to many cases, including former decisions of this court, where the principle laid down by Judge Cooley is recognized. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Columbia, 65 Kan. 390, 69 Pac. 338, 58 L.R.A. 399; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Parry, 67 Kan. 515, 73 Pac. 105; Rodgers v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 75 Kan. 222, 12 Ann. Cas. 441, 88 Pac. 885, 121 Am. St. Rep. 416, 10 L.R.A. 658; Home Oil, etc. Co. v. Dabney, 79 Kan. 820, 102 Pac. 488; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Justice, 80 Kan. 10, 101 Pac. 469; Barnett v. United Kansas Portland Cement Co. 91 Kan. 719, 139 Pac. 484.

Running through all the precedents in analogous cases the test appears to be: Is the injury or damage the natural and probable consequence of the original negligence? The mere intrusion of an intervening agency does not always excuse the original wrongdoer. On this subject the supreme court of Massachusetts has spoken with such accuracy and precision that its ideas are settled law. Thus in Stone v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536, 51 N. E. 1, 41 L.R.A. 794, it was said:

"It cannot, however, be considered that in all cases the intervention even of a responsible and intelligent [273] human being will absolutely exonerate a preceding wrongdoer. Many instances to the contrary have occurred, and these are usually cases where it has been found that it was the duty of the original wrongdoer to anticipate and provide against such intervention, because such intervention was a thing likely to happen in the ordinary course of events. Such was the case of Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136, where it was found by the jury that the meddling of young boys with a loaded truck left in a public street was an act which the defendants ought to have apprehended and provided against, and the verdict for the plaintiff was allowed to stand. In the carefully expressed opinion by Mr. Justice Colt the court say: 'In actions of this description, the defendant is liable for the natural and probable consequences of his negligent act or omission. The injury must be the direct result of the misconduct charged; but it will not be considered too remote if, according to the usual experience of mankind, the result ought to have been apprehended. The act of a third person, intervening and contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence, will not excuse the first wrongdoer, if such act ought to have been foreseen. The original negligence still remains a culpable and direct cause of the injury. The test is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated, not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which might arise.' According to this statement of the law, the questions in the present case are, Was the starting of the fire by Casserly the natural and probable consequence of the defendant's negligent act in leaving the oil upon the platform? According to the usual experience of mankind, ought this result to have been apprehended? The question is not whether it was a possible consequence, but whether it was probable, that is, likely to occur, according to the usual experience of mankind. That this is the true test of responsibility applicable to a case like this has been held in very many cases, according to which a wrongdoer is not responsible for a consequence which is merely possible, according to occasional experience, but only for a consequence which is probable, according to ordinary and usual experience. One is bound to anticipate and provide against what usually happens and what is likely to happen; but it would impose too heavy a responsibility to hold him [274] bound in like manner to guard against what is unusual and unlikely to happen, or what, as it is sometimes said, is only remotely and slightly probable. A high degree of caution might, and perhaps would, guard against injurious consequences which are merely possible; but it is not negligence, in a legal sense, to omit to do so.

"There may not always have been entire consistency in the application of this doctrine; but, in addition to cases of boys meddling with things left in a public street, courts have also held it competent for a jury to find that the injury was probable, although brought about by a new agency, when heavy articles left near an opening in the floor of an unfinished building, or in the deck of a vessel, were accidentally jostled so that they fell upon persons below; McCauley v. Norcross, 155 Mass. 584, 30 N. E. 464; The Joseph B. Thomas, 81 Fed. 578; when sheep, allowed to escape from a pasture and stray away in a region frequented by bears, were killed by the bears; Gilman v. Noyes, 57 N. H. 627; and when a candle or match was lighted by a person in search of a gas leak, with a view to stop the escape of gas; Koelsch v. Philadelphia Co. 152 Pa. St. 355, 25 Atl. 522, 34 Am. St. Rep. 653, 18 L.R.A. 759; and in other cases not necessary to be specially referred to. In all of these cases, the real ground of decision has been that the result was or might be found to be probable, according to common experience.

"Without dwelling upon other authorities in detail, we will mention some of those in which substantially this view of the law has been stated. (Davidson v. Nichols, 11 Allen (Mass.) 514; McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen (Mass.) 290; Tutein v. Hurley, 98 Mass. 211, 93 Am. Dec. 154; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106; Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; Derry v. [275] Our attention is directed by counsel for appellant to many cases where on account of an independent intervening agency the original wrongdoer was excused. (Goodlander Mill Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 63 Fed. 400, 24 U. S. App. 7, 11 C. C. A. 253, 27 L.R.A. 583; Carter v. Towne, 103 Mass. 507; Nickey v. Steuder, 164 Ind. 189, 73 N. E. 117; Cole v. German Sav. etc., Soc. 124 Fed. 113, 59 C. C. A. 593, 63 L.R.A. 416; Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L.R.A. 97; Jennings v. Davis, 187 Fed. 703, 713, 109 C. C. A. 451; Finkbeiner v. Solomon, 225 Pa. St. 333, 74 Atl. 170, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1257; Harriman v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11, 12 N. E. 451, 4 Am. St. Rep. 507; Harton v. Forest City Telephone Co. 146 N. C. 429, 59 S. E. 1022, 14 Ann. Cas. 390, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 660; Pollard v. Oklahoma City R. Co. 36 Okla. 96, 128 Pac. 300, Ann. Cas. 1915A 140.)

On the other hand, counsel for appellee cite and quote from an impressive list of authorities beginning with the well-known Squib case, decided in 1770, and closing with the last expression of this court on analogous cases where the original cause was held to be the principal and proximate cause and where the intermediate incidents did not avoid the consequences arising from the acts or delicts of the original wrongdoer.

We do not think the facts in the Squib case (Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 892) are quite the same as here. In that case the burning squib was thrown by the original wrongdoer on the market stand of Yates, who instinctively and immediately picked it up and threw it on the stand of Willis, and Willis immediately threw it upon the stand of Ryal, and Ryal immediately and in self-defense threw it away from him so that it struck the eye of plaintiff, Scott, and put out his eye. In that case the intervening agents had no time for reflection. But part of the opinion in that case is pertinent here:

"That the natural and probable consequence of the act done by the defendant was injury to somebody, and therefore the act was illegal at common law. . . . Being therefore unlawful, the defendant was liable to answer for the consequences, be the injury mediate [276] or immediate. . . . The defendant . . . is the person, who, in the present case, gave the mischievous faculty to the squib. That mischievous faculty remained in it till the explosion. No new power of doing mischief was communicated to it by Willis, or Ryal. It is like the case of a mad ox turned loose in a crowd. The person who turns him loose is answerable in trespass for whatever mischief he may do. The intermediate acts of Willis and Ryal will not purge the original tort of the defendant. But he who does the first wrong is answerable for all the consequential damages." (p. 893.)

Here we reach the crux of the matter. No new power of doing mischief was communicated to the solidified glycerine by the acts of Young McDowell. The power of doing mischief was inherent in the glycerine all the time. That some terrible accident was likely to happen in letting it out of the close custody of some one skilled in its use was not only natural and probable but almost inevitable. McDowell had no skill or experience in handling the dangerous article. He did the best he could to prevent the damage impending on account of Van Gray's negligence. That he attempted to prevent its doing damage, but failed on account of lack of sufficient knowledge to dispose of it effectively, does not amount to an unrelated and efficient agency to shift the proximate cause from the delict of the powder company to a new proximate cause of his own making.

It may be said, however, that this is mere argument. If so, then the question clearly resolves itself into one of fact for the jury; and this is in harmony with the authorities.

In Atchison, etc. Co. v. Parry, 67 Kan. 515, 73 Pac. 105, it was said:

"Negligence, to be the proximate cause of an injury, must be such that a person of ordinary caution and prudence would have foreseen that some injury would likely result therefrom, not that the specific injury would result. The question whether negligence is the [277] proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily one of fact for the jury." (Syl. ¶ 2.)

In that case a passenger on the train became seriously ill, and the conductor called the depot-master at Newton, who, with the assistance of the porter, removed the sick man from the train and the conductor told the depot-master to care for him. About four hours afterward the sick man was run over and killed about five miles from Newton. The railway company insisted that even if there was culpable negligence it was not the proximate cause of the injury. In its opinion the court said:

"At most, the question whether the negligence of the depot-master was the proximate cause is one upon which the minds of different parties might reasonably disagree; and such being the case, and the whole matter having been submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and they having found that it was, we may not disregard these findings of fact. We are of the opinion that, upon both questions, there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury and to sustain the general findings in favor of the defendant in error." (p. 520.)

Another good case holding that the determination of proximate cause is a question for the jury, and which also contains a strong and logical analogy to the case at bar, is Filson v. Pacific Express Co. 84 Kan. 614, 114 Pac. 863, where the syllabus reads:

"The owner of an express package failed to call at the express office for it and the agent of the express company placed it in the company's office, which was located in a railroad depot consisting of a frame building, the doors and windows of which were locked. The depot had been used for years for depositing freight and express matter. It was entered during the night by a burglar breaking the glass of one of the windows, and the package with its contents was stolen. The package was a canvas-covered telescope containing moving-picture films. It weighed fifty-five pounds and was valued at $600, and the value was marked on the outside of the package in plain figures. In an action to recover against the company for its loss it was conceded [278] that the liability of the company was that of a warehouseman. Held, that it was a question for the jury to determine from all the evidence and circumstances whether the express company failed to exercise ordinary care, and whether such failure was the proximate cause of the loss." (Syl. ¶ 2.)

In the opinion, Mr. Justice Porter said:

"Whether persons in the exercise of ordinary care would have left it there over night, in a building which could be easily entered by burglars and which the evidence shows had been burglarized at least once before, to the knowledge of the express agent, was, under all the circumstances, a question for the jury.

"It was also for the jury to determine whether the negligence of the company was the proximate cause of the loss. It was the proximate cause if the loss by burglary was the natural and probable consequence of the failure of the company to exercise ordinary care—that is, if it might have been foreseen by ordinary forecast." (p. 618.)

In the still later case (Barnett v. United Kansas Portland Cement Co. 91 Kan. 719, 139 Pac. 484) the same proposition was adhered to, although two dissenting justices urged that the determination of the jury as to which was the remote and which the proximate cause is not necessarily conclusive. If that be a qualification of the general rule, it takes nothing from the strength of appellee's position in this case, for the trial court was satisfied that the negligence of the appellant was the proximate cause of the injury, and so are we.

Among other cases examined in arriving at these conclusions, the following may be noted: Eberhardt v. Glasgow Mut. Telephone Assoc. 91 Kan. 763, 139 Pac. 416; Broseghini v. Sheridan Coal Co. 92 Kan. 113, 139 Pac. 1025; Kleebauer v. Western Fuse, etc., Co. 138 Cal. 497, 71 Pac. 617, 94 Am. St. Rep. 62, 60 L.R.A. 377, 69 Pac. 246; District of Columbia v. Dempsey, 13 App. Cas. (D. C.) 533; Page v. Bucksport, 64 Me. 51, 18 Am. Rep. 239; Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co. 104 Mass. 64; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; Filer v. Smith, 96 Mich. 347, 55 N. W. 1002, 35 Am. St. Rep. 603; Skin v. Reutter, 135 Mich. 57, 97 N. W. 152, 106 Am. St. Rep. 403, 64 L.R.A. 673; Iamurri v. Saginaw [279] City Gas Co. 148 Mich. 27, 111 N. W. 884; Vills v. Cloquet, 119 Minn. 277, 138 N. W. 33; Quigley v. Delaware, etc. Canal Co. 142 Pa. St. 388, 21 Atl. 827, 24 Am. St. Rep. 504; Lowery v. Manhattan R. Co. 99 N. Y. 158, 1 N. E. 608, 52 Am. Rep. 12; Williams v. Koehler, 41 App. Div. 426, 58 N. Y. S. 863; Olson v. Gill Home Invest. Co. 58 Wash. 151, 108 Pac. 140, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 884; Illidge v. Goodwin, 5 C. & P. 190, 24 E. C. L. 272; Dixon v. Bell, 5 M. & S. (Eng.) 198; Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, 41 E. C. L. 422.

The other errors assigned are all incidental to the main question. The fact that the boys were hunting on Sunday, or that they might be trespassers, does not affect the case. The jury found that they were not trespassing; but the damage did not arise from the trespass nor the Sabbath breaking, nor did they contribute in the slightest degree to the accident and its consequences.

No substantial error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.Liability as for Negligence of One Throwing Away Small Quantity of Explosive.

Scope of Note, 345.

Generally, 345.

Proximate Cause, 348.

Scope of Note.

The earlier cases discussing the liability as for negligence of one throwing away a small quantity of explosive are reviewed in the note to Pollard v. Oklahoma City R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1915A 140. This note presents the recent cases on that subject.

The liability of a railroad company to a person other than a servant injured by a railroad torpedo is exhaustively discussed in the note to Mills v. Central of Georgia R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914C 1098.

Generally.

In a number of cases a liability for a personal injury resulting from the act of a person in throwing away, or leaving about or abandoning a small quantity of an explosive has been predicated on the doctrine of attractive nuisance. Vills v. Cloquet, 119 Minn. 277, 138 N. W. 33; Juntti v. Oliver Iron Min. Co. 119 Minn. 518, 138 N. W. 673, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 840; Barnett v. Cliffside Mills, 167 N. C. 576, 83 S. E. 826; Little v. James McCord Co. (Tex.) 151 S. W. 835; Akin v. Bradley Engineering, etc. Co. 48 Wash. 97, 92 Pac. 903, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 586; Crabb v. Wilkins, 59 Wash. 302, 109 Pac. 807; Tibbits v. Spokane, 64 Wash. 570, 117 Pac. 397. See also Wallace v. Matthewson, 143 Ga. 236, 237, 84 S. E. 450; Victor v. Smilanich, 54 Colo. 479, 131 Pac. 392. In Little v. James McCord Co. (Tex.) supra, it appeared that the defendant owned a magazine in which were stored skyrockets, firecrackers, Roman candles, dynamite caps, and other explosives; that the defendant carried from its magazine a quantity of explosives and deposited them in an open lot; that this lot was in a pecan grove near a public highway and possessed peculiar attractions for children of tender years and was a place to which they were accustomed to resort; that the plaintiff, a boy of twelve years, was attracted to the place when the explosives had been left scattered on the ground, and was prompted by his childish impulses to appropriate some of them; and that in attempting to break one of the pieces on a rock, it exploded with great violence and blew off his hand. The court said: "In order to establish a legal liability in a case like this, it is necessary that the evidence be sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the defendant owed the plaintiff a legal duty and had negligently failed to perform it. . . . In the well-known 'turntable cases' it is held that the owner cannot escape liability for a resulting injury if he places on his premises and leaves unguarded dangerous machinery unusually attractive to children, even though the injured child was there without express permission. . . . There is no sound reason for restricting that rule to injuries resulting from unguarded turntables. It is not because the object which furnished the attraction and caused the injury is a turntable, and the owner of the premises a railroad corporation, that the duty of exercising due care to save children from their own indiscretion is imposed in such cases; but the rule is regarded as a salutary requirement which should be enforced for the protection of the lives and limbs of those too young to be held responsible, under all conditions, for their own lack of judgment. Human life and personal safety are the most important objects of governmental protection, and the policy of imposing civil liability upon those whose carelessness or indifference may cause the loss of either is one of the most effective means of inspiring a proper degree of diligence to avoid injurious or fatal accidents resulting from exposure to dangerous agencies and hazardous situations. There was evidence offered upon the trial of this case sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the following facts: That a box containing dangerous explosives was taken by agents of the appellee from its magazines and dumped upon the ground in a lot which was at the time under the management and control of a third party; that this lot, though inclosed and posted, was frequently visited by children, some of whom went there by invitation from the occupants, and a large number of others either as licensees or trespassers; that the chief attraction which caused children to resort to that place was the large number of pecan trees growing thereon, and a desire to gather nuts during the pecan season; that this attraction was so strong that those in charge of the premises were unable to keep children away. If an ordinary turntable may be looked upon as such an unusually attractive object as to impose upon owners the duty of guarding against its use by children, we see no good reason why Roman candles, skyrockets and other explosives made for the purpose of amusing children at Christmas times and on holiday occasions should not also be so regarded. Hence the jury would have been justified in this case in concluding that the defendants had placed upon this lot, to which large numbers of children resorted, dangerous explosives unusually attractive to them. It would seem that these facts are sufficient to show the existence of the legal duty before referred to, and a failure in its performance." In Crabb v. Wilkins, 59 Wash. 302, 109 Pac. 807, it was said, with reference to dynamite caps: "In handling explosives the law imposes upon the operator a high degree of care, and especially so where children are involved. Unfortunate as the results prove, it is undoubtedly true that explosives of this character are exceedingly attractive to small boys, whether on account of the loud noise that follows the concussion, or from a commendable appreciation of the quick and effective results, we know not. But the fact remains that the attraction is so controlling that it must be taken into consideration by people who are using the dangerous explosives in a locality where children congregate." The court held the defendant to be liable for negligence as the facts showed that the plaintiff and some other boys had picked up four dynamite caps on the ground some twenty-five feet from a drill used by the defendant's employees in drilling wells. In Ville v. Cloquet, 119 Minn. 277, 138 N. W. 33, it appeared that the defendant city had constructed a toolhouse near a quarry, which it subsequently abandoned, leaving in it some fuse caps in a box on a shelf, which caps were taken out by a couple of boys who had crawled into the toolhouse and were thrown at a companion, and later the plaintiff's son, while playing around the toolhouse, found one of the caps and proceeded to "flatten it out." The court held that the doctrine of the so-called "turntable" cases was applicable, saying: "Several reasons are urged to support defendant's argument that this doctrine does not apply to the facts in the case at bar. It is urged that the evidence does not justify a conclusion that defendant left the fuse caps in the shed, but we think it does. It is argued that defendant used due care to conceal and guard the fuse caps when it locked the tool shed and fastened the windows. But in this we cannot concur, considering the high degree of care required of defendant respecting the care and custody of such a dangerous explosive, and the easy access to the box of caps through the hole under the shed. It is sought to make a distinction between sticks of dynamite and these fuse caps. But undoubtedly the latter were highly explosive and very dangerous to children playing with them. They were clearly highly attractive, and it was natural to expect that young children whose curiosity or mischievous propensities led them into the shed would seize upon the caps as fine things to make a noise with, or as pretty playthings. It is true that the six-year-old plaintiff had no idea that the cap was explosive, and merely tried to flatten it out, but this does not seem an important feature. It was something new, bright and alluring, and something that was very dangerous in the hands of a six-year-old boy. We think the evidence fully justified the jury in finding that defendant ought to have anticipated that children might enter the shed, get into the box of caps left exposed on a shelf, leave some of them around where they might be found by other children, and that injury might result. In other words, the finding that defendant was negligent is sustained by the evidence."

In other cases a liability has been asserted irrespective of the attractive nuisance doctrine, on the ground that the law imposes a high degree of care on persons having the possession and control of explosives, and especially so where children are involved. Barnett v. Cliffside Mills, 167 N. C. 576, 83 S. E. 826; Folsom-Morris Coal Min. Co. v. De Vork (Okla.) 160 Pac. 64; Crabb v. Wilkins, 59 Wash. 302, 109 Pac. 807; Tibbits v. Spokane, 64 Wash. 570, 117 Pac. 397; Mathis v. Granger Brick, etc. Co. 85 Wash. 634, 149 Pac. 3; Davis v. Wenatchee, 86 Wash. 13, 149 Pac. 337. And see the reported case. In Davis v. Wenatchee, supra, it appeared that the workmen employed by a contractor who was engaged in digging trenches in the city streets for water mains left an untied gunny sack containing some fuse, dynamite, and dynamite caps on the parking strip near the plaintiff's home when they left the ditch and street at five o'clock that day; that the plaintiff and a younger boy spied the sack while playing about the street, opened it and took out one of the caps and a piece of fuse, and thinking to hold it without burning his hand, he inserted the fuse in the dynamite cap and held the cap in his hand, with the result that it exploded and injured him. The court held that the city was liable. In Tibbits v. Spokane, 64 Wash. 570, 117 Pac. 397, it appeared that the plaintiffs were injured by the explosion of certain caps and fuses, claimed to have been left negligently by city employees on the ground near a place where they were making certain excavations. It was held that an instruction that it was "the duty of the defendant and its servants to exercise a high degree of care to prevent anyone, particularly boys of tender years, from finding or getting the possession of such explosives, and particularly so if such explosive appliances were of such a character as to be attractive to boys and to excite their curiosity and cause them to examine, handle, and investigate such explosives," defined the care necessary to be exercised by the defendant, and properly left the jury to say whether the explosives were attractive to children; that while the instruction assumed that they were dangerous, the question whether they were attractive depended on facts which the jury must determine.

In Sandeen v. Tschider, 205 Fed. 252, 123 C. C. A. 456, it appeared that it was necessary for a contractor, constructing and grading a new track for a railroad company, to do some blasting, and that the dynamite was exploded by the use of caps. A large number of persons including children were allowed on the new grade to view the work without objection by the contractor, except when they interfered with the work. After the work was concluded the contractor's foreman left a tin can containing these caps on a bank near some railroad ties; and about three weeks later a boy eleven years of age took one of the caps and tried to remove the inside of it with a safety pin, when it exploded, tearing away part of his hand. It was held that the act of the foreman in leaving the caps where the child could find them, was negligence.

In Sroka v. Halliday (R. I.) 97 Atl. 965, it was held that it was actionable negligence to leave bombs or other explosives in a position where they were liable to be found and exploded by children to their injury.

In Frost v. Topeka, 98 Kan. 641, 161 Pac. 936, it appeared that while the plaintiff's parents were being detained and treated for smallpox in a hospital established, owned and maintained by the city, the plaintiff, a child of nine years, was taken there also but was allowed to play about the hospital grounds. While doing so, he found a sack of dynamite caps which the city employees had used in excavating for the hospital water and sewer systems, located entirely on the hospital grounds, and which they had neglected to remove or render inaccessible. The child, accidentally exploding a cap, was injured. It was held that, inasmuch as the negligence of the city's employees in leaving the dynamite caps where they might be picked up and exploded by the plaintiff was exhibited in connection with the performance by the city of governmental and not proprietary functions, it was not liable. The court said: "While the hospital, with its equipment and grounds, was property of the city, it was property held and maintained in a public and governmental capacity, and not in a private proprietary capacity. The sole object in establishing and maintaining the hospital was to conserve the public health, a purely governmental function exercised under the police power of the state.

The enterprise was public and governmental from its inception, and in doing the work of constructing the building and installing the water and sewer systems the city acted as a mere agency of the state in promoting the general welfare. While the dynamite caps were property of the city, they were mere contributions to the enterprise, the same as building material, water pipe, sewer pipe, and other articles necessary to secure the ultimate end in view. If in performing the work of constructing and equipping the hospital and putting the grounds in condition for occupancy, materials of any kind were used or disposed of in a negligent or unsafe way, the capacity in which the city acted shielded it from pecuniary liability. When construction was completed and maintenance of the institution as a detention hospital was begun, the relation of the city to the project remained the same, and if for any reason the premises were not safe for occupancy by persons detained in the hospital, the same exemption from liability existed. . . . It makes no difference in principle whether the building or the grounds appurtenant to the building be defective, and it makes no difference whether the dangerous agency act by penetration or by concussion. The employees of the city who caused the hospital grounds to be unsafe by negligently failing to remove the portion of the supply of dynamite caps not consumed in blasting may be personally responsible for the consequences of their conduct, but the city is not."

Where there is no evidence imputing negligence to the defendant in leaving a small quantity of explosives on his property or near property which he has used, the defendant cannot be charged with any liability with respect to it. Gralka v. Worth Bros. Co. 245 Pa. St. 467, 91 Atl. 860; Birnbaum v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 249 Pa. St. 238, 94 Atl. 925. However, direct evidence of negligence is not required, but it may be inferred by the jury from the facts and attendant circumstances. Eckart v. Kiel, 128 Minn. 114, 143 N. W. 122; Barnett v. Cliffside Mills, 167 N. C. 576, 83 S. E. 826; Mathis v. Granger Brick, etc. Co. 85 Wash. 634, 149 Pac. 3. In Eckart v. Kiel, supra, it appeared that the defendant had been using dynamite and dynamite caps on his farm, which he later sold to the plaintiff. Some time later, one of the plaintiff's children found a dynamite cap while playing on the ground near the granary door, which he gave to an older brother who kept it for some time, and then undertook to clean out what he thought was dirt in the bottom of it, thereby causing an explosion which injured him. The defendant testified that he had put the package containing the four caps left over after the blasting, in his vest pocket, and two or three days later had taken both the caps and the sticks of dynamite which he had put in an iron kettle in the granary to a hardware store and exchanged them for nails. The court held that the jury might fairly infer that the cap picked up by the plaintiff's son was one of those in the package of four caps last seen in the possession of the defendant, and considering the facts proved, might also fairly infer negligence on the part of the defendant.

Proximate Cause.

As is said in the reported case, the doctrine of remote and proximate cause is well settled, and the difficulty in cases involving the negligence of persons in throwing away or leaving explosives in small quantities where children are likely to find them, does not arise from a dispute as to the principle, but as to its application. The reported case states that the test as to the liability of the wrongdoer, as found in precedents and analogous cases, appears to be: Is the injury or damage the natural and probable consequence of the original negligence?

Thus, if the act of the defendant, or the original cause of the injury, is the principal and proximate cause, the rule is that the defendant will be held answerable for all the damages arising from the natural and probable consequences of his act in either throwing away or leaving small quantities of explosives in a place accessible to children, and that he cannot avoid them by reason of the mere intrusion of an intermediate cause, not amounting to an independent, intervening agency or incident. Vills v. Cloquet, 119 Minn. 277, 138 N. W. 33; Folsom-Morris Coal Min. Co. v. De Vork (Okla.) 160 Pac. 64; Akin v. Bradley Engineering, etc. Co. 48 Wash. 97, 92 Pac. 903, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 586. Mathis v. Granger Brick, etc. Co. 85 Wash. 634, 149 Pac. 3. And see the reported case. In Mathis v. Granger Brick, etc. Co. supra, it appeared that a boy found a dynamite cap which had been negligently left by the defendant near a school house. He lost it from his pocket and it was found by the plaintiff, another boy, who carried it for a few days in a pocket of his overalls, showing it to no one. He did not know what it was. On Saturday the plaintiff's mother washed these overalls and removed the cap, with a large number of other trinkets, from the pockets, placing them on a desk in the sitting room. The plaintiff finding it there, picked it up and undertook to pick the substance out of it with a hair pin, when it exploded injuring him severely. The court said: "We think that when it was shown by positive evidence that these boys found the caps on the premises and in the soil pit, where they were habitually used by the respondent's employees and where they were, from time to time, left for indefinite periods, the evidence indicating that no one in particular was held responsible by the respondent for their care and custody, it was for the jury to say whether or not the caps were left by some of the employees of the respondent where they were found by the boys. In such a case the negligence of the employees is imputed to the master. There can hardly be reasonable doubt that the caps found belonged to the respondent. There can be no doubt that if they did, they would not have been found there had the respondent kept its explosives under lock or securely safeguarded, which was its positive non-delegable duty. There was ample evidence to take the case to the jury on the question of the respondent's negligence." In holding that the acts of the plaintiff's mother did not constitute an intervening cause, the court said further: "The respondent's primary negligence, which we have seen was a question for the jury, consisted in abandoning this cap in such manner that it was likely to fall into irresponsible hands, thus setting in motion a chain of causation from which might have been reasonably anticipated just such an injury as actually resulted. To say that this chain was broken, as a matter of law, by the unwitting failure of the mother to interrupt it, is to lose the logical perspective and take a distorted view of the relative importance of the incidents. It would be to eclipse the duty of one who knows of the dangerous character of an agency to control it, by magnifying the innocent failure of another to imagine a danger of which she had no knowledge, into a positive duty to know and avoid it. It would be to miss entirely the basic principle of the exercise of reasonable care, which measures the duty by the magnitude of the danger reasonably to be anticipated by one possessed of the knowledge necessary to foresee it." In Vills v. Cloquet, 119 Minn. 277, 138 N. W. 33, it appeared that the defendant city had constructed a toolhouse near a quarry which it subsequently abandoned, leaving in it some fuse caps in a box on a shelf under one of the windows. These caps were taken out by a couple of boys who had crawled into the toolhouse and thrown at a companion. Later, the plaintiff's son, while playing around the house, found one of the caps, which were bright and attractive, on the ground, and proceeded to hammer it with a stone to "flatten it out," as he testified, whereupon it exploded injuring him. The court held that the claim that the defendant's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, rested on the proposition that there was an intervening, independent cause, to wit, the act of the boys other than the plaintiff's son in bringing the caps out of the toolhouse and scattering them on the ground, and that this contention was disposed of by the holding that the defendant ought to have anticipated such acts on the part of children and that injury might result, and should have guarded against such an occurrence.

It has been said that the courts should not look too narrowly for independent intervening causes where the negligence is in the use or care of extremely dangerous agencies, such as explosives, and the disastrous results of such negligence might reasonably be anticipated. Mathis v. Granger Brick, etc. Co. 85 Wash. 634, 149 Pac. 3. So it has been held that a person leaving explosives where they are accessible to children, is liable for his negligence, though the injury complained of is brought about by an intervening cause, where the intervening cause is set in motion by his own act. Folsom-Morris Coal Min. Co. v. DeVork (Okla.) 160 Pac. 64. In that case it appeared that the defendant was engaged in coal mining, and in connection therewith maintained a powder magazine or powder house, located on its premises; that the powder was inclosed in large black cans, each of which contained about twenty-five pounds of powder; that the cans were opened by the defendant and the powder emptied therefrom and furnished to its employees; that the cans, still containing small quantities of powder, were thrown out on the ground near and around the powder house; that the place where the cans were thrown after being emptied was unfenced, unprotected, and unguarded; that the plaintiff, who was at the time about twelve years of age, together with other small boys, obtained from the powder cans small quantities of powder, and thereby obtained a quantity of powder which they placed in two cans; that the plaintiff carried away one of the cans containing the powder in his arms, and one of the other boys carried the other can and emptied the powder on the ground, stringing it along for some distance; that the plaintiff attempted to pick up some of the powder so emptied on the ground to put it in the can carried by him; and that while so doing the other boy struck a match and touched it to the powder emptied on the ground, and the powder instantly ignited, and a flash of the fire therefrom entered the powder contained in the can held by the plaintiff in his arms, which instantly exploded. The court held that the action of the defendant in permitting the throwing out of cans containing powder where they were accessible to the plaintiff and other boys was actionable negligence, especially in view of the fact that the "powder monkey" in charge of the powder house was cognizant of the action of the boys in taking the powder, which knowledge must be imputed to the defendant, and that while it was true that the injury complained of was brought about by an intervening cause, the intervening cause was set in motion by the wrongdoing of the defendant in throwing out the cans containing the powder.

Likewise, a person is liable for his negligence in throwing away or leaving explosives in a place where children are liable to pick them up, though the negligence of a third person constitutes a concurrent or contributing cause of injury. Vills v. Cloquet, 119 Minn. 277, 138 N. W. 33. See also Mathis v. Granger Brick, etc. Co. 85 Wash. 634, 149 Pac. 3; Akin v. Bradley Engineering, etc. Co. 48 Wash. 97, 92 Pac. 903, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 586. Thus in the case last cited, it appeared that a corporation engaged in selling mining supplies, among which were dynamite caps, had thrown a large number of these caps back of its place of business, on some vacant ground, through which a pathway ran that was used by large numbers of children going to and from a public school situated near by; that these caps were very attractive to children, and that the school children were in the habit of picking them up and afterwards throwing them against rocks, or in other ways exploding them; that on the way from school one day, the plaintiff picked up several of these caps; that he and another boy discovered some dry batteries in an alley near an automobile garage, and proceeded to make an experiment of touching off the cap with the battery, with the result that the cap exploded and injured the plaintiff's hand. The court held that, if the owner of the dry batteries was guilty of negligence in leaving them where the children could get possession of one, this negligence would not constitute an intervening cause that would relieve the defendant from liability, but was rather a concurrent or contributing cause. The court said: "It is fundamental, of course, that one cannot recover for injuries against another whose act or omission was not, or did not contribute to, the proximate cause of such injury. But it is equally true that, where a negligent act or omission sets in operation a train of occurrences resulting naturally in the injury complained of, such negligent act or omission is deemed to have been the proximate cause, or to have contributed thereto. It seems to be conceded that respondent would have been liable had the boy been injured by exploding the cartridge against a rock or with a hammer. It would seem that any natural, available method which the boy himself, through his inexperience and lack of knowledge, would adopt for the purpose of creating an explosion, would bring the case into the same category as one where the explosion was made by a rock or a hammer. For instance, if the boy had struck a match and exploded the cap with the heat thereof, or had deposited the cartridge upon a hot stove, it would seem, in principle to be the same as if he had exploded it with a hammer or with a battery. An intervening cause, to be a defense in an action of this kind, must ordinarily come from an outside source as an act of God or of some human or other agency, independent of the ignorant and inexperienced conduct or omission of the boy in question. The ignorance and inexperience of this boy, if found as stated by his counsel, relieves him from the charge of contributory negligence. If he knew or suspected that this cartridge would explode when brought in contact with the battery, and was old enough and intelligent or experienced sufficiently to understand that such an explosion would probably do him serious injury, then he would not be entitled to recover. . . . We think that, when the respondent left these dangerous explosives by the wayside where it knew that children, naturally attracted by such things, were constantly passing and repassing and playing therewith, it must be held to have known that such children were liable to cause some of said caps to explode in a manner likely to cause them serious injury, and that the explosion of such a cap by a dry battery in the manner shown herein did not constitute an intervening cause that should relieve respondent from liability. If, as urged by respondent, the owner of these dry batteries was guilty of negligence in leaving them where the children could get possession of one, it seems to us that this negligence would constitute a concurrent or contributing, rather than an intervening, cause. That the immediate agency by which the explosion was occasioned was a dry battery instead of a rock, a hammer, a match, or a coal of fire, is in our opinion a matter of detail that does not change the principle involved or justify a defense under the rule by respondent invoked."

The act of a child in tampering with explosives which have been thrown away or left about has, however, been held to be an independent intervening cause, relieving the original wrongdoer from liability. Jacobs v. New York, etc. R. Co. 212 Mass. 96, 98 N. E. 688, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 41; Carpenter v. Miller, 232 Pa. St. 362, 81 Atl. 439, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932. In the case last cited it appeared that a wholesale dealer in confectons and fireworks had the refuse from his business put into barrels and taken to and deposited on a dumping ground, for which privilege he paid the lessee of the ground—the refuse, as soon as it was deposited becoming the property of the lessee. Out of this refuse, a boy then twelve years of age picked a piece of fireworks known as a "flowerpot," which he carried home and later in the day and after it had become dark, took it to a stone wall and lighted it, whereupon an explosion followed, resulting in injury. The court held that the dealer was not liable, as the boy's own act was the direct, proximate cause of his injuries, saying: "The dumping by the appellee of refuse containing fireworks on a lot where boys gathered to play is the negligence of which the appellant complains. Whether his doing so was negligence is a question upon which we need not pass, as it clearly appeared that the direct, proximate cause of the injuries sustained was something else. Under the uncontradicted testimony, the refuse, as soon as deposited upon the ground, became the property of Ludlow. In addition to receiving a stipulated sum for the privilege of depositing it, whatever was in it became his property as soon as it was deposited on the lot. Counsel for the appellee contends, and with reason, that after the refuse was thus sold to Ludlow, he alone was responsible for what was done with it. But on this we need not dwell. In dumping the refuse on the lot no injury was done to the boy. After it had been dumped on the lot nothing in it injured him there, and nothing in it would have injured him elsewhere if he had left it alone. Instead of doing so he and his companions dug out of it candy and fireworks; but in digging these out no injury was done to any one of them. Nothing done or left undone by the appellee caused injury to the boy on the lot where the alleged negligent act was committed. After taking out the flowerpot he carried it to his home, without informing his parents that he had it, and, without their knowledge, later in the day took it to a stone wall for the purpose of lighting or setting it off. This he did, and the very serious consequences complained of followed from his act. There was nothing unlawful or unusual in appellee's dumping refuse upon the public dumping ground. He did what is and has been constantly done in all thickly settled communities. In all rubbish heaps on dumping grounds there are to be found rusty iron, broken knives, bottles and glass and innumerable other useless articles, always likely to cause injury to boys who may dig them out and handle them, but it has never yet been held that one who thus does what is usual and customary is guilty of any negligence. Though there were unexploded fireworks in the refuse deposited by the appellee, they could have caused no injury unless fire was applied to them, while all the other articles enumerated might have caused injury without any intervening agency. The appellant and his companion might have handled the flowerpot on the premises without the slightest danger of any injury to them unless they lighted it. The injury to young Carpenter was not the immediate consequence of the deposit of the refuse on the dumping ground, but resulted from his independent, intervening act in taking the flowerpot from his home, to which place he had safely carried it, and setting fire to it sometime afterwards. His injury could not reasonably have been contemplated as the result of the appellee's act in placing the rubbish on the lot. The boy's own act was the direct, proximate cause of his injuries."

The rule is that the proven injury must be shown to have been the direct or proximate result of the proven negligence, and that unless the evidence shows such a connection either directly or by fair inference, there can be no recovery. Conley v. Ennis, 170 Ky. 125, 185 S. W. 501. In that case the court reviewed the evidence as follows: "Summarizing the evidence then we have on Tuesday morning Conley's [a contractor engaged in roadway construction] motor house passing the residence of Ennis . . . proceeding along that rough street on an up grade; we find that some three or four squares after passing the Ennis home the rear door to that motor house is swinging open and there is a part of a box of dynamite caps in it; we have three and one-half days later, on Friday afternoon at half past three o'clock, the children finding a part of a box of dynamite caps opposite the Ennis home four or five feet outside of the curb at a place used by persons in the neighborhood for a trash dump; we have a failure of evidence as to the door of the motor house being open when it passed the Ennis home, and we have a failure to trace the dynamite caps found opposite the Ennis home to the motor house or the custody of Conley. In other words, we have the negligence of Conley shown at a point several squares from the Ennis home on Tuesday morning, and on the Friday afternoon thereafter the death of the boy, and the only question in this case is whether by any reasonable inference the boy's death could be said to have occurred as the result of that negligence. There is no evidence that more than a part of one box of caps was at that time stored in the motor house, and the evidence of Miller [a witness] shows that there was still a part of a box of dynamite caps in the motor house three or four squares after it passed the Ennis home." Holding that there could be no recovery, the court said: "The rule has always been, and, as we apprehend, will always be, that the proven injury must be shown to have been the direct or proximate result of the proven negligence, and unless the evidence shows such connection either directly or by fair inference there can be no recovery. . . . Measured by this rule should the plaintiff recover in this action? He has failed to show anything fell out of Conley's wagon as it passed at any point along Western avenue; he has failed to show that the door of the motor house was open at a point any nearer than three or four squares from the place where the caps were found; he has failed to show that there were more than one box of caps in the motor house, and has shown by his own evidence that there was still a box in it several squares after it passed the Ennis home; he has failed to show that the caps found near his home were ever in the motor house or were ever in the possession of Conley; he has shown that three days and one-half elapsed after Conley's motor house passed up Western avenue before the children found the dynamite caps; he has only shown a state of case from which a suspicion might be indulged that the dynamite caps found three and one-half days later had fallen from the motor house; but has signally failed to show such a connection between the dynamite caps found on Friday afternoon and the motor house which passed his home on Tuesday morning as would authorize a fair inference or deduction that the caps fell from it. . . . After a careful and conscientious consideration of the evidence we have reached the conclusion that there was no such connection shown between the boy's death and the negligence of Conley as authorized a submission of the case to the jury."

WILLETT ET AL.

JANECKE.

Washington Supreme Court—May 29, 1915.

85 Wash. 654; 149 Pac. 17.

Receivers — Personal Liability for Attorney's Fees.

Where attorneys were employed by a receiver of an insolvent corporation under an order of the court authorizing such employment, and where the receiver, the attorneys participating, in good faith endeavored to procure a proper allowance of attorneys' fees from the court, and paid over to the attorneys the entire amount allowed by the court, such attorneys cannot hold the receiver personally liable for the value of their services of courts of equity, and in this respect as well as his relations to the court appointed him and the consequent restriction upon his powers, a receiver occupies a somewhat different position from that of an executor or administrator. Strictly, a receiver has no right to incur any liability or in any way hazard the fund in his custody without the consent of the court. . . .

"We cannot conceive that any attorney at law, whose every act must be with full knowledge that he is acting for an officer of the court, will complain that in accepting employment for a receiver he is held to do so with the understanding that his compensation will depend upon the amount that may be allowed him therefor by the court upon the final accounting of the receiver. Any other rule would subject the receiver to expensive litigation after his final accounting and discharge from his trust by the court. We do not mean, however, to be understood as holding that a receiver, while acting as such, cannot make himself personally liable upon his contracts or otherwise, but simply that he will be protected so long as he acts strictly under the orders of the court appointing him."

Counsel for respondent call our attention to, and rely upon, observations made by this court in In re Sullivan, 36 Wash. 217, 78 Pac. 945, as follows:

"The allowance for attorney's fees is not made to the attorney, but to the administrator, as a necessary expenditure incidental to his settlement of the estate. There is no relation between the administrator's attorney and the estate, and he can assert no claim against the estate for his services, but the administrator is himself liable in a suit by the attorney.

[660] These remarks were made in connection with the administration of an estate of a decedent where there was involved nothing but the right of the administrator to an allowance as against the estate. The question of whether the attorney could recover from the administrator more than the amount allowed by the court in the settlement of his account was not there involved. The above quotation from Walsh v. Raymond, pointing out the difference between the powers of administrators and receivers, we think is, in any event, sufficient to show that the remarks of the court in In re Sullivan, would not be controlling here.

We conclude that, under the facts disclosed by this record, the respondents have no right of recovery whatever against appellant personally. The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

Morris, C.J., Mount, Chadwick, and Holcomb, J.J., concur.

NOTE.

Personal Liability of Receiver for Attorney's Fees.

With respect to an executor or administrator the rule seems to be that such a fiduciary is personally liable for the value of the services of an attorney employed by him, and must look to the court for an allowance by way of reimbursement. See the notes to Painter v. Kaiser, 1 Ann. Cas. 765, and Brown v. Quinton, 18 Ann. Cas. 290. See also 11 R. C. L. tit. Executors and Administrators, p. 235. But while the reasons on which that rule is based would appear to be equally applicable to a contract by a receiver, the few cases which have passed on the subject are in accord in holding that an attorney employed by a receiver must look for his compensation to the allowance which may be made by the court and cannot hold the receiver personally liable. Walsh v. Raymond, 58 Conn. 251, 20 Atl. 464, 18 Am. St. Rep. 264. See also State v. Edgefield, etc. R. Co. 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 92. And see the reported case. Thus in the case first cited the court said: "We cannot conceive that any attorney at law, whose every act must be with full knowledge that he is acting for an officer of the court, will complain that in accepting employment for a receiver he is held to do so with the understanding that his compensation will depend upon the amount that may be allowed him therefor by the court upon the final accounting of the receiver." And in State v. Edgefield, etc. R. Co. 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 92, the court said that the solicitors who were the petitioners must look first to the receiver who employed them, and he would, no doubt, have the right to pay his counsel fees out of any funds that might come to his hands as receiver, and would be entitled to a credit for the same on settling his accounts as receiver. In the case of In re Trueman, L. R. 14 Eq. (Eng.) 278, it was held that a liquidator was not personally liable to a solicitor for services rendered by him in the liquidation. The court said: "It is clear to me, beyond the possibility of doubt, that he never does incur any liability; that it is not his intention, nor the intention of any solicitor whom he employs in that business, ever to assert that there did exist any personal liability between them. The business of the liquidator is to realize and administer the assets: if there are enough, well and good; if not enough, people must go unpaid. The solicitor knows that that is the end and object of the appointment of the voluntary liquidator. The liquidator has no interest in the matter, except simply for his remuneration, which is to come afterwards; he has no right or interest in any particle of the assets he is to realize, receive, and distribute, and to do the best he can with; and the solicitor undertakes the employment with a perfect knowledge on the subject." See to the same effect In re Anglo-Moravian Hungarian Junction R. Co. 1 Ch. (Eng.) 130, 45 L. J. Ch. 115.

On the other hand where the services rendered by an attorney are such as the receiver should perform in person, he is liable personally to the attorney. Henry v. Henry, 103 Ala. 582, 15 So. 916. In that case it was held that a receiver who employed attorneys to advise and assist him in performing duties which he was supposed to perform himself must pay them himself. The court said: "A trustee has no authority to employ attorneys, at the expense of the estate, to perform the ordinary duties of the trust or office which any ordinarily competent business man is presumed to be capable of performing. Those are his duties, and he is paid for them. It is for services requiring special legal skill that he will be allowed counsel fees."

In Dalliba v. Winschell, 11 Idaho 364, 82 Pac. 107, 114 Am. St. Rep. 267, it was held that a receiver who had without authority employed an attorney was not entitled to any allowance for attorney's fees and that a charge of that kind must be borne by him individually and out of his private estate. The court said: "He has never at any time, so far as it appears from this record, been authorized to employ an attorney in the administration of his office, nor does it appear that he has ever had occasion for an attorney other than in presenting this account and securing an order and judgment allowing the same, and for such services the estate should not be charged." See to the same effect Wilkinson v. Washington Trust Co. 102 Fed. 28, 42 C. C. A. 140.

In Klebsch v. Siedler, 7 Misc. 144, 27 N. Y. S. 417, it appeared that the plaintiff was the attorney for a brickworks company and that when the defendant was appointed receiver of the company the plaintiff continued to render him professional and other services. The court said: "All of the transactions between the parties had reference to the receivership and the management of its property, no personal or private interest of the receiver being involved; but he contracted personally with the plaintiff, and is liable in a personal action."

EX PARTE UNITED STATES.

United States Supreme Court—December 4, 1916.

242 U. S. 27; 37 S. Ct. 72.

Mandamus — To Court — Exceeding Jurisdiction.

Mandamus is the proper remedy where a federal district court has exceeded its power by ordering that the execution of a sentence to imprisonment imposed by it upon a plea of guilty be suspended indefinitely during good behavior upon considerations wholly extraneous to the conviction.

Same.

A rule to show cause why mandamus should not issue where a federal district court has exceeded its power by ordering that the execution of a sentence to imprisonment imposed by it upon a plea of guilty be suspended indefinitely during good behavior upon considerations wholly extraneous to the legality of the conviction is properly directed to the judge, to compel the vacation of the order of suspension, rather than to the clerk of the court, to compel him to issue a commitment.

Sentence and Punishment — Suspension of Sentence.

A federal district court exceeds its power by ordering that the execution of a sentence to imprisonment imposed by it upon a plea of guilty be suspended indefinitely during good behavior upon considerations wholly extraneous to the legality of the conviction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Action for mandamus. United States, petitioner, and John M. Killits, District Judge, respondent. The facts are stated in the opinion. WRIT GRANTED.

Attorney General Gregory, Assistant Attorney General Wallace and Solicitor General Davis for United States.

Edwin J. Marshall for respondent.

John M. Killits, in propria persona, also for respondent.

Richard W. Hale, Frank W. Grinnell, Homer Folks and Charles L. Chute as amici curiae.

[37] WHITE, C. J.—The accused pleading guilty to an indictment charging him in several counts with embezzling the money of a national bank of which he was an officer and making false entries in its books in violation of § 5209, Revised Statutes (5 Fed. St. Ann. 145) was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years, the shortest term which under the statute could have been imposed upon him. At once at his request over the objection of the United States District Attorney the court ordered "that the execution of the sentence be, and it is hereby suspended during the good behavior of the defendant, and for the purpose of this case this term of this court is kept open for five years." The United States moved to set this order aside on the ground that as it was not a mere temporary suspension of the sentence to enable legal proceedings pending or contemplated to revise it to be taken, or application for pardon to be made, or any other legal relief against the sentence to be resorted to, but on the contrary as it was a permanent suspension based upon considerations extraneous to the legality of the conviction or the duty to enforce the sentence, the order of suspension was void as it was equivalent to a refusal to carry out the statute. The motion was denied. In the opinion giving its reasons for so doing the court, conceding that the suspension was permanent, stated the [38] general considerations which it deemed it was required to take into view in deciding whether the sentence should be enforced, conceding the legality of the conviction and sentence and their finality, as follows:

"Modern notions respecting the treatment of law breakers abandon the theory that the imposition of the sentence is solely to punish, and now the best thought considers three elements properly to enter into the treatment of every criminal case after conviction. Punishment in some measure is still the object of sentence, but affecting its extent and character we consider the effect of the situation upon the individual as tending to reform him from or to confirm him in a criminal career, and also the relation his case bears to the community in the effect of the disposition of it upon others of criminal tendencies."

After pointing out the peculiar aptitude possessed by a trial judge for the appreciation of such conditions and the imperative duty which rested upon such judge to consider and weigh the matters stated and to determine as an inherent attribute of judicial power whether a permanent suspension of the term of imprisonment fixed by the statute should be ordered, the circumstances upon which it was concluded that a permanent suspension should be directed were stated in part as follows:

"We took into account the peculiar circumstances under which his crime was committed, having regard to the temptations which from time to time encompassed him, and his personal necessities, and the purposes for which his appropriations were made. Also, the fact that his friends made his employers whole, and that otherwise he had so commended himself to the favor of his employers suffering by his crime, that they at all times as well as now evince a disposition to forgive his abuse of their confidence, and to support him against the punishment which the law provides. We find that otherwise than for this crime, his disposition, character and habits have so strongly commended [39] him to his friends, acquaintances and persons of his faith, that they are unanimous in the belief that the exposure and humiliation of his conviction are a sufficient punishment, and that he can be saved to the good of society if nothing further is done with him."

After further elaborating considerations of a like nature and stating very many circumstances confirming those mentioned, to leave no room for doubt that its action was intended to be permanent and was based alone on the extraneous circumstances stated, the court said:

"Passing now to the concrete case, we observe for the benefit of the United States that nothing exists in this case which moved the court to suspend the execution of sentence to prevent 'an abuse of the court's process, or to prevent an injustice being done to the defendant' so far as it may be said that abstract justice required defendant to suffer for his crime. However, we considered the defendant from many standpoints to be as worthy of the benefit of the discretion to suspend the execution of his sentence as any other convict upon whom that favor has hitherto been bestowed."

Following a written demand which was thereafter made upon the clerk to issue a commitment which was refused by him on the ground that the sentence had been suspended and the further refusal of the judge to direct the clerk to issue such commitment, the United States sought and obtained a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not be awarded directing the judge to vacate the order of suspension, under which the subject is now before us for consideration.

The remedial appropriateness of the writ of mandamus is at the threshold questioned, but we dispose of the subject by a mere reference to adjudged cases conclusively establishing the want of foundation for the contention. Ex p. Bradley, 7 Wall. 364, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 214; Matter of L. etc. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 8 Pet. 291, 8 U. S. (L. ed.) 949; In re Winn, 213 U. S. [40] 458; In re Metropolitan Trust Co. 218 U. S. 312, 31 S. Ct. 18, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 1051; Ex p. Metropolitan Water Co. 220 U. S. 539, 31 S. Ct. 600, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 575. In addition, however, it is urged that as the right to resort to the extraordinary remedy by mandamus must rest upon the assumption that the order of suspension was absolutely void, therefore the rule for the writ should have been directed not against the judge, but against the clerk to compel him to issue the commitment. But we pass from its consideration, as we are of opinion that its want of merit will be completely demonstrated by the slightest appreciation of the judicial duties of the court below and the ministerial relation of the clerk of the court to the same.

The return to the rule and the statement in support of the same lucidly portray the contentions involved in the question of power to be decided and the subject in all its aspects has been elaborately discussed, not only by the printed arguments of the parties, but in addition light has been thrown on the general question by an argument submitted by the New York State Probation Commission, explaining the statutory system of parole prevailing in that State, and by an able argument presented by members of the Bar of the First Circuit in behalf of a practice of mitigating or pretermittting, when deemed necessary, the statutory punishment for crimes which it is declared has prevailed in the United States courts in that circuit for many years.

The argument on behalf of the respondent concedes that the order of suspension was permanent and absolutely removed the accused from the operation of the punishment provided by the statute; and it is further conceded that a suspension of this character was the equivalent of an absolute and permanent refusal to impose under the statute any sentence whatever. However absolute may be the right thus asserted, it is nevertheless said it is not without limitation, since it may not be capriciously called [41] into play. Passing the question whether this assumed restriction is not in the nature of things imaginary as the result of the scope of the authority asserted, let us come to dispose of the contention made by examining the propositions relied upon to sustain it.

They are: 1. That the right to refuse to impose a sentence fixed by statute or to refuse to execute such a sentence when imposed, is a discretion inhering in the judicial power to try and punish violations of the criminal law. 2. That even if there be doubt on this subject as an original proposition, such doubt is dispelled as the right was recognized and frequently exerted at common law. 3. That the power claimed has also been recognized by decisions of state courts and of United States courts of original jurisdiction to such an extent that the doctrine is now to be considered as not open to controversy. 4. That whatever may be the possibility of dispute as to this last view, at least it cannot be denied that in both the state and federal courts, over a very long period of time, the power here asserted has been exercised often with the express, and constantly with the tacit, approval of the administrative officers of the state and federal governments, and has been also tacitly recognized by the inaction of the legislative department during the long time the practice has prevailed, to such an extent that the authority claimed has in practice become a part of the administration of criminal law both state and federal, not subject to be now questioned or overthrown because of mere doubts of the theoretical accuracy of the conceptions upon which it is founded.

1. The contention as to inherent judicial power.

Indisputably under our constitutional system the right to try offenses against the criminal laws and upon conviction to impose the punishment provided by law is judicial, and it is equally to be conceded that in exerting the powers vested in them on such subject, courts inherently possess [42] ample right to exercise reasonable, that is, judicial, discretion to enable them to wisely exert their authority. But these concessions afford no ground for the contention as to power here made, since it must rest upon the proposition that the power to enforce begets inherently a discretion to permanently refuse to do so. And the effect of the proposition urged upon the distribution of powers made by the Constitution will become apparent when it is observed that indisputable also is it that the authority to define and fix the punishment for crime is legislative and includes the right in advance to bring within judicial discretion, for the purpose of executing the statute, elements of consideration which would be otherwise beyond the scope of judicial authority, and that the right to relieve from the punishment, fixed by law and ascertained according to the methods by it provided, belongs to the executive department.

The proposition might well be left with the demonstration which results from these considerations, but the disregard of the Constitution which would result from sustaining the proposition is made if possible plainer by considering that, if it be that the plain legislative command fixing a specific punishment for crime is subject to be permanently set aside by an implied judicial power upon considerations extraneous to the legality of the conviction, it would seem necessarily to follow that there could be likewise implied a discretionary authority to permanently refuse to try a criminal charge because of the conclusion that a particular act made criminal by law ought not to be treated as criminal. And thus it would come to pass that the possession by the judicial department of power to permanently refuse to enforce a law would result in the destruction of the conceded powers of the other departments and hence leave no law to be enforced.

2. The contention as to support for the proposition at common law.

[43] The common law is thus stated in Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol. 2, chap. 58, p. 412:

"Reprieves or stays of judgment or execution are of three kinds, viz:

"I. Ex mandato regis. . . .

"II. Ex arbitrio judicis. Sometimes the judge reprieves before judgment, as where he is not satisfied with the verdict, or the evidence is uncertain, or the indictment insufficient, or doubtful whether within clergy; and sometimes after judgment, if it be a small felony, tho out of clergy, or in order to a pardon or transportation. Crompt. Just. 22, b. and these arbitrary reprieves may be granted or taken off by the justices of gaol delivery, altho their sessions be adjourned or finished, and this by reason of common usage. Dy. 205 a.

"III. Ex necessitate legis, which is in case of pregnancy, where a woman is convict of felony or treason."

Blackstone thus expresses it:

"The only other remaining ways of avoiding the execution of the judgment are by a reprieve or a pardon; whereof the former is temporary only, the latter permanent.

"I. A reprieve, from reprendre, to take back, is the withdrawing of a sentence of an interval of time; whereby the execution is suspended. This may be, first, ex arbitrio judicis; either before or after judgment; as, where the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, or the evidence is suspicious, or the indictment is insufficient, or he is doubtful whether the offence be within clergy; or sometimes if it be a small felony, or any favourable circumstances appear in the criminal's character, in order to give room to apply to the crown for either an absolute or conditional pardon. These arbitrary reprieves may be granted or taken off by the justices of gaol delivery, although their session be finished, and their commission expired; but this rather by common usage, than of strict right.

[44] "Reprieve may also be ex necessitate legis: as, where a woman is capitally convicted, and pleads her pregnancy; though this is no cause to stay the judgment, yet it is to respite the execution till she be delivered. This is a mercy dictated by the law of nature, in favorem proles." (Book IV. ch. xxxi, pp. 394-395.)

While it may not be doubted under the common law as thus stated that courts possessed and asserted the right to exert judicial discretion in the enforcement of the law to temporarily suspend either the imposition of sentence or its execution when imposed to the end that pardon might be procured or that a violation of law in other respects might be prevented, we are unable to perceive any ground for sustaining the proposition that at common law the courts possessed or claimed the right which is here insisted upon. No elaboration could make this plainer than does the text of the passages quoted. It is true that, owing to the want of power in common law courts to grant new trials and to the absence of a right to review convictions in a higher court, it is we think to be conceded: (a) That both suspensions of sentence and suspensions of the enforcement of sentence, temporary in character, were often resorted to on grounds of error or miscarriage of justice which under our system would be corrected either by new trials or by the exercise of the power to review. (b) That not infrequently, where the suspension either of the imposition of a sentence or of its execution was made for the purpose of enabling a pardon to be sought or bestowed, by a failure to further proceed in the criminal cause in the future, although no pardon had been sought or obtained, the punishment fixed by law was escaped. But neither of these conditions serves to convert the mere exercise of a judicial discretion to temporarily suspend for the accomplishment of a purpose contemplated by law into the existence of an arbitrary judicial power to permanently refuse to enforce the law.

[45] And we can deduce no support for the contrary contention from the rulings in 2 Dyer, 165a, 205a and 235a, since those cases but illustrate the exercise of the conceded, reasonable, discretionary power to reprieve to enable a lawful end to be attained. Nor from the fact that common law courts possessed the power by recognizances to secure good behavior, that is, to enforce the law, do we think any support is afforded for the proposition that those courts possessed the arbitrary discretion to permanently decline to enforce the law. The cases of Rex v. Hart, 30 How. St. Tr. 1344, and Reg. v. Dunn, 12 Q. B. 1026, 64 E. C. L. 1026, 1041, certainly do not tend to so establish, since they simply manifest the exertion of the power of the courts after a conviction and the suffering of the legal penalty to exact from the convicted person a bond for his good behavior thereafter.

3. The support for the power asserted claimed to be derived from the adjudication of state and federal courts.

Coming first to the state courts, undoubtedly there is conflict in the decisions. The area, however, of conflict will be narrowed by briefly stating and contrasting the cases. We shall do so by referring chronologically to the cases denying the power, and then to those relied upon to establish it.

In 1838 the Supreme Court of North Carolina in State v. Bennett, 20 N. C. 170, was called upon to decide whether a trial court had the right to permanently remit upon condition a part of a criminal sentence fixed by statute. The court said:

"We know that a practice has prevailed to some extent of inflicting fines with the provision that they should be diminished or remitted altogether upon matter thereafter to be done, or shown to the Court by the person convicted. But we can find no authority in law for this practice, and feel ourselves bound, upon this first occasion when it is brought judicially to our notice, to declare it illegal."

[46] In 1860 in People v. Morrisette, 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 118, an accused after pleading guilty asked a suspension of sentence and to be then discharged from custody. The court said:

"I am of the opinion the court does not possess the power to suspend sentence indefinitely in any case. As I understand the law, it is the duty of the court, unless application be made for a new trial, or a motion in arrest of judgment be made for some defect in the indictment, to pronounce judgment upon every prisoner convicted of crime by a jury, or who pleads guilty. An indefinite suspension of the sentence prescribed by law is a quasi pardon, provided the prisoner be discharged from imprisonment. No court in the state has any pardoning power. That power is vested exclusively in the governor."

In People v. Brown, 54 Mich. 15, 19 N. W. 571, in deciding that no power to permanently suspend a sentence existed, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Cooley, the court said:

"Now it is no doubt competent for a criminal court, after conviction, to stay for a time its sentence; and many good reasons may be suggested for doing so; such as to give opportunity for a motion for a new trial or in arrest, or to enable the judge to better satisfy his own mind what the punishment ought to be: Com. v. Dowdican's Bail, 115 Mass. 133; but it was not a suspension of judgment of this sort that was requested or desired in this case; it was not a mere postponement; it was not delay for any purpose of better advising the judicial mind what ought to be done; but it was an entire and absolute remission of all penalty and the excusing of all guilt. In other words, what was requested of the judge was that he should take advantage of the fact that he alone was empowered to pass sentence, and, by postponing indefinitely the performance of this duty indirectly but to complete effect grant to the respondent a pardon for his crime."

And, considering the doctrine as to the want of power [47] thus expounded from the point of view of the common law and of every argument here relied upon, state courts have in the cases which are in the margin in careful opinions denied the existence of the power now claimed.¹

The cases to the contrary are these, omitting one in a court of original jurisdiction in Massachusetts referred to by counsel but in which there is no written opinion:

In 1874 in Com. v. Dowdican's Bail, 115 Mass. 133, the right in a criminal case "to lay the case on file" and postpone the sentence was sustained, the court declaring that the practice had long existed, and was recognized by statutes one of which regulated the granting of parole by courts in liquor cases.

[48] The case just cited was approvingly referred to in Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 Atl. 954, and declared to express the practice long prevailing in New Hampshire.

In 1894, in People ex rel. Forsyth v. Monroe County, 141 N. Y. 288, 36 N. E. 386, 23 L.R.A. 856 in holding that a trial court had power to permanently suspend a sentence for reasons dehors the legality of the conviction, it was declared that such power existed at common law and hence prevailed in the State, this being supported by a quotation from Hale's Pleas of the Crown. In addition it was said, referring to a state parol statute enacted subsequent to the conviction, that such statute, while it conferred no new or other power than that possessed at common law, nevertheless imposed the duty to see to it that the power was not lost to impose future punishment after the release if the condition of suspension was violated.

In the cases cited in the margin the power was upheld upon the rulings in Com. v. Dowdican's Bail, supra, and the Forsyth case, supra, or because of a practice long prevailing.¹

Leaving aside the question of the asserted duty to sustain the doctrine because of the long established practice, [49] which we shall hereafter consider, we think it clear that the long and settled line of authority to which we have previously referred denying the existence of the power is in no way weakened by the rulings which lie at the basis of the cases relied upon to the contrary. In the first place, on the face of the opinion in Com. v. Dowdican's Bail, supra, it would seem certain that that case treated the power as being brought by the state legislation which was referred to within the domain of reasonable discretion, since by the effect of that legislation the right to exert such power, if not directly authorized, was at least by essential implication sanctioned by the state law. In the second place, in so far as the Forsyth case, supra, is concerned and its declaration as to what was the common law upon the subject, the error thus fallen into is not only demonstrated by what we have said as to the common law, but is additionally shown by the fact that the quotation from Hale's Pleas of the Crown made in the opinion contains clauses supporting the opinion expressed as to the common law when in fact the clauses in question, it would seem, were by some error of citation mistakenly attributed to Hale. We say this because the clauses referred to and attributed to Hale in the quotation are not found in any edition of the Pleas of the Crown which we have been able to examine, and it is stated by counsel for the United States that after diligent search no passage containing the clauses has been discovered, and the existence of any edition of the work containing them is not pointed out by opposing counsel. But whether this be well founded or not, as the conclusion concerning the common law which the case expressed is we think obviously unsound, we are unable on the authority of such a mistaken view to disregard the long established and sound rule laid down in the many state cases which we have quoted.

So far as the courts of the United States are concerned, [50] it suffices to say that we have been referred to no opinion maintaining the asserted power, and on the contrary in the opinion in the only case in which the subject was considered it was expressly decided the power was wanting. U. S. v. Wilson, 46 Fed. 748 (1891). It is true that in the District of Columbia the existence of the power was maintained. Miller v. U. S. 41 App. (D. C.) 52 (1913). But the unsoundness of the grounds upon which the conclusion was based is demonstrated by what we have previously said; and aside from this, as the subject was covered by an Act of Congress conferring power of parole (Act of July 25, 1910, 36 Stat. 864), the case requires no further consideration.

4. The duty to recognize the power as lawful because of its exertion in practice by the state and federal courts and the implications arising therefrom.

There is no doubt that in some States, without reference to probation legislation or an affirmative recognition of any doctrine supporting the power, it was originally exerted and the right to continue to do so came to be recognized solely as the result of the prior practice. State v. Osborne, Warden, 79 N. J. Eq. 430, 82 Atl. 424.

As to the courts of the United States, in one of the circuits, the first, especially in the Massachusetts district, it is admitted the practice has in substance existed for probably sixty years as the result of a system styled "laying the case on file." The origin of this system is not explained, but it is stated in the brief supporting the practice that courts of the United States have considered the existing state laws as to probation and have endeavored in a certain manner to conform their action thereto. It is true also, that in the courts of the United States, sometimes in one or more districts in a circuit and sometimes in other circuits, in many instances the power here asserted was exerted, it would seem without any question, there being no objection raised by the representatives of [51] the United States; indeed it is said that in Ohio where the power, as we have seen, was recognized as existing, it was exerted by Mr. Justice Matthews of this court when sitting at circuit, and there and elsewhere, it is pointed out, the power was also exerted in some instances by other judges then or subsequently members of this court. But yet it is also true that, numerous as are the instances of the exertion of the power, the practice was by no means universal, many United States judges, even in a district where the power had been exerted, on a change of incumbency persistently refusing to exert the power on the ground that it was not possessed. Indeed so far was this the case that we think it may be said that the exertion of the power under the circumstances stated was intermittent and was not universal but partial.

As amply shown by the case before us, we think also it is apparent that the situation thus described was brought about by the scrupulous desire of judges not to abuse their undoubted discretion as to granting new trials, and yet to provide a remedy for conditions in cases where a remedy was called for in the interest of the administration of the criminal law itself, as well as by the most obvious considerations of humanity and public well being,—conditions arising in the nature of things from the state of proof in cases coming before them which could not possibly have been foreseen and taken into consideration by the law-making mind in fixing in advance the penalty to be imposed for a particular crime. And the force of this conclusion will become more manifest by considering that nowhere except sporadically was any objection made to the practice by the prosecuting officers of the United States, who indeed it is said not infrequently invoked its exercise. Albeit this is the case, we can see no reason for saying that we may now hold that the right exists to continue a practice which is inconsistent with the Constitution, since its exercise in the very nature of things [52] amounts to a refusal by the judicial power to perform a duty resting upon it and, as a consequence thereof, to an interference with both the legislative and executive authority as fixed by the Constitution. The fact that it is said in argument that many persons, exceeding two thousand, are now at large who otherwise would be imprisoned as the result of the exertion of the power in the past, and that misery and anguish and miscarriage of justice may come to many innocent persons by now declaring the practice illegal, presents a grave situation. But we are admonished that no authority exists to cure wrongs resulting from a violation of the Constitution in the past, however meritorious may have been the motive giving rise to it, by sanctioning a disregard of that instrument in the future. On the contrary, so far as wrong resulting from an attempt to do away with the consequences of the mistaken exercise of the power in the past is concerned, complete remedy may be afforded by the exertion of the pardoning power; and so far as the future is concerned, that is, the causing of the imposition of penalties as fixed to be subject, by probation legislation or such other means as the legislative mind may devise, to such judicial discretion as may be adequate to enable courts to meet by the exercise of an enlarged but wise discretion the infinite variations which may be presented to them for judgment, recourse must be had to Congress whose legislative power on the subject is in the very nature of things adequately complete.

While the conclusions just stated inevitably exact that the rule which is before us be made absolute and that the mandamus issue, nevertheless we are of opinion that the exceptional conditions which we have described require that we exercise that reasonable discretion with which we are vested to temporarily suspend the issue of the writ, so as to afford ample time for executive clemency or such other action as may be required to meet the situation. [53] And for this purpose the issue of the writ will be stayed until the end of this term, unless the United States otherwise requests, when it will go as a matter of course.

Rule made absolute.

NOTE.

In the reported case the federal supreme court passes for the first time on the much mooted question whether a trial court has the power to suspend the operation of a sentence imposed on a conviction of crime or the imposition of such a sentence. Holding that no such power exists, the court discusses serially the grounds on which the power was asserted, viz.: (1) That it is an inherent judicial power; (2) that it is recognized and exercised at common law; (3) that it is established by a long course of judicial recognition; and (4) that it is sanctioned by long practice in the trial courts and by the acquiescence of the administrative officers of the government in its exercise. The inherent nature of the power and its practice at common law the court denies; the decisions it finds to be conflicting, and those upholding the power it considers to have been decided on erroneous principles. As to the sanction of usage, the conclusion of the court is summed up in these words: "But we are admonished that no authority exists to cure wrongs resulting from violation of the Constitution in the past, however meritorious may have been the motive giving rise to it, by sanctioning a disregard of that instrument in the future."

The particular order under consideration in the reported case is held to amount to a permanent refusal to impose sentence, and the validity of a mere postponement of the imposition of sentence which does not contemplate a possible permanent liberation of the convicted person without punishment is not settled by the decision.

The earlier cases passing on the power of a court to suspend sentence in a criminal case are reviewed in the notes to the following cases: St. Hilaire, Petitioner, 8 Ann. Cas. 385; Tanner v. Wiggins, 14 Ann. Cas. 718; State v. Abbott, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1189; and Ex p. Clendenning, 132 Am. St. Rep. 628.

SMITH.

Kansas Supreme Court—January 9, 1915.

94 Kan. 6; 145 Pac. 880.

Witnesses — Transaction with Person Since Deceased — Evidence at Former Trial.

In an action to recover possession of certain real estate on the ground that a deed therefor had been procured by fraud and that the defendant took his title with notice of such fraud the plaintiff testified to transactions and communications had personally by her with one of the defendant's grantors who was charged with the fraud, such grantor being present as an attorney in the case. At a subsequent trial, such grantor having died, the plaintiff was, on the defendant's objection, precluded from testifying to the matters covered by such former testimony, and thereupon offered in evidence the stenographer's transcript thereof. Held, that an objection thereto, on the grounds of incompetency and because it concerned transactions and communications had personally with a deceased grantor from whom the defendant claimed title was properly overruled.

[See note at end of this case.]

Evidence — Testimony at Former Trial.

The statute permitting the use of the stenographer's transcript of testimony (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 2407) does not restrict such use to the limitations which attach to a deposition under sections 337 and 358 of the Civil Code.

Trial — Election between Defenses — Assertion of Title from Two Sources.

The defendant claimed title by virtue of his purchase, and also claimed the right to possession by reason of having paid off certain incumbrances which had been placed thereon by the plaintiff. Upon motion of the plaintiff the defendant, over his protest, was required to elect between these defenses and elected to stand upon his claim of title. At a subsequent trial he was held bound by such previous election. Held, that the two defenses are not inconsistent and the election was improperly required, and for that reason as well as because it was compulsory the defendant should not have been held bound thereby.

Estates — Merger — Purchaser Paying Incumbrance.

Such payment did not as a matter of law work a merger of the interests of the mortgagees and the owner—merger under the circumstances being optional with the owner.

Subrogation — Purchaser Paying Mortgage — Rights against Holder of Paramount Title.

Although it was determined that the defendant took his title with notice of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry leading to knowledge of the fraud of one of his grantors so that he must yield up possession and lose what he paid for the land, still having paid off certain mortgages placed thereon by the plaintiff the latter cannot oust him from possession until she has accounted to him for the amount thus paid, his right of subrogation being similar to that of a mortgagee in possession and based upon the same principles of equity and fair dealing.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Greenwood county: AYRES, Judge.

Action by Emelia New et al., plaintiffs, against J. A. Smith, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

T. A. Kramer for appellant.

John Stowell, Robert H. Clogston, Lew E. Clogston, E. D. Woodburn, P. T. Woodburn and A. E. Crane for appellees.

[7] WEST, J.—This is in form an action in ejectment to recover title and possession of a two-hundred-and-forty-acre tract of land in Greenwood county. The defendant in his answer denies the allegations of the petition and admits his possession of the real estate. Beneath the surface of these pleadings the real issue is the validity of a conveyance from the plaintiff, Emelia New, to E. C. Schultz, the wife of James Schultz, formerly an attorney at Eureka, and a conveyance by E. C. Schultz and husband to the defendant, J. A. Smith, the claim of the plaintiff being that her deed was procured by the fraud of James Schultz, and that J. A. Smith took with knowledge or with notice of sufficient facts to have put him upon inquiry leading to knowledge of such fraudulent transaction. When the case was reached for trial the defendant's counsel, in his statement to the jury, said, among other things, that his client, Smith, took his deed in good faith, having paid good money for it, and went into possession, [8] and afterwards made improvements and paid the taxes; that he paid off the three mortgages upon the land out of his own funds; whereupon the plaintiff moved that the defendant be required to elect whether he would rely upon his claim of title or upon his claim of being a mortgagee in possession, and being required so to do the defendant under protest elected to stand upon the former. At a subsequent trial the court ruled that he was bound by his previous election. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment thereon the defendant appeals, and assigns many alleged errors touching rulings upon the admission of evidence in giving and refusing instructions, in requiring the defendant to elect, and in refusing to consider his rights as a mortgagee in possession. Upon the last trial the plaintiff was called as a witness and asked if after she was brought to Eureka under arrest for the murder of her former husband she saw James Schultz, and upon objection was forbidden to state what conversation she had with him. One of the plaintiff's counsel testified that before the former trial Mrs. New's testimony was taken, and that on that trial Mr. Schultz was present in the court room and appeared as one of the attorneys in the case; that Mr. Smith, the defendant, was also present at that time; that Mr. Schultz was not sworn and did not testify on that trial. Then the counsel offered a transcript of this testimony in which the witness stated that she saw Mr. Schultz the day she was brought to Eureka under arrest; that he came to visit her and said a few words; that after she was taken to the jail at Wichita Mr. Schultz visited her there about three times, during one of which visits she signed a paper, which he said was to protect her property, but she did not know at the time what the paper was; that he called Mary Williams in the hall to come in and sign the paper. There was a tall slender man there. Mr. Schultz then said, "You signed this paper, Mrs. New?" to which she answered, "Yes." That she at no time made an agreement with him that he was [9] to have her farm if he would defend her in the criminal case or had any agreement as to what she was to pay him for his services. When this transcript was offered in evidence Mr. Schultz was no longer alive, and the defendant contends that it was error to admit this testimony, and that under the statute which provides that the transcript of the stenographer's notes may be introduced in evidence under like circumstances and with like effect as the deposition of the witness, Mrs. New, being present in court could not have testified by deposition, and that it was not competent because in respect to a transaction had personally with a deceased person prohibited by section 320 of the code as amended by chapter 229 of the Laws of 1911.

The defendant offered in evidence the record of all mortgages that were on the real estate when deeded to Mrs. Schultz and to the defendant; also assignments, releases and foreclosure proceedings concerning them, and offered to show that such mortgages were paid by the defendant. These were excluded from consideration on the theory that he was bound by his former election to stand on his claim of title.

It is earnestly contended by the defendant that he not only had a right to have this evidence received and considered, but that his payment of the mortgages with his own money gave him the right to be subrogated to that extent and to be treated as a mortgagee in possession. To this the plaintiff replies that having procured the land by fraud, or rather that having taken it with notice of the fraud by which Schultz procured it to be conveyed to his wife, the defendant is barred from consideration as a mortgagee in possession.

The matter of election must be determined by the rightfulness of the order requiring it in the first place, for it was then made under compulsion and protest, and hence the defendant could not be held bound by it on a subsequent trial on the mere ground that having once elected he must stand by such election. The very [10] word signifies a free choice, and an election by compulsion is an anomaly. (3 Words & Phrases, p. 2336.) An election which involves no freedom of choice is known as Hobson's choice, which is defined as "A choice without an alternative." (Webster's New International Dictionary, 1911 ed.) It must follow, therefore, that an involuntary election in obedience to the order of the court was not such a choice as would bind the party on a subsequent trial unless for the sole reason that it was rightfully ordered at the first trial. But when one defends an action for the recovery of land on the grounds that he has a paper title which he desires held good, and is also in possession of mortgages on such land which he has paid, we can see nothing necessarily irreconcilable about the two defenses. It is proper in an action for specific performance to plead in the alternative and ask for damages for nonperformance. (Henry v. McKittrick, 42 Kan. 485, 22 Pac. 576; Naugle v. Naugle, 89 Kan. 622, 132 Pac. 164.) And it is quite possible for one to purchase incumbered land, the title to which may be uncertain, and by purchasing the incumbrance hold both as owner and mortgagee, the matter of merger usually being one of choice and not one of compulsion. (Building, etc. Assoc. v. Palatine Ins. Co. 74 Kan. 272, 86 Pac. 142; Carson v. Fulbright, 80 Kan. 624, 103 Pac. 139; Williams v. Bricker, 83 Kan. 53, 58, 59, 109 Pac. 998, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 343; Zuege v. Nebraska Mortg. Co. 92 Kan. 272, Ann. Cas. 1916B 865, 140 Pac. 855, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 877.)

As to the admissibility of the transcript of the evidence, aside from the competency of the witness, it should be observed that when this testimony was originally offered Mr. Schultz was present as one of the attorneys in the case, although he did not testify. Mrs. New had then testified about her interviews with Mr. Schultz at one of which she had signed and acknowledged a paper which turned out to be a deed, and about other transactions with him when he acted as her attorney. This was followed by a cross-examination by her counsel, covering in detail her dealings with Mr. [11] Schultz after his motion that her examination in chief be stricken out was overruled. It is contended that the only basis for admitting this transcript is the statute providing that a transcript of the court stenographer's notes of one testimony, properly verified and certified, may be introduced under like circumstances and with like effect as the deposition of such witness. (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 2407.) The circumstances under which depositions may be used are set forth in sections 337 and 358 of the civil code, an essential one being that the witness is not and cannot be in attendance. The witness was present and placed on the stand, but an objection to testimony by her was sustained, and plaintiffs' counsel argue that having been deprived of her evidence by this objection it was proper to introduce the transcript of her former testimony. The objection was on the ground of the incompetency of the evidence and also the incompetency of the witness to testify concerning a transaction with a deceased person, and it does not appear on which ground it was sustained. The fact that the transcript was received indicates, however, that it was on the ground of the present incompetency of the witness. Of course, aside from this the transcript was properly received like evidence of any other statement made by the plaintiff in the presence and hearing of Mr. Schultz and undenied by him. Fullenwider v. Ewing, 30 Kan. 15, 1 Pac. 300, is cited. There on the second trial of a case a deposition taken on a former trial was offered as the affidavit of a witness, and it was held that this was properly rejected, the witness being present in court. It was also held proper to prove certain conduct and language on the part of the original plaintiff had in the presence of the original defendant. See, also, Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Prouty, 55 Kan. 503, 40 Pac. 909, to the effect that it is error to admit the deposition of a witness who resides outside the county, but who is present in court and ready and willing to testify.

[12] Before the enactment of section 2407 it had been held that the stenographer's notes of evidence formerly taken could be read in evidence, and the statute makes it proper to introduce the transcript made and certified by him. In State v. Stewart, 85 Kan. 404, 116 Pac. 489, the testimony of a witness voluntarily given in the preliminary examination of the charge for which the accused was on trial was held admissible, the accused having originally had full opportunity to cross-examine, and the direct testimony of the witness having become unavailable by reason of his claiming his statutory privilege of withholding the same. The previous decisions were referred to and followed. It was said that this admissibility did not depend so much on the presence or the availability of the witness as on the availability of the testimony; that the testimony of Stewart, the husband of the defendant, was as unavailable as if he were over the state line. The case of Pratt v. Patterson, 81 Pa. St. 114, was cited, in which both parties to an action having testified and the verdict having been set aside and one of the parties having died and his executor having been substituted, it was held competent at the next trial to read the testimony given by the deceased at the former trial. Section 337 of the code provides that the deposition of a witness may be used only when he is a nonresident or absent from the county or unable to attend court or dead. Section 2407 has reference not so much to the matter of using a deposition in the absence of witnesses as using a transcript of the stenographer's notes instead of reading them, and while it provides that such transcript may be introduced under like circumstances and with like effect as a deposition, it does not restrict such use to instances in which depositions only may be used. In other words, the object of section 2407 is not to confine transcripts to the limits applied to depositions, but to provide a more convenient way to use testimony formerly taken than by reading the notes which would be [13] unintelligible to the jury, and which reading might in many cases be tedious and unsatisfactory.

The question remains whether or not this testimony was incompetent because it related to a transaction had by the plaintiff with a deceased person "where either (formerly the "adverse" party) party to the action claims to have acquired title directly or indirectly from such deceased person." (Laws 1911, ch. 229, § 1.) The defendant claimed to have acquired title from the wife of the deceased, but as the husband joined in the deed he could well claim to have acquired title either directly or indirectly from him. When this testimony was originally given it did not relate to any transaction or communication had with a person then deceased and hence it was not barred by the statute invoked by the defendant. At the subsequent trial the testimony by the witness was excluded by reason of this statute, and then it became as unavailable as if Mrs. New had been absent in another state or helpless on a bed of sickness, the situation thus approaching very nearly the one presented in State v. Stewart, supra, so nearly, indeed, that the same rule must be held to apply. Authorities are cited which would lead to a different conclusion and which go to the extent of holding that Mrs. New should be deemed to have been actually testifying when her former testimony was read, but we are not persuaded or convinced by their reasoning. In Collins v. McGuire, 76 App. Div. 443, 78 N. Y. S. 527, it was held by the appellate division of the supreme court of New York that the competency of a witness depends upon the facts as they exist when his testimony is given. A defendant had testified on his own behalf to personal transactions had with the plaintiff, who died before being called as a witness, and his administrator was substituted and it was sought to strike out the evidence under a statute similar to ours, but the motion was denied and this ruling was affirmed, following Comins v. Hetfield, 80 N. Y. 261. It is suggested [14] that when this evidence was originally given it was with the understanding that Mr. Schultz should be allowed to testify concerning the same matters, but as a demurrer was sustained to the plaintiff's evidence the opportunity did not arise in that trial; and that the objection that it covered a conversation between attorney and client was waived in view of the understanding. But this cannot mend matters for the defendant for the statute does not preclude the client but only the attorney from giving such conversation. (Civ. Code, § 321, subdiv. 4.)

It is insisted that the court erred in sustaining an objection to questions in substance whether or not the defendant when he bought the land believed that the plaintiff had in good faith parted with all her interest in it. It was competent to show his motive, belief and state of mind, and no one could know so well as he what they were. (Baker v. Missouri, etc. R. Co. 85 Kan. 263, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1042, 116 Pac. 816, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 822.) But he was permitted to testify that he did not then know there was any claim made by Mrs. New of fraud or failure of consideration, and that he had never heard anything about any controversy as to how Schultz got the deed. No offer was made to show what was indicated by these questions and no affidavit or showing thereof was produced in support of the motion for a new trial, and it cannot be said that material prejudice appears as to the ruling in question. (Clark v. Morris, 88 Kan. 752, 129 Pac. 1195; Caldwell v. Modern Woodmen of America, 89 Kan. 11, 130 Pac. 642; Cheek v. Missouri, etc. R. Co. 89 Kan. 247, 131 Pac. 617; McIntosh v. Standard Oil Co. 89 Kan. 289, Ann. Cas. 1914D 112, 131 Pac. 151, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 730; Treiber v. McCormack, 90 Kan. 675, Ann. Cas. 1915B 943, 136 Pac. 268; Leavens v. Hoover, 93 Kan. 661, 145 Pac. 877.

We have examined the instructions given and refused with reference to the complaints made concerning them and to ascertain whether the jury were properly charged, and while now and then an expression might have been bettered or properly omitted, it appears that the issues were fairly and sufficiently presented and no [15] material error was committed either in those refused or in those given. The only remaining point requiring consideration is the rightfulness of the defendant's claim to be treated as a mortgagee in possession. This term is a familiar one, but it bears no talismanic charm or potency to confer benefits regardless of the dictates of fairness and equity; on the contrary, it is an expression used to describe a situation in which those very dictates demand that one be made whole for what he has benefited an estate before being required to yield it up to another who would thereby enjoy an unearned advantage. When Mrs. Schultz took her deed to the land it was incumbered, and these incumbrances remained when Mr. Smith purchased the land. They represented money loaned to a former owner and never paid by such owner, so that the utmost title Mrs. New could ever rightfully claim is the equity or the fee burdened with these incumbrances. These Mr. Smith has paid, not on account of or at the behest of the plaintiff, but presumably because they had to be paid to save the land, which he claimed to own. Is there any reason why if he should be compelled to turn the land over to Mrs. New he should also present her with the amount of these mortgages? The only possible reason assigned is that he is tainted with the fraud by which the title was procured from her. But this is not an action for punitive damages. It is one to set aside a deed, and regain possession of land on which he has expended, under color and claim of title, enough money to clear such title from all the incumbrances which his adversary voluntarily placed upon the land. He is not the actor in this drama, but the party assailed, and if his assailant recovers everything which he ever procured from her directly or indirectly it would seem enough. And to this effect are the authorities. In Hofman v. Demple, 52 Kan. 756, 35 Pac. 803, the defendant had furnished liquor to make the husband of the plaintiff drunk for the purpose of inducing him to convey the homestead, whereupon the husband procured [16] the wife's signature by duress, and it was held that the plaintiff had no right to recover the land freed from an incumbrance cleared by the defendant. True, the grantors had acquiesced for more than a year and a half, but this was not deemed sufficient to bar the recovery of the land, and it was stated to be inequitable that more should be recovered. In Stouffer v. Harlan, 68 Kan. 135, 74 Pac. 610, 104 Am. St. Rep. 396, 64 L.R.A. 320, many decisions were reviewed, and it was said that whatever may be the historical source of the rule, it should be acted upon except where one has acquired possession of property "under such circumstances that it would be inequitable to permit him to assert a right under it." (p. 145.) In Walters v. Chance, 73 Kan. 680, 685, 85 Pac. 779, it was said that if one obtain possession by force, intimidation, deceit or fraud, a court of equity will not permit him to profit thereby. Here there is no claim that the defendant obtained possession by fraud committed by him upon Mrs. New—only that he took his title with the knowledge or means of knowledge that one of his grantors had defrauded her. While this may be good ground for requiring him to give up what he obtained and to lose all he paid for it, no reason is apparent why in addition he should lose what he had paid out to clear the land from liens placed thereon by the plaintiff. Of course it is not and cannot be claimed that the defendant is a mortgagee in possession—only that he should be treated as if he were. More correctly stated, the question is, Should he be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose liens he satisfied? As said in Olson v. Peterson, 88 Kan. 350, 128 Pac. 191: "Subrogation is a creature of equity, invented to prevent a failure of justice" (p. 361) and it was there said to be broad enough to include "every instance in which one party is required to pay a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience, ought to be discharged by the latter." (p. 361.) The doctrine of subrogation or equitable assignment was considered in Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Stafford, 93 Kan. [17] 539, 144 Pac. 852. (See also Young v. Ward, 115 Ind. 264, 3 N. E. 512; and Arnold v. Hoschildt, 69 Minn. 101, 71 N. W. 829.) As a matter of simple fairness and in line with the essential principles of equity we hold that the defendant should not be ousted until made whole for the incumbrances which he has satisfied.

Litigation resulting from the homicide of Joseph New is no new thing in this court. (Dobbs v. State, 62 Kan. 108, 61 Pac. 408; Smith v. Becker, 62 Kan. 541, 64 Pac. 70, 53 L.R.A. 141; Dobbs v. State, 63 Kan. 321, 65 Pac. 658; New v. Smith, 68 Kan. 807, 74 Pac. 610; New v. Smith, 73 Kan. 174, 84 Pac. 1030; New v. Smith, 86 Kan. 1, 119 Pac. 380.)

In order that this litigation may be ended, and in view of the circumstances shown, the amount due the defendant on account of the mortgages paid by him should be ascertained and satisfied before the plaintiff is let into possession. If there is a claim for rents and profits there is no reason why proper pleadings and proceedings can not be filed and had to close the entire controversy.

Finding no material error except in the one respect indicated, the case is remanded with directions to modify the judgment in accordance herewith.

Admissibility of Evidence Given at Former Trial Concerning Transaction with Person Since Deceased.

Introductory, 366.

View that Evidence is Not Admissible, 367.

Introductory.

There is a radical conflict of authority with respect to the general question whether testimony taken during the lifetime of a party to an action as to a transaction with him is admissible on a trial had after his death. That conflict is exemplified in the cases relating to the admissibility after the death of a party of a deposition with respect to a transaction with him which was taken before his death. See the notes to Boyd v. Gore, 21 Ann. Cas. 1263, and Beaston v. Portland Trust, etc. Bank, reported post, this volume, at page 488. The same contrariety of opinion appears with respect to the subject of the present note, viz.: the admissibility of evidence given at a former trial concerning a transaction with a person since deceased. That question apparently involves considerations identical with those on which were based the cases collated in the notes heretofore referred to, and those cases can profitably be consulted as to jurisdictions wherein the precise question here considered has not been decided.

View that Evidence Is Admissible.

Evidence given at a former trial concerning a transaction with a person since deceased has been held in several jurisdictions to be admissible. Bowie v. Hume, 13 App. Cas. (D. C.) 286; Armitage v. Snowden, 41 Md. 119; Pratt v. Patterson, 81 Pa. St. 114. And see the reported case. See also Walbridge v. Knipper, 96 Pa. St. 48. Thus in the case first cited it was held that the testimony of the defendant given on a former trial, when the then plaintiff was living and was examined as a witness, was properly admitted in evidence. The court said: "We come lastly to the question as to the admissibility of the testimony given by the defendant on the former trial and reported stenographically, and when Bowie, the then plaintiff, was present and was also examined as a witness for himself. The right of cross-examination in respect to both parties was fully exercised; and the present plaintiff at the last trial produced and read in evidence the testimony given on the former trial by the then plaintiff Bowie, as the testimony of a deceased witness. The testimony of the defendant then given is objected to upon the ground that the party giving the evidence on the former trial is still living. But we do not think the objection a sound one. If the defendant, like his original adversary, had been dead at the last trial, there could have been no question of the admissibility of his testimony given on the former trial. But though still in life, there has supervened a cause of disqualification to his right to testify as a living witness without any fault or agency of his own. As matter of principle, in what respect does the case differ from that of a disqualifying interest acquired by a witness after he has testified in a cause, and subsequently on a new trial his testimony is found to be essential to the party for whom he originally testified?" In Armitage v. Snowden, 41 Md. 119, the court said: "The objection to the testimony of the appellant cannot be sustained. The admissibility of testimony depends upon the competency of the witness at the time he testifies, and cannot be affected by what may happen afterwards. When the testimony of Armitage was taken, Knell, the testator was alive, and under the Evidence Acts of 1864, c. 109, and 1868, c. 116, he was a competent witness. The fact that Knell died before the hearing cannot render the testimony thus taken inadmissible." So in Pratt v. Patterson, 81 Pa. St. 114, the plaintiff sued to recover commissions as a real estate broker. Before the trial the defendant died and his executors were substituted. On the trial the notes of the plaintiff's testimony taken in a former suit between the same parties and involving the same subject-matter were offered in evidence and rejected by the court. Holding that the rejection of the evidence was error the court said: "This evidence was taken on due notice, with ample opportunity for cross-examination. It was not testimony that could have been fabricated after the death of the party whose interest might be injuriously affected thereby. When taken the parties stood on an equal footing. Each had the right to perpetuate his own testimony."

In Comins v. Hetfield, 80 N. Y. 261, a motion was made to strike out testimony of the plaintiff in his own behalf taken prior to the decease of one of the defendants, Culver, which occurred during proceedings before a referee. Holding that the admissibility of testimony was to be determined as of the time when it was given the court, denying the motion, said: "The death of Culver, after the testimony had been given and before it was completed, would not justify the striking out of the testimony which had already been taken. Section 399 of the code has no application to such a case, and cannot be invoked to sustain the motion. The testimony being entirely competent when it was admitted, and the plaintiff entitled to the benefit to be derived from the facts sworn to, the subsequent death of one of the defendants would not render it inadmissible. The disqualification of the witness depended entirely upon the facts as they existed when he gave his testimony, and not upon any change which subsequently occurred before the examination was completed."

View that Evidence Is Not Admissible.

In some jurisdictions evidence given at a former trial concerning a transaction with a person since deceased is not admissible. Trunkey v. Hedstrom, 131 Ill. 204, 23 N. E.

587, affirming 33 Ill. App. 397; Russell v. Happ, 76 Ill. App. 417; Greenlee v. Mosnat, 136 Ia. 639, 111 N. W. 996, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 488; Barker v. Hebbard, 81 Mich. 267, 45 N. W. 964. Thus in Greenlee v. Mosnat, supra, the court said: "Much is said by counsel for appellee in favor of the general proposition that, as plaintiff was competent to testify when his former testimony was given and has only been rendered incompetent by subsequent events, his former testimony ought to be accepted. But the policy of the statute seems not to be in harmony with this view. It is not on account of anything which has happened to the witness that he is unable to testify on this trial. It is because an obstacle has arisen to the enforcement of his claim as based on his own testimony by reason of the death of the other party, and that obstacle, as the statute provides, renders his testimony incompetent, unless in some way such obstacle is removed. If in this conclusion there is any apparent injustice, it is one incident to the application of the code provision. . . . True it is that the testimony of plaintiff was competent testimony, so far as its relation to the issues was concerned, but it was incompetent as the testimony of plaintiff with reference to a subject-matter as to which he was forbidden to testify after the death of the adverse party, and for that reason it was incompetent testimony; that is, testimony of an incompetent witness." So, in Trunkey v. Hedstrom, 131 Ill. 204, 23 N. E. 587, affirming 33 Ill. App. 397, it appeared that Trunkey, one of the plaintiffs in the action, testified on the first trial of the cause that he made the contract sued on with one Pratt, the agent of the defendants, and Pratt also testified. Before the next trial it was stipulated between the parties that in any future trial Pratt's testimony might be read in evidence by the defendants as though regularly taken as a deposition in the cause. Before the next trial, Pratt died. Trunkey, on the final trial, was called as a witness by the plaintiffs, but the trial court held him to be incompetent. Sustaining that ruling it was said: "The court below held Trunkey thereby disqualified as a witness, under section 4 of chapter 51 of the Revised Statutes, which provides: 'And in every action, suit or proceeding, a party to the same who has contracted with an agent of the adverse party, the agent having since died, shall not be a competent witness as to any conversation or transaction between himself and such agent.' Plaintiffs thereupon offered his testimony as reported upon the first trial, and insisted upon its competency, on the theory that, being competent at the time he testified, his subsequent disqualification did not preclude plaintiffs from using it on the subsequent trial. . . . That Trunkey would have been an incompetent witness at common law, must be conceded. That incompetency is removed by our statute, with certain exceptions, among which is the one above quoted. While the policy of this statute is to allow all persons to testify in civil suits, regardless of their interest in the event thereof, there is a studied purpose manifested in its various sections, to put the parties upon an equality as to the evidence of such interested witnesses. . . . Whether Trunkey was allowed to testify on this trial, or his former evidence was read to the jury, could make no difference. In either case the equality between the parties would be destroyed, Pratt being dead. . . . The fact that in this particular case the testimony of the deceased agent was available to the defendants, cannot change the rule prescribed by the statute. It was necessary for plaintiffs to make out their case, in the first instance, by competent proof. Until they had done so, the defendants were not called upon to introduce any evidence. Plaintiffs could not avail themselves of proof made incompetent by the statute, simply because defendants had in their possession testimony which would tend to overcome such incompetent evidence. Defendants were not called upon to thus aid plaintiffs in making their case. The offered testimony was incompetent, and properly excluded."

REAM ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 27, 1915.

270 Ill. 170; 110 N. E. 373.

Corporations — Compensation of Officer — Allowed by Vote of Officer Benefited.

Compensation voted to an officer of a corporation is illegal, if the resolution fixing it is carried by his vote, and such compensation may be recovered.

[See 11 Ann. Cas. 773; 19 Ann. Cas. 1260.]

Stock Voting Agreement — Validity.

It is legitimate for the owners of a majority of the stock of a corporation to combine for the purpose of controlling it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A stockholder may withdraw from a combination to control the majority of the stock of the corporation, though it is expressly stated therein that the agreement shall be irrevocable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

As stockholders cannot divest themselves of their duty to participate in controlling the corporation, and as there is no such thing as an irrevocable proxy to vote stock not coupled with an interest, a trust agreement, whereby the owner of less than one per cent of the stock of a corporation had absolute power to vote a majority of the stock as he saw fit, which power was made irrevocable for ten years, is invalid and can be repudiated.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a trust agreement provided that the trustee should have absolute power for ten years of voting corporate stock, parties to the agreement may repudiate it, and so may purchasers of stock with knowledge.

Appeal from Appellate Court, Second District.

Action by Ferd. Luthy et al., plaintiffs, against Henry Ream et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs in Circuit Court, Peoria county: NIEHAUS, Judge. Judgment modified by Appellate Court. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Thomas F. Doyle for Peru Plow and Wheel Company.

[172] DUNN, J.—Ferd. Luthy, Daniel W. Voorhees, George T. Page and Thomas Cahill filed a bill in chancery in the circuit court of Peoria county against Henry Ream, Benjamin D. Brewster, William Holly, the Peru Plow and Wheel Company (a corporation), and other persons, stockholders in the corporation, the object of which was to procure the cancellation of a certain voting trust agreement of stockholders of the corporation as to Thomas Cahill, the setting aside of the action of the directors of the corporation fixing salaries of Henry Ream, Benjamin D. Brewster and William Holly, as president, vice-president and treasurer, respectively, of the corporation, a return of the amount of the salaries received by them, and the issue of a certificate of 70 shares of the capital stock of the corporation to Thomas Cahill. Answers were filed, and after a hearing the court rendered a decree granting the relief prayed for. Upon an appeal by some of the defendants the Appellate Court for the Second District reversed the decree except so far as it held the fixing of the salaries of the officers illegal and required the amount received by them to be refunded. Complainants have appealed from this judgment, the court having certified that the case involves questions of law of such importance that it should be passed upon by the Supreme Court.

The Peru Plow and Wheel Company is a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, having a capital stock of $400,000, engaged in the manufacture of plows, metal wheels and farm implements. The complainants are the owners of 2027 of the 4000 shares of its stock, Thomas Cahill being the owner of 70 shares purchased in November, [173] 1912. In September, 1912, forty-one of the stockholders, owning 2001 shares of the stock, entered into the trust agreement in controversy. After reciting that the stockholders deemed it to their interest that all of their stock should be voted as a unit upon all questions affecting the business and management of the company and that Henry Ream had consented to hold and vote such stock on behalf of the stockholders, the agreement provided:

"That for a valuable consideration, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and in further consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements expressed in this agreement, the stockholders hereby assign, convey and transfer unto the trustee above named, the number of shares of stock of the Peru Plow and Wheel Company, a corporation of the State of Illinois, as set opposite their respective names, to be held in trust by the said trustee for the respective stockholders by whom it is severally assigned, their personal representatives and assigns, upon the following terms and conditions:

"(1) The said trustee shall hold, control and vote said stock as if he was the owner of all of said stock.

"(2) Said trustee shall determine how said stock shall be voted upon any question, at any time and every meeting of the stockholders.

"(3) All of said stock so held by the trustees shall be voted as a unit.

"(4) At all elections of directors of the Peru Plow and Wheel Company said trustee shall nominate three directors to be voted for at such election, and said trustee shall vote all said stock held by him as a unit for each and all of the directors so nominated by him.

"(5) A vacancy in the office of trustee, as herein provided for, shall be filled in the following manner, viz.: In the event of the death, resignation or removal, for any cause whatever, of said trustee herein, the vacancy in the office of trustee shall be filled by a majority in amount of the then holders of the stock now owned by the following stockholders [174] [here appear the names of the signers of the agreement], parties to this agreement, as appears set opposite their respective names subscribed hereto.

"(6) Said trustee shall prepare and issue to the stockholders, certificates showing the amount of stock held on behalf of each stockholder, respectively, and the stock so held may be divided and transferred in like manner as if it had not been assigned in trust, subject to the rights and powers of the trustee under this agreement. But no such assignment or transfer of stock shall be effective for any purpose until surrender of the certificate issued by said trustee and the issue of a new certificate to the purchaser or assignee thereof.

"(7) No fees shall be charged by such trustee herein designated for any services performed in connection with the trust hereby created.

"(8) Said trustee shall collect and receive all dividends on the stock transferred to and held by him and shall immediately pay over the same to the holders of trust certificates representing such stock as their respective interests appear. The trustee shall not demand or receive any compensation for receiving and paying over such dividends.

"(9) The rights, duties and powers hereby conferred upon said trustee shall expire and wholly cease on the first day of September, A. D. 1922, and the trustee shall at said time assign and transfer to the persons who then hold trustee's certificates evidencing their ownership of shares of stock, the amount of stock to which each holder thereof is shown by his trustee's certificate to be entitled.

"(10) Said trustee hereby accepts the trust hereby created by the above and foregoing instrument, and hereby undertakes to hold, own and vote said stock as therein provided, and to re-transfer the same on the first day of September, A. D. 1922, to the holders of trustee's certificates evidencing their right to receive the same. Said trustee further undertakes at all times to vote the said stock by himself [175] or by proxy, and exercise his powers as trustee in such manner as he shall deem to be for the best interests of the stockholders of the Peru Plow and Wheel Company. Said trustee further undertakes to accept additional assignments of stock from any and all stockholders of the Peru Plow and Wheel Company, and to permit any stockholder thereof to become a subscriber to this agreement. It is expressly understood and agreed that Henry Ream, trustee herein referred to, shall not be liable, either directly or indirectly, to any person, firm or corporation for any loss or damage whatever occurring on account of the trusteeship or from any act done by the said trustee in connection with the duties and trusts herein imposed upon him."

The certificates of stock of the stockholders signing the agreement were canceled and two certificates for 2001 shares, in the aggregate, were issued to Ream as trustee. He issued to each stockholder a trustee's certificate stating that the stockholder to whom it was issued was the owner of a certain number of shares of the capital stock of the Peru Plow and Wheel Company held by him as trustee, subject and pursuant to the terms, conditions and stipulations of a certain agreement between him, as trustee, and certain stockholders of the said Peru Plow and Wheel Company joining in the said agreement of date September 4, 1912, a copy of which agreement was on file with the trustee and reference was had to it as to all the terms, conditions and requirements of the trust. The certificates were stated to be transferable only on the books of the trustee by the owner thereof in person or by attorney, upon its surrender properly indorsed, when like new certificates would be issued to the proper owner of record. On the back of each certificate was a form for its assignment.

Among the stockholders signing the agreement were Kate Cahill, John D. Cahill and Cornelius J. Cahill, who together owned 70 shares of the stock. They sold their shares to the appellant Thomas Cahill and assigned to him their [176] trust certificate. He presented the certificate so assigned to him to Henry Ream, who was president of the corporation, and demanded that a certificate should be issued to him by the president and secretary of the corporation for 70 shares of its capital stock, but the said Henry Ream refused to issue such certificate, and stated that said 70 shares of stock were included in the trust agreement, and that he could not and would not issue a certificate for them to Thomas Cahill for that reason. Thomas Cahill thereupon notified him that as the owner of 70 shares he withdrew the same from the said trust agreement and would no longer be bound thereby, and demanded that a certificate be issued to him free from any restraint, obligation or condition under said trust agreement, but said Henry Ream refused to issue such certificate.

The annual stockholders' meeting of the corporation was held on September 10, 1912. The trust agreement had not then been signed by all the parties to it but Ream held a proxy from them all. The board of directors, consisting of five members (Henry Ream, Benjamin D. Brewster, William Holly, Ferdinand Luthy and D. W. Voorhees), was unanimously re-elected. The annual meeting of the directors was held on October 22, 1912. Ream, Brewster, Holly and Voorhees were unanimously re-elected to the respective offices of president, vice-president, treasurer and secretary which they had previously held. Upon the motion of Brewster, seconded by Holly, the salaries of the president, vice-president and treasurer were fixed at $2400 a year each, payable monthly, commencing with November, 1912. Brewster, Holly and Ream voted for the motion and Luthy and Voorhees against it. The persons holding these offices had never received any salary before this time, and the services performed by the incumbents after November, 1912, were nominal, as they had been before that date. Voorhees had been employed in February, 1912, as manager of the company at a salary of $6000 a year under a written contract for five years, and the business of the company was [177] conducted by him and under his direction. He received no salary as secretary.

Compensation voted to an officer of a corporation is illegal if the resolution fixing such compensation is carried by his vote. (McNulta v. Corn Belt Bank, 164 Ill. 427, 45 N. E. 954, 56 Am. St. Rep. 203; Voorhees v. Mason, 245 Ill. 256, 91 N. E. 1056.) The salaries voted to the three officers by their own votes were therefore illegal, and the decree of the circuit court properly required the amounts which had been paid on account of such salaries to be refunded. No assignment of cross-errors has been made upon this part of the decree and the only question for determination is the validity of the trust agreement.

The effect of the agreement was to place the legal title of the majority of the stock in Henry Ream, who was given the power to vote the stock for ten years upon all questions and at every meeting of the stockholders according to his own discretion, uncontrolled by the stockholders in any way. He then owned 37 shares of stock, and thus the entire control of the corporation was conferred upon the owner of less than one per cent of the stock, with no power in the owners of the remaining ninety-nine per cent to interfere in any way. We have held that it is legitimate for the owners of a majority of the stock of a corporation to combine for the purpose of controlling the corporation. (Faulds v. Yates, 57 Ill. 416, 11 Am. Rep. 24; Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. 258 Ill. 523, 101 N. E. 949.) In this case, however, the agreement goes much farther than any case which has heretofore arisen in this court. The voting power of the stock is absolutely separated from its ownership for a term of years, so that the real owners of the property are during that time entirely divested of its management and control or of any participation therein. Our law contemplates that corporations shall be controlled by a majority of the stockholders acting through directors elected by them in person or by proxy, and it has been held that a by-law of a corporation which authorizes bondholders to vote for directors at stockholders' meetings is in violation [178] of both the constitutional and statutory provisions requiring directors to be elected by a majority of the shares of stock of the corporation. (Durkee v. People, 155 Ill. 354, 40 N. E. 626, 46 Am. St. Rep. 340.) The power to vote for directors can be exercised only by stockholders in person or by proxy, and they cannot be deprived or deprive themselves of this power. Stockholders cannot evade the duty imposed upon them by law of using their power as stockholders for the welfare of the corporation and the general interest of its stockholders. A stockholder may refuse to exercise his right to vote and participate in stockholders' meetings but he cannot deprive himself of the power to do so. It was said in Shepaug Voting Trust Cases, 60 Conn. 576, 24 Atl. 32: "It is the policy of our law that an untrammelled power to vote shall be incident to the ownership of the stock, and a contract by which the real owner's power is hampered by a provision therein that he shall vote just as somebody else dictates is objectionable. I think it against the policy of our law for a stockholder to contract that his stock shall be voted just as someone who has no beneficial interest or title in or to the stock directs, saving to himself simply the title, the right to dividends, and perhaps the right to cast the vote directed, willing or unwilling, whether it be for his interest, for the interest of other stockholders or for the interest of the corporation, or otherwise. This I conceive to be against the policy of the law, whether the power so to vote be for five years or for all time. It is the policy of our law that ownership of stock shall control the property and the management of the corporation; and this cannot be accomplished, and this good policy is defeated, if stockholders are permitted to surrender all their discretion and will in the important matter of voting, and suffer themselves to be mere passive instruments in the hands of some agent who has no interest in the stock, equitable or legal, and no interest in the general prosperity of the corporation. And this is not entirely for the protection of the stockholder himself, but to compel a compliance with the duty which [179] each stockholder owes his fellow-stockholders to so use such power and means as the law and his ownership of stock give him that the general interest of stockholders shall be protected and the general welfare of the corporation sustained and its business conducted by its agents, managers and officers, so far as may be, upon prudent and honest business principles and with just as little temptation to and opportunity for fraud and the seeking of individual gains at the sacrifice of the general welfare as is possible. This, I take it, is the duty that one stockholder in a corporation owes to his fellow-stockholders, and he cannot be allowed to disburden himself of it in this way. He may shirk it, perhaps, by refusing to attend stockholders' meetings or by declining to vote when called upon, but the law will not allow him to strip himself of the power to perform his duty. To this extent, at least, a stockholder stands in fiduciary relation to his fellow-stockholders."

"The theory upon which the capital of numerous persons is associated in various proportions, in the shape of a trading corporation, to be managed by a committee of the stockholders, is that such committee shall truly represent and be subject to the will of the majority in the interest of the stockholders. The security of the small stockholders is found in the natural disposition of each stockholder to promote the best interests of all, in order to promote his individual interests. A member of an ordinary partnership has an additional security in the personal character of each of his partners and may decline to be associated with any whom he does not know and approve. But a stockholder in a corporation cannot control the personnel of his associates and must rely upon their self-interest, alone. Upon the foundation of the natural disposition of persons to promote their own interests rests the rule established in this State in the famous case of Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. L. 222, 27 Am. Dec. 33, that a trading corporation could not, without special legislative authority, make a by-law authorizing a stockholder to vote [180] by proxy. The principle established by that case is, 'that the obligation and duty of corporators to attend in person and execute the trust or franchise reposed in or granted to them is implied in and forms a part of the fundamental constitution of every charter in which the contrary is not expressed;' and the reason given by Chief Justice Hornblower at page 227, and again by Justice Ford at page 250, is, that the good of the stockholders as well as of the public requires that each stockholder should exercise his individual judgment as to all matters presented." Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq. 208, 21 Atl. 847.

A stockholder may ordinarily withdraw from a combination to control the majority of the stock of a corporation and a contract not to transfer his shares to the opposition or vote against the combination, although it is expressly agreed that the contract shall be irrevocable. (1 Beach on Corporations, sec. 305.) In section 306 of the same work it is said: "On general principles, the right to vote on stock cannot be separated from the ownership in such sense that the elective franchise shall be in one man and the entire beneficial interest in another, nor to any extent unless the circumstances take the case out of the general rule. It matters not that the end is beneficial and the motive good, because it is not always possible to ascertain objects and motives, and if such a severance were permissible it might be abused."

While the pooling of stock for the purpose of electing directors and officers and controlling the management and business of the corporation is not necessarily illegal, an agreement the purpose and effect of which are to permit the affairs of the corporation to be managed by the determination of persons other than its stockholders or by a minority of its own stockholders is invalid. (Shepaug Voting Trust Cases, supra; Kreissl v. Distilling Co. of America, 61 N. J. Eq. 5, 47 Atl. 471; White v. Thomas Inflatable Tire Co. 52 N. J. Eq. 178, 28 Atl. 75; Warren v. Pim, 66 N. J. Eq. 353, 59 Atl. 773; Bache v. Central Leather Co. 78 N. J. Eq. 484, 81 Atl. 571; Morel v. Hoge, 130 Ga. 625, 14 Ann. Cas. 935, 61 S. E. 487, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1136; Harvey v. Linville [181] Imp. Co. 118 N. C. 693, 24 S. E. 489, 54 Am. St. Rep. 749, 32 L.R.A. 265; Bridgers v. Tarboro First Nat. Bank, 152 N. C. 293, 67 S. E. 770, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1199.) The principle to be deduced from these cases is that the holders of the majority of the shares of stock in a corporation may control its management, and every person who becomes an owner of stock has a right to believe that the corporation will, and to insist that it shall, be managed by the majority; that the power to vote is inherently attached to and inseparable from the real ownership of each share, and can only be delegated by proxy, with power of revocation; that each stockholder must be free to cast his vote, whether by himself or by proxy, for the best interest of the corporation, and that each stockholder has the right to demand that every other stockholder, if he desires to do so, shall have the right to exercise at each annual meeting his own judgment as to the best interest of all the stockholders, untrammelled by dictation and unfettered by the obligation of any contract.

We held in Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. supra, that the election of directors under the provisions of the trust agreement there involved, in the manner therein provided, was really an election by the stockholders through their proxies and so was not in violation of any constitutional or statutory provisions. There is no such thing as an irrevocable proxy to vote stock not coupled with any interest in the stock itself other than the right to vote it. A proxy, though stated to be irrevocable, may be revoked at any time. (1 Cook on Corporations, sec. 610.) This contract gave to Henry Ream, alone, the power for ten years to elect three of the five directors of the corporation and to formulate and determine its policy, unrestrained and uninfluenced by all the other stockholders or any of them. The surrender of their duties by the stockholders is complete, and the majority have no power to direct the trustee, for he, alone, is to determine how the stock shall be voted, and to vote it, upon any question, at any time and every meeting of the stockholders. He no longer represents the majority of the stock, [182] for 70 shares have been sold to the complainant Cahill, who has the entire beneficial interest therein. Other shares may be sold, so that before the expiration of the trust the trustee, who originally represented a majority of the stock but now represents only a minority, may represent only his own 37 shares, and yet, if the trust agreement is to be enforced, have absolute management and control of the corporation.

In Smith v. San Francisco, etc. R. Co. 115 Cal. 584, 47 Pac. 582, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, 35 L.R.A. 309, it was held that an agreement by several purchasers of stock in a corporation to vote it as a unit for five years, in accordance with the decision of the majority, is binding upon the parties and irrevocable. In Carnegie Trust Co. v. Security L. Ins. Co. of America, 111 Va. 1, 21 Ann. Cas. 1287, 68 S. E. 412, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1186, the Supreme Court of Virginia held that an agreement among stockholders to place their stock in the hands of trustees for twenty-five years, to enable the trustees to manage the corporation, constituted a valid trust. These cases are inconsistent with the views which we have expressed and the cases cited in support of them, but in our judgment the latter cases state the true rule.

Although Thomas Cahill purchased his stock with notice of the agreement, that agreement was not binding upon him or his vendors if he or they wished to withdraw from it, and upon his demand for a certificate of stock he was entitled to receive it. The other complainants have a right, also, as stockholders, to prevent the trustee from voting stock which he has no right to vote.

The Appellate Court erred in reversing the decree of the circuit court in part, and its judgment will be reversed and the decree of the circuit court will be affirmed.

Judgment reversed.

Rehearing denied December 10, 1915.

NOTE.

The reported case, while recognizing the right of the owners of a majority of the stock in a corporation to combine for the purpose of controlling the corporation, holds to be invalid an agreement whereby the owners of a majority of the stock confers on a person who owns less than one per cent thereof an irrevocable right to vote their stock at his discretion for a period of ten years. Such a separation of the voting power from the ownership is, the court holds, contrary to public policy. The cases discussing the validity of stock voting agreements are collated in the notes to the following cases: Morel v. Hoge, 14 Ann. Cas. 935; Carnegie Trust Co. v. Security L. Ins. Co. 21 Ann. Cas. 1287; Palmbaum v. Magulsky, Ann. Cas. 1915D 799; and Smith v. San Francisco, etc. R. Co. 56 Am. St. Rep. 119.

FRATERNAL BANKERS RESERVE SOCIETY.

Iowa Supreme Court—January 25, 1915.

168 Iowa 579; 150 N. W. 714.

Pleading — Reply — Necessity of Denial.

Code 1897, § 3576, provides there shall be no reply except when new matter is alleged, or some matter is alleged in the answer to which plaintiff claims to have a defense because of a fact avoiding it. Section 3577 declares that an allegation in the reply of new matter in avoidance shall not be treated as a waiver of the denial of the allegations of the answer implied by law. It is held that plaintiff, whose reply avoided some of the allegations of the answer, need not deny the others in order to claim the benefit of the statute.

Appeal and Error — Matters Considered — Documents Excluded at Trial.

Documentary evidence excluded below cannot be considered on appeal, though incorporated in the abstract.

Beneficial Association — What Constitutes Membership — Necessity of Initiation.

Under Code 1897, § 1822, defining a "fraternal beneficiary association" as a corporation, society, or voluntary association, formed for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries, and having a lodge system with ritualistic form of work and a representative form of government, a fraternal association need not require members to be initiated in order to entitle them to recover on their certificates.

[See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Admission of Evidence for Restricted Purpose.

Evidence may be restricted to a special purpose, instead of admitted generally, and evidence admitted for a particular purpose cannot be considered for other purposes.

Witnesses — Cross-examination — Use of Documents Not Admissible in Evidence.

Upon cross-examination of a witness who was a deputy of the defendant insurance association, a copy of the association's by-laws may be received to show under what authority the witness claimed to act, though the copy was not admissible, being secondary evidence, to prove the by-law.

Evidence — Burden of Proof — New Matter in Answer.

Defendant has the burden of proving matters set up by the answer and denied by the reply.

Insurance — Actions — Necessity of Pleading Waiver of Payment of Premiums.

Waiver of a matter relied on as a defense must be pleaded to be availed of; and hence, where plaintiff did not plead waiver of the provisions in an insurance certificate requiring payment of premiums, evidence of waiver is inadmissible.

[See 14 R. C. L. tit. Insurance, p. 1431.]

Appeal from District Court, Wapello county: VERMILLION, Judge.

Action by Katherine Schworm, plaintiff, against Fraternal Bankers Reserve Society, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

M. H. Kelly and Roberts & Webber for appellant.

A. W. Enoch, J. C. Mitchell and Gilmore & Moon for appellee.

[581] GAYNOR, J.—The plaintiff is the beneficiary in a benefit certificate for $1,000.00 issued by the defendant to her daughter, Fern Teter. The daughter died and the defendant refuses to pay, and plaintiff brings this action upon the certificate to recover the amount therein provided.

The defendant is a fraternal benefit society organized under the laws of this state, and doing business in this state.

On the 22d day of September, 1911, Fern Teter applied to the defendant to become a member of defendant's society, and for a certificate therein, and on the 13th day of October, 1911, the defendant company issued to said Fern Teter a certificate, the material parts of which are as follows:

"Witnesseth: That in the pursuance of the Articles of Incorporation and Constitution and By-Laws of said Society, and upon the representations contained in the application for this certificate, a copy of which is hereto attached, which articles of incorporation, constitution and by-laws, and all amendments hereinafter made thereto, and the said application are hereby referred to and made a part of this contract, Fern Teter of Ottumwa, Iowa, is accepted as a member of Home Lodge No. 1 located at Cedar Rapids, State of Iowa, and is entitled to all the rights, benefits, and privileges of a beneficial membership in the Fraternal Bankers Reserve Society, and has designated as beneficiary under this certificate, Katherine Teter, Mother, to whom shall be paid, upon satisfactory proof of the death of said member while in good standing, the sum of One Thousand Dollars, less the amounts of any and all disability benefits paid to said member during her lifetime, said payment to be made in accordance with the provisions of the By-Laws of the Fraternal Bankers Reserve Society."

To which certificate was attached the following provisions and made a part thereof:

"1. One monthly payment or assessment of the amount stated on the face hereof shall be paid upon the acceptance [582] of this certificate, and at least one monthly payment or assessment of like amount shall be due and payable each and every calendar month thereafter, without notice of any kind or character from anyone whomsoever, and in addition to said monthly payment or assessment, each and every beneficial member shall pay to the local lodge, of which he shall be a member, local lodge dues in such sums and amounts and at such times, as shall be determined and provided by the by-laws of said local lodge. All payments must be made to a duly authorized secretary or collector.

"2. Any beneficial member of this society, who, on the expiration of the last day of any calendar month, shall have failed to make such payments as have been regularly required as provided by the Constitution and By-Laws of this Society, or shall have failed to pay the amount of local lodge dues required by the lodge to which such member belongs, shall immediately be and become suspended without any notice whatever, and the certificate of membership of such member shall be absolutely null and void from the date of such suspension, and this Society shall not be liable for any benefits whatever under said certificate unless and until said member shall have fully complied with the requirements and provisions set forth in the Constitution and By-Laws of this Society for the reinstatement and restoration of said member and said benefit certificate.

"3. A member who has been suspended for a period not exceeding one month, may be reinstated by furnishing a certificate of good health on the form provided by the Supreme Lodge, and paying arrearages and making payment on certificate at least one month in advance.

"A member who has been suspended for a period exceeding one month but not exceeding three months, shall, in addition to the above requirements for reinstatement, also furnish a certificate of good health from a physician, satisfactory to the society.

"A member who has been suspended for a period exceeding [583] three months may become reinstated only by application and examination as if applying for original membership, and on payment of all assessments and local dues for which he may be in arrears.

"Provided that no reinstatement shall be deemed complete, restoring a suspended member to beneficial membership until his application for reinstatement and certificate of good health shall have been received and approved by the Supreme Medical Examiner."

This is the certificate and the conditions of the certificate upon which suit is brought.

The plaintiff in her petition says that the defendant is a fraternal benefit society, organized in this state and under the laws thereof, with its principal place of business at Cedar Rapids, Linn county, Iowa; that the plaintiff's daughter procured a policy in said defendant company for the benefit of this plaintiff; that the home of the plaintiff and her daughter was at Wapello, Iowa; that due proof of death has been made and the company refuses to pay; and she asks judgment for the amount of the policy.

The defendant admits that on the 22nd day of September, 1911, Fern Teter made application to the defendant for membership in said society; that the application was made for membership in the home lodge of defendant, which is located at Cedar Rapids; that a certificate of membership, in compliance with such application, was written by defendant and forwarded by one R. D. Taylor, Acting Secretary of the Home Lodge, to one Gale B. Brown at Ottumwa, a duly authorized and acting deputy of the defendant, for delivery to said Fern Teter upon her compliance with the rules, regulations, requirements and conditions of such certificate, and the constitution and by-laws of the defendant association. (Defendant hereupon sets out the by-laws to which reference is made.)

Defendant further alleges that the by-laws provide that [584] the Supreme Secretary, as soon as the certificate of membership is issued, shall forward the same to the local secretary of the local lodge. Upon receipt of the certificate, the secretary shall notify the applicant, who shall present him or herself for initiation or obligation, and when he is initiated or obligated, and has paid not less than one monthly payment and one month's local dues in advance, and has, in all other particulars, complied with the laws, the certificate shall be delivered, and shall be in full force and effect, and no certificate shall be delivered unless the applicant is in good health at the time of the delivery; that said Fern Teter never presented herself for initiation or obligation, and in fact, was never initiated or obligated in defendant association, or to any lodge thereof; never paid any assessments of any kind or character, but has wholly failed and neglected and refused to make payments and to comply, in any particular, with the terms and requirements necessary and essential to membership in the association.

Defendant further states that if she ever became a member she forfeited all rights or claims against the defendant, if any she had, by reason of her suspension on account of her failure, neglect and refusal to make the monthly payments, and to comply with the provisions of the certificate and of the constitution and by-laws of the association, and that she never made application to be reinstated, and never was reinstated, and the defendant denies that Fern Teter was, at the time of her death, or at any other time, a member of the association or entitled to any of its benefits.

Defendant also sets out what it claims to be the provisions of its constitution and by-laws.

The plaintiff for reply says, that without waiving or in any manner foregoing the denials, or any of the denials, implied by law in her behalf to the allegations, all and singular, in defendant's answer, and inconsistently with such denial or denials, pleads and replies to said answer as follows:

[585] "That the defendant, as to the said Fern Teter and as to the beneficial certificate in question, waived each and all the requirements and provisions contained in the sections of defendant's constitution, that are copied and set forth in defendant's answer, in that the defendant, well knowing that the said Fern Teter had never been presented for initiation or obligation in any of defendant's local lodges, and in fact never had been initiated or obligated in any of defendant's local lodges, nevertheless placed said certificate in the hands of one Gale B. Brown, a duly authorized and acting deputy of defendant, for delivery to said Fern Teter, and the said Gale B. Brown, deputy as aforesaid, well knowing that the said Fern Teter had never been initiated or obligated in any of defendant's local lodges, and without requiring her to sign her name to the formal acceptance written or printed in said certificate, delivered to her the said certificate, and she accepted the same from him, said deputy, and in consideration of the same, paid to him all moneys and dues required of and from regular holders of certificates of such class by the defendant's constitution, and the mon-eyes so paid by said Fern Teter in consideration of said certificate, delivered as aforesaid to her, were accepted by the defendant by and through its said deputy, Gale B. Brown.

"And at the time said certificate was delivered to said Fern Teter, it was not contemplated by either herself or the defendant, that she should ever be ritualistically initiated or obligated in defendant's local lodge, known as Home Lodge of Cedar Rapids, but it was contemplated by both defendant and herself, that she should be taken, held, and considered a member of said Home Lodge of Cedar Rapids, as fully, to all intents and purposes pertaining to insurance, as if regularly initiated and obligated in the ritualistic work of said Home Lodge.

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays for judgment as in her original petition."

[586] Upon the issues thus tendered, the cause was tried to a jury, and upon the conclusion of the testimony, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment being entered thereon, defendant appeals.

All affirmative matters set out by defendant in its answer, by which it seeks to defeat recovery upon the policy, were denied by operation of law, and the burden of proof rested upon the defendant to show the facts therein alleged. Without proof these allegations cannot be taken as true in the face of the denial. Nor does the pleading by the plaintiff in reply waive this requirement on the part of the defendant, or relieve it of the burden of proving its affirmative defense by evidence offered and admitted upon the trial.

The plaintiff in its reply was particular to insist (though perhaps this was not necessary) upon the statutory denial of affirmative matters pleaded in the answer.

Section 3567 of the Code of 1897 provides: "There shall be no reply except:

"1st. Where a counterclaim is alleged.

"2d. Where some matter is alleged in the answer to which the plaintiff claims to have a defense by reason of the existence of some fact which avoids the matter alleged in the answer."

Section 3577 provides for the pleading of new matter in the reply "not inconsistent with the petition, constituting a defense to the matter alleged in the answer; . . . but an allegation of new matter in avoidance shall not be treated as a waiver of the denial of the allegations of the answer implied by law."

In Parno v. Iowa Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 114 Ia. 132, 86 N. W. 210, this court had occasion to pass upon this question, and in the first division of the opinion in that case it is said: "It is insisted the matter contained in the reply is insufficient because there is no denial and neither is there a confession with the avoidance. [587] Where one sets up the matter of waiver or estoppel in a reply, we do not understand that he must couple with it a denial. The law denies all affirmative allegations of the answer, save where a counterclaim is pleaded. Cassidy v. Caton, 47 Ia. 22. Manifestly, plaintiff did not wish to confess the averments of the answer. She intended to deny their truth and set up matters which would estop defendant from proving the answers that appear on the face of the application. The law made the denial and the reply set out the facts constituting the estoppel."

The defendant upon the trial offered in evidence what is marked Exhibit D-1, being a printed booklet with paper binding, on the outside of which was written, "Constitution and By-Laws of the Fraternal Banker's Reserve Society, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for the guidance of the Supreme and Subordinate Lodges and members thereof, Revised October, 1908, by the Supreme Lodge at Sioux City, Iowa." Objection was made to this booklet on the ground that it was not the best evidence, and this objection was sustained, and on the making of plaintiff's case, none of the claimed provisions of the Constitution and By-Laws were admitted in evidence upon the trial. Whether the ruling of the court in this respect be right or wrong, it precludes us from a consideration of this claimed Constitution and By-Laws (although fully set out in the abstract) because by the ruling of the court they never became a part of the record in this cause.

Section 94 contained in the booklet and offered in evidence, as set out in the abstract, is the only provision of the Constitution and By-Laws offered in evidence which makes any provision for the initiation of an applicant in the lodge, and that provision is substantially as follows:

"When the applicant is approved by this society, the Supreme Secretary will, forthwith, issue a certificate of membership, which shall be under the seal of the Supreme Lodge [588] and signed by the Supreme President and Supreme Secretary, and upon the back of such certificate there shall be a copy of the application for membership in a regularly instituted lodge of this society. The Supreme Secretary shall, as soon as issued, forward the certificate to the local secretary of such local lodge. Upon the receipt of the certificate, the secretary shall notify the applicant, who shall present himself for initiation or obligation, and when he is initiated or obligated, and has paid not less than one monthly payment of the certificate, and one month's local dues in advance, and he has in all other particulars complied with the laws, the certificate shall be delivered and shall be in full force and effect upon such delivery. Said certificate shall be signed by the local president and secretary and the member adopted. No certificate shall be delivered to an applicant unless he shall be in good health at the time of delivery."

It is claimed by the defendant in its answer that Fern Teter never presented herself for initiation or obligation, and in fact, was never initiated in the lodge, and that, therefore, she never became a member of the lodge or entitled to any of its benefits.

The legal effect upon the rights of the certificate holder arising from a failure to present herself for initiation into a lodge cannot be determined in this case for the reason that there is in the record no provision of the by-laws or constitution of the order requiring this as a condition precedent to the full enjoyment of all the rights of a member.

The statute under which societies of this kind are organized, Sec. 1822 of the Code of 1897, provides as follows:

"A fraternal beneficiary association is hereby declared to be a corporation, society or voluntary association, formed or organized and carried on for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries, and not for profit, and having a lodge system, with ritualistic form of work and representative form of government."

[589] While the law requires that societies of this sort have a lodge system and a ritualistic form of government, the statute does not require that those who present themselves for membership in the lodge shall, before becoming members of the lodge, avail themselves of the lodge laws or initiation and take the ritualistic work, if any, provided. What the ritualistic work may be, or what shall be required of an applicant to become a member of a local lodge, through the instrumentality of initiation and ritualistic work, is left to the organization itself to determine and prescribe.

It will be noticed that in the certificate issued, the rights of the plaintiff were not made to depend upon initiation. The initiation, if any provided for, may be waived and the applicant may be made a full member of the lodge (which we consider essential) without going through formal initiation and without taking the ritualistic work. The certificate provides:

"Fern Teter of Ottumwa, Iowa, is accepted as a member of the Home Lodge No. 101, located at Cedar Rapids, State of Iowa, and is entitled to all the rights, benefits, and privileges of a beneficial member in the Fraternal Banker's Reserve Society, and has designated as beneficiary under this certificate, Catherine Teter, mother, to whom shall be paid, upon satisfactory proofs of the death of said member while in good standing, the sum of $1,000.00."

Therefore, in the absence of any showing of the existence of any law of the order requiring initiation as a condition precedent to the right of enjoying all the rights, privileges and immunities of a member, we must hold, under this certificate, that Fern Teter was a member of the order upon the receipt of the certificate from the Supreme Lodge. We do not mean to hold that the lodge cannot make initiation a condition precedent to membership. Where this is done it is essential to constitute an applicant a member of the lodge and entitled to its privileges, unless waived by the order itself. [590] See Shurtle v. Modern Brotherhood of America, reported in 139 Mo. App. 433, 122 S. W. 1139, and cases therein cited.

It is next contended that the certificate to be effectual must not only be signed by the local president and secretary, but by the member adopted.

This contention is based on the provisions of what is claimed to be Sec. 94, but this section not having been admitted in evidence, and not properly before this court for consideration, we cannot say that this was made a condition precedent to plaintiff's right, and therefore cannot base any finding against plaintiff upon this contention.

It is contended by the defendant, however, that after the adverse ruling of the court was made excluding Exhibit D-1, the court did admit in evidence the sections of Exhibit D-1 relied upon; that they are before the court for consideration. This, we think, is a misapprehension of the record. The sections relied upon by the defendant, and which it claims were introduced in evidence, subsequent to the adverse ruling, are Secs. 98, 99, 100 and 133. Before coming to a consideration of this claim, we will say that the court may, in admitting evidence, limit it to a particular purpose, and for the purpose of establishing a particular fact, although not admitted upon the general issue.

Sections 98, 99, and 100, which were found in Exhibit D-1, the book hereinbefore referred to, were admitted in this way. Gale B. Brown, who was called as a witness for further cross-examination by the defendant, said: "These sections in Exhibit D-1 (which were shown to the witness) were contained in the book that was given me. My best recollection is, that that book that I had was a little book like this (Exhibit D-1). I supposed it contained these sections just as they are here in D-1." Thereupon the court allowed these sections to go into the record, not for the purpose of proving that they were in fact the by-laws of the society, but for the purpose of showing what the witness claimed was the authority under [591] which he acted in the matters and things done and performed by him as deputy. The court said: "These sections now offered in evidence are permitted for the purpose of showing the understanding of the witness as to the by-laws and constitution in this respect." The court had already held that the proper foundation for the introduction of Exhibit D-1, containing these sections, had not been laid by the defendant and the book was not shown to contain the by-laws and constitution of the society,—not the original and best evidence, at least, of that fact.

Section 133 was contained in Exhibit D-1, and was offered in evidence by the defendant as part of the cross-examination of the witness, Gale B. Brown, called by the plaintiff in rebuttal, and was admitted as a part of the cross-examination. This section reads as follows: "They shall have authority to organize local lodges within their respective territories, and in such territory to collect and receipt for the membership fee as specified in the laws of this society, but have no authority whatever to make any other collections as deputy, and they shall not act outside of their specified territory without written instructions from the superintendent." This refers to the authority of deputies.

The witness Brown testified: "Exhibit D-1 is a copy of the one that I had. I was given this constitution and by-laws and advised of my duty and authority in accordance with this Sec. 133. I think I followed that by-law. I understand that that was my rule to follow, and did follow it." Thereupon it was offered as part of the cross-examination and admitted, limiting it, however, as evidence of what the plaintiff claimed to be his authority, and not substantive evidence that it was in fact a part of the by-law.

We do not find that the constitution or any of the by-laws were properly before the court, except as above limited. We are not, therefore, in a position to determine or say what the by-laws and constitution of this order were. The defendant in its answer had alleged that it had by-laws and had a [592] constitution, and set out in its answer what defendant claimed to be the by-laws and constitution of the order, and to defeat plaintiff's recovery, claimed that she had not complied with the by-laws and constitution therein set out and the contract sued on. The existence of these by-laws and constitution being denied by the plaintiff in its reply, or the law having denied these affirmative allegations of the defendant, it was incumbent upon the defendant to prove their existence, what they were and what they contained, before the court or jury were in any position to say that the plaintiff had not complied with their provisions.

The defendant, however, alleged in its answer that Fern Teter never paid any assessments of any kind or character; that she wholly failed, neglected, and refused to make any payments whatsoever, and that by reason thereof, she had forfeited all rights or claims against the defendant association; that she had been suspended by such failure and refusal to pay, in compliance with the certificate. This was denied by the reply, and the burden was on the defendant to show this fact in order to defeat recovery.

Plaintiff further in its reply alleged that the defendant had waived each and all the requirements and provisions contained in the sections of defendant's constitution that are copied and set forth in the answer.

There is no plea on the part of the plaintiff of any waiver by the defendant of any of the conditions attached to the certificate set out by the plaintiff in her petition. The constitution and by-laws were not in evidence. We are not in a position, under this record, to say what they are, whether waived or not waived. Proof of waiver of the constitution and by-laws became necessary only upon a showing of what this constitution and by-laws were. Therefore, so far as the record in this case is concerned, we need not consider whether they were waived or not.

Waiver of any particular matter relied upon as a defense [593] must be pleaded in order to be available as a waiver. The conditions attached to the certificate on which suit is brought, are essentially a part of the certificate, as also the application attached. The conditions of the certificate are hereinbefore set out. The application is as follows: "I declare that I am, to the best of my knowledge and belief, in sound physical condition, and I further declare and warrant that the above statements, together with the answers made or to be made on the reverse side of the application by me to the physician, are true and shall form the basis of the contract for membership and certificate between me and my beneficiary and all parties who may at any time have an interest therein, and the said society, and any untrue and fraudulent answers, or suppression of facts in regard to my health, personal habits or physical condition, in this application or in any application for restoration to membership made hereafter, or neglect to make my payments of money on or before the day it becomes due, shall immediately make said benefit certificate null and void, and forfeit all payments made thereon, except as provided therein. I further agree that the certificate hereby applied for shall not be in force until the actual payment to said society of all advance fees and assessments required by its laws, rules and regulations, and the actual delivery of the certificate of me during my good health. I also agree that all the terms and conditions of the certificate hereby applied for shall be binding on me and any further legal holder of the same."

The terms of this application are made a part of the certificate by its terms, as are also the conditions attached to the certificate, all of which are set out by plaintiff in her petition.

The waiver pleaded does not refer to any waiver of any conditions of the certificate, or the application which is made a part of the certificate. The plaintiff says in her reply in which she pleads the waiver, that the defendant waived each and all the requirements and provisions contained in the sections of defendant's constitution that are copied and set forth [594] in defendant's answer, in that the defendant, well knowing that said Fern Teter had never been present for initiation or obligation . . . in any of defendant's local lodges, and had never been initiated or obligated . . . in any of the defendant's lodges, nevertheless placed the certificate in the hands of its deputy for delivery to Fern Teter, and she accepted the same from him, and paid him all moneys and dues required of and from regular holders of certificates in her class. This reply seems to plead a waiver of a condition alleged in defendant's answer: that to entitle her to become a member and share the benefits of a member under the certificate, it is necessary that she be initiated and obligated. It seems to be the claim of the plaintiff in this reply that this condition was waived by the defendant with a further affirmative allegation that she had, in fact, paid all the money required of her as a holder. Conceding for the purposes of this case that the evidence shows that the defendant did waive this condition of its by-laws, and that upon receipt of the certificate she became a full member of the society, there is no plea that the defendant waived that requirement of its certificate and the conditions attached, and her agreement in the application, that she pay the dues (the monthly payments), at least one month's payment or assessment of a like amount as that which she paid to be initiated, each and every calendar month thereafter, without notice of any kind or character from anyone whomsoever, and her agreement in the application that if she neglected to make any of the payments on or before the day it became due, the certificate should be null and void, and all payments forfeited.

Of course, there was evidence introduced for the purpose of showing a waiver of this obligation to pay, but there was no allegation of such waiver to support such evidence, and without an allegation of the waiver of these provisions of the policy, no evidence of such waiver can be considered. A plea of waiver in effect says that certain matters alleged by the defendant as constituting a default were waived by the defendant, [595] and therefore cannot be considered, but nothing can be held waived of which no plea of waiver has been filed. Proof of a waiver of other and different matters than that alleged cannot be considered as proof of a waiver of matters not alleged to have been waived.

It is true in this case that if the constitution and by-laws were before us in this record for our consideration, we might be able to say that the provisions of the contract are the same as the provisions of the by-laws and constitution, or that the by-laws and constitution were incorporated in and made a part of the certificate and were practically the same, but this we cannot say, for the reason that on the objection of plaintiff they were not allowed to come into this record. Or, in other words, an allegation of a waiver of certain matters is not sustained by proof of the waiver of other matters. The proof must correspond with the allegation made, and be confined to the point in issue.

The question before the court was, what matters alleged by the defendant does the plaintiff claim in its reply were waived?
